‘A fascinating view from above the air, have I told you what the gift he gave me were? He allowed me to dream while I was waiting for the generator I created him to charge. I was there, I swear I was on top of a flying cruiser, getting through the rims of the sky while cutting through it with the help of my mind.’

What I saw beneath me was the other ship, which was made out of metal, unlike the one I had the pleasure being on. This concoction of steel blinded me because I knew that for a fact, that had been my home. And I was still there, make no mistake about it.

I’ve revealed my discovery to no one out of fear that I may get too much attention drawn to me.

‘But Malt, I knew something was wrong. I knew them to be his servants, this diabolical creature, I think it has it in for you. It is aware of who you are.

It wanted me to know the circumstances I was in, the reason for which I had been sent there. That’s why I had been placed on that ship.’

Above me I saw the floating oblong which curved the sky and allowed us to float. Previously seen by my interaction, the androids were there, making sure we were in the right range and at a good standing with the other flying machine.

‘Even here I suppose, you wouldn’t mind telling me about who the one in charge is.’

No one answered the question. It was a sign of the mistrust to come.

‘You are not one of us. Leave immediately and don’t return. We have no use of those like you, scum.’

‘But I didn’t come here by choice alone.’

He frowned, turned his two-thirds of a human face to a scowl. Behind him, the area where the atmosphere curbed the hints and colors of the clouds twisted together, making it seem like he was looking at a hole which was drawing them in. Various puffs were lost by the many strips of wooden hinges which extended and prolapsed upon themselves.

The various loath nets still held the ship together. And Barnacle, oh, Barnacle could focus on no one else.

Every move the android made warged a reaction from him. It wasn't supposed to feel right.

'Listen, possessor, you're entering a dangerous zone from which your mind may never return. Do not dare record our behavior and turn against us, or we shall see to it that you'll be thoroughly punished for it.'

'I didn't choose to be here, it simply happened, don't make me a part of it more than I should be.'

'We can work this out if you want it to.'

He didn't like the sound of it. As he came closer, he got into the motion and pushed a hole through his head.

'I was aroused from my slumber. This was my punishment for sharing my bed with Irias. He blasted me with nightmares during the night, even though I knew most of them weren't real, they still affected my mind.'

Tabulations during the flight, constant falling, cruelty against me, but if there was one thing I couldn't suffer, it was the thing he made me do while I had been awake.

'I was creating life.'

Malt looked at him with a stranger determination. He was curious about this, as he stopped half way from extracting his head.

'You've created life, right? The animal you used to wear on top of your head, I believe I remember that quite nicely. What is it about it that I cannot wrap my head around?

Barnacle, you weren't any different from everyone else, so what made you so different from them? I can't understand that one thing.'

'Nothing, I told you, it was all him. He told me exactly what I needed to do and where I needed to be. I only did what I was asked, without question. Anything to avoid those nightmares.'

'Well then, I will have to see it for myself and find out, won't I? As soon as I will have acquired your head, your memories and experiences will be mine. I will hide in them for as long as it will take me to avoid capture or interrogation. '

That had been the warrant which came as soon as he was cut off from the rest of his body. Everything else had been dismissed entirely.

It had been done. He had become Barnacle. And with his appearance stolen, he would lay there in hiding for as much as it took him.

‘What now?’

This wasn’t right. This wasn’t right at all. Everything that happened before, he left it all behind.

‘I sacrificed everything for this? I’ve given up everything I ever liked for this? For an empty room?’

He couldn’t help it, but turn around, staring in whatever direction he could find himself staring at. I wish I could grab a hold of you Barnacle and smash your head. Because of you I’ll never know what’s it like to be human again.

‘Why have I been sent here?’

One quick looker over the door and he saw no one. Despite what the original holder of the head told him, he had not absorbed those skills needed for him to hack through the panel. It was useless, he couldn’t focus on the crossed system behind the door. It was nigh-likely that he wanted to.

He could hear them laughing at him near his reach.

‘I found you, little insignificant creature.’

Before he could take off the stoop, he found himself hanging with an arm which shoved through the chest of another one of the residents inside the dorm.

‘Why have you come here? People never visited when I lived inside the bloc.’

He dropped a basket of fruits and chocolates. One tiny note welcoming him lay floating between his left. Before he was done bleeding, this layman tried getting some assistance. Taking another piece of him was easy.

Barnacle ripped him out and saw the oil coming out of him.

‘This should be covered, as long as no one knows. I’ll rip a few more pieces and turn you into one of the androids.’

That had been his method of killing and deceit. He had learned that if he wanted to hide now, he would actually have to put an effort into every kind of action he took on. Without much else to do, Barnacle took everything and stood back. around the side of one of the walls, adjacent to him, he watched.

‘I see that you are never late with your delivery.’

It was came as a shock to the party of androids who couldn’t help themselves but try wrapping up the one missing from their ranks.

‘He has been destroyed.’

‘But who would do such a terrible act of evil? I have checked every profile of every comer and neither of them displays the aggressive traits of a terrible murderer. How could this happen without us know?’

‘Do not worry, as I will check every single one of them.’

‘Wait, Android AP. Have you taken in consideration that it may not have been one of the human beings? What if it were one of our own?’

‘A rogue android that came to us? I see. Perhaps it is worth considering. This may not be what we were meant to achieve, but we shall do it at we please.’

They were set on the investigation.

‘Wrap him up and hide his body away before he’s being seen. They can’t see us in this state, they cannot know that we are vulnerable.’

And it came, drawing and crackling like a tall fiend. It was something close to a tall man who had been siphoned inside a metal pole, darkening as the light above him went away. As he looked upon it, Barnacle realized that it was his own, one of those things which hid inside the darkest corners of his mind.

They had been caught by their own spread. Every single mad creation had once been clustered at the back of his mind, held together by their own hands as they couldn’t help it. They wretched and danced there like confused crabs.

‘That is it, I’ve had it with all of you. Now that I have been given reign and full control, you are free to spread and do whatever pleases tine kind as long as you won’t bother me any longer.’

And they listened to him and went away, spreading with little in their minds, creations which were malignant, and blindly dimorphic.

This one had come out of nowhere and claimed a piece of his body for his own sake. It wasn’t certain why it would act that way, other than the fact that it desired to create some chaos. But as it appeared, he stole a piece of the head, that had a piece of the eye, the brain and the recognizable metal mask and tools which went inside of him.

‘He’s got a piece of him.’

In the fraction of a few seconds in which it took the Android Hr to compress the words, the fiend was gone in an unfathomable speed.

‘It smells like chaos and I cannot abide this for too long. I’ll that they’ll be dealt with sooner or later.’

But first he went into hiding. Back into the room, where everything resonated. Even now he could feel them trying to get in as far as they get, since they knew who he was it would be much, much easier than said.

‘What shall we call you?’

‘The Krigs, that’s what you shall call us here, for as long as we’re doing business together. Call us by no other name and disturb us less than it is needed.’

It was an acceptable name, which could be spelled right by about everywhere around. By the eight quartet of the field, they had found the seeds.

‘Wait, this needs to be noticed. A new species of ticks is being bred. Do not interfere with their creation, let them be.’

They were about the point where they could grow other legs and spring amongst their patron saints. Even the big carriers showed interest in the mere fact that they would no longer process the danger of them growing.

These cut on the sides ticks were able to constantly expel their sizes in the atoms of energy they shot against their surroundings. But what had been peculiar was the fact that the leaves in which they grew, or the plants, looked as if they were made of skin. Some even displayed caricature images of human faces.

‘Is this what we should expect out of the new generation or is it Malt’s doing?’

A wave of distrust crossed the human population who accompanied them, so it would be settled that it wasn’t right.

‘Are we to expect the same treatment as they had in the eventuality that Malt may not be stopped?’

‘It is in the least of our interest to further our interfering with your lives. What’s been touched already is beyond our interests. You may choose to do with this information as you please.’

They carried on, with the human kind distancing itself as they raised their pace walking.

‘He doesn’t care about us. How long until they decide we’re no longer worth the trouble? How long until we end up like them?’

Plenty of lanes had not only been spread around everywhere but they had been filled with bodies. Human life had been anything but saint for them.

‘It will come, eventually and when it does, we need to make sure that this is the last time we bowed our heads to those who would drag us through the mud and piss on us.’

I for one am sick of being pushed around and hearing the battering against my door. Will they stop?’

‘Who are you? I’ve seen you around.’

‘We’ve all seen each other plenty of times, perhaps that’s the problem. They don’t want us to do anything else but look at each other from the distance.’

How often did it happen for you to talk to another man? How often did it happen for you to ask for something from another man?

Not from one of the androids, not in the form of a letter or by chance of being group together for a riot, but out of nowhere? Have you ever come up to him for example?’

He pointed at another one of the men from their tiny revolting sip. He was dressed decently enough to be approached, at least he looked like it. A nasty shoe on at the side said enough about the man. More than it could be thought or said about the others. He had a nail shoved on the back side, which made his foot ache.

‘Go ahead, try talking to him, and see what happens.’

‘I, I don’t know what you want me to say.’

‘It’s not about what I want you, it’s a question on whether or not you can do it or not.’

He stroke what remained of his beard and went forward. Looking around their tiny circle made it seem like they were beneath the towering carriers. They may not have realized it yet but those ticks were far more dangerous that they appeared.

A wait had been instilled in them which made them far too dangerous and more uncontrollable than before. It was a show of power that they developed dead stops in the air. Every now and then, they would develop some kind of flight, seemingly unaware what their contrast of power had been.

No longer would they be able to walk. They floated in obscure points, no longer sparking, no longer in the form of their organic-bloated bodies but like dark spots which stood remained in the air. This had been an unexplainable event, but its occurrence began happening at a rate which may not possibly be ignored any longer. More often than not, they appeared to dismay.

‘Hello, I am Fedor KIROZENEV.’

A startled look came not only from him, but from the people surrounding him as well. While they were busy trying to follow in the footsteps of their betters, it came to him that he didn’t understand his intention.

‘I was asked to talk to you. Don’t be afraid, I’m not going to hurt you. I see that you have a pocket full of tiny branches that you may have picked up from the ground.’

What's it to them?'

'They are my daughter's bones. They took her away, ate her and sent me her remains after the trade was done.'

'I don't believe I've ever seen a child around the bloc. Where did you keep her?'

'My daughter lived inside a tiny refined spot underneath my bed. She wasn't allowed out at noon, and she would play with the white cockroaches I brought her by the tune.'

'I see now.'

This was unexpected but he returned to the man who didn't look too pleased by what he heard either.

'I supposed there's a reason why no one speaks. After being confined for such a long time, it would be unsurprising to find out that everyone went mad.

Don't bother, I am Troth. Pleased to meet you Fedor. You needn't worry about me yet, I don't believe I have gone mad yet, until I'm proven wrong of course.

But go ahead, I think you're making some progress. Take a few steps and talk to them, go on, go ahead, talk to them. Meet them, I want to hear some more.'

Fedor turned and done as he had done best, he looked in the eye of one of his compatriots and turned to the next one.

'Ah, you're a woman of the books, I see. You're carrying a fine nest of bookshelves dust. What made you get them in the first place?'

'I have to go. They're not letting me speak much, it's because of what I carry with me.'

'What would that be?'

Her hands were gritty, her face was like that of a rotten fox, her hair alike to that. It was those calluses which made her stand out of the pack. That and the fact that she looked beaten, out of place, disturbed by something she had seen.

In a constant draw her eyes kept popping in and out. They withdrew from their surroundings and back at what she was now closely guarding against her chest.

'Why are you getting so defensive, I'm not a thief, I'm not going to take those from you?'

'Don't come near. Please, I'll drop them here and then, no one's going to have them.'

The prodding had to stop, again, he was watched but not acted upon. Nor were the androids in any particular mood of stepping in.

‘I’ll try not to get in your way then, and don’t do anything rash in the meantime.’

She almost drew to a scowl as the strange man went into his loop. It was another insignificant approach towards them, from which he got nothing.

‘Perhaps we weren’t meant to talk to one another, at least not in this mental state. Look around you, there’s something plain wrong with us. Your company included. I don’t think we deserve to live.’

‘Shut it before I shove up yours, we were meant to survive and carry on with us the strongest thing which makes us human. It is our individuality.’

‘No, it’s not. It’s selfishness, that’s what it is. Everyone’s looking out for themselves and no one’s willing to share what they obtained from the androids.’

‘We have traded between us, if I recall correctly.’

‘And when was that?’

There was no distinct recollection when an object, of any kind had traded human hands. He hadn’t been aware of it either. But there was some selfishness to it.

‘It’s your turn to prove it. Prove that you can either trade or give something you own to one of them. I’ve done what you asked of me and I’ve spoken to them, so what’s stopping you from returning the favor?’

Around us, there’s this thing which you may not get, but there’s absolute wreck which our world has become. Unless we can trust one another, we’ll die.’

‘I should’ve ignored you to begin with. I knew you weren’t worth my time.’

‘Try it, for me, trust me as I have trusted you then.’

‘Will you talk to people afterwards? If I do this, will you keep talking to others for me?’

‘No, I won’t do it for you.’

Fedor tarried the ends of his ears before going on a step behind.

‘I’ll do it for myself.’

It would be difficult to point out when there was a need to stop. But he pulled out a strange blue hilt which lacked a blade but ended up looking like a cornerstone of a grave. It looked strangely foreign despite the looks, more so that it had a single pair of human fingers coming out of a well rounded, sculpted mouth.

At each end of this hilt, the corners had been rounded until they had taken the appearance of some pickaxe, which sharpened itself at as many ends. This unique trinket he had gotten a hand onto was far too precious to him to let go. And most of them had only one chance to get a hold on something on theirs.

It had been damaging to them to even think of giving up what they owned. Each man and woman there held on their relics as if they had been their only ward against this world and its evil. They would only prevail as long as they had their trinkets as their trinkets would defy this insanity for whatever sake they carved for themselves!

‘Listen to me. You need to give it up and change. I changed for you, now it’s your turn to change for me. Don’t be stuck into the bloc. Look around you, we’re free now. Unless you didn’t mean what you said about asking too many questions, I don’t know what to make out of this.

Everyone’s staring at us. We banded together to get Malt and we’re still on our way there. give it up, give this thing to me, or to him or to her, to anyone. Give it away.’

‘But I can’t, you know I can’t because it’s mine and I cannot and I will not give it away. I have earned it.’

‘It was given to you.’

‘This was given to me as well.’

Interjected a young lady, who had a spring of peach in her hair, the appearance of a long horned dress and a small box of dancers in her hand.

‘I don’t think I need it anymore either.’

A simple gesture went a long way. It didn’t matter that much to her, as she simply let go of it. The box fell and bounced a few paces away. This was a release from everything she had been forced to learn.

No one dared pick it up because they knew it to be hers. As soon as it went out of reach, one of the androids knelt and picked it up, without a second thought or desire to question why that was. A reasonless awe came unto them.

‘We won’t make it, will we?’

Barnacle had made a mess. A few of the androids were spread across the stratagem of wood, stranded in pieces. Most of them had their metal pieces shoved deep inside, out of the very fact that they had given in the chase.

‘I have spotted him.’

A reconnaissance Android came into the motion. He hadn't bothered to pick up on anything even remotely close to the hints left in by that spoiled dark. The figure appeared out of nowhere, almost like a tall of wreckage, crushing his right arm while taking it with him.

'He is here, in the delta radius of the fourth floor, fifth' building, near the point where the carpet changed color into my insides.'

Apparently the blow hadn't taken his arms alone, as he was left down there, spread and muddled. What else could he see if not a piece of him which was begging a return?

Being part human part machine had the downsides of that. His individual pieces stood in shock themselves after being given the chance to be alive again. Though they were bleeding inert, they sprang to some conscious thought.

It was rare to see such a piece as being alive, more so because they hadn't been made aware of this occurrence.

'You need to leave before it destroys me as well. Draw him away, sacrifice yourself for us this moment at all!'

He couldn't think but went away, trembling as he pushed himself against each surface he could bash himself against. It was late by now, he had been missing way too many infants from inside his empty port hole. The rate at which they had fallen from his insides had been preparatory intriguing.

'Why did they appear now?'

The android looked behind to see those ink-splotted, six legged, stringed infants were starting to open. An attachment had been laid between them and the original organ he had dropped from his insides. It tried eating from one of its heads but it was slow. This conscious attempt to get rid of one of his wasn't going to end well. It was clear by the almost facial-looking methods it employed in its attempt to replicate the mouth motion that it filled itself with some form of disgust.

Unintended but not regretted, for this act alone represented something quite dangerous, especially since it would be seen as the act of self-preservation it had been. IT didn't know.

At the opposite end, he stood there, slightly dangling the pole which entered his body. He had at least another one which had been curved though it may have been going through his head and into the chest. In a particular appearance, that one would hurt if he were to strike him with it.

Would he announce the backstabbing piece? He was fonder of the arm he had lost than this one. And the infants were starting to grow their infamous junctions. From their backs, out of the inky packs of skin and fluids, they pushed one set of smaller legs. They were trying to give birth themselves, to carriers. He could feel threatened, stunned. Not out of fear, androids felt no fear, but the connected shots which had been directed through him by the conduit.

Even in that primal development stage, it was obvious that they were trying to produce those ticks, in a most inopportune moment. As a stranger, he conceded the wait and went away, doing what he was supposed to do. His task was done and he could only return now to collect what was his.

‘Why must I be bothered by this pest now? It is like me to be haunted time after time by the same illness which will simply not die away?’

‘Are you in need of help?’

‘Finally you have arrived. For a moment now, I started doubting your very existence. Are you hiding in the same spot now?’

One cut revealed nothing. He had done it with his mere fingernails. By looking at their growth, he could only think about what was going on now. They had been crooked, if he had not been mistakes, grown but crooked out of the previous escalation.

‘Where are you hiding now?’

‘Unnecessary mess, you may stop now. You won’t find me regardless how hard you’ll try.’

‘Are you one of the intruders?’

‘Unlikely, unless you want me to be one of them.’

‘So, you’re one of mine.’

He stood found legged, as flat as a table. His feet were obviously his, but didn’t bear the semblance. The flatness was pointless as well as he had doubted this to be him.

The real one appeared then, exactly four shadows who met in the middle, revealing a set of mazes, spirals, crosses, circles, squares and other weird symbols dug inside of it, meat-red embed in it. The shadows passed through him and through the walls now, making it seem unimportant that he was there at all.

‘Will anyone see your body going through the walls? You’re way too long to be subtle.’

‘Open the door and see for yourself.’

He did. Nothing could be seen despite him being constantly circling around. The entry of the other one had been missed as soon as he had returned his gaze.

There was no body but a tiny shrouded moving gasp of smoke which bore a pale head, melancholically looking from the side to end, with a dark haired complexion and missing pupils. His company was blind. Perhaps deaf as well, or not even a man, and the entity he was looking at was simply the smoke.

‘I see this is merely the conception. There will be no devices for me to play with, right?’

‘I don’t think you understand how much in trouble you are. In this very moment, half of the population inside the block had been wiped out.’

Out from the walls came more shades bearing heads. But they weren’t the ones of the dead ones, they were different. Likely, they would belong to someone from the outside world who found themselves there.

‘Let’s walk there. I’m sure you’ll be able to follow. Since I cannot return, then we’ll move forward.’

He hadn’t expected them to be able to simply walk through the walls as if it wasn’t anything for them, but he complied with the notion.

‘Not a single word until I deem it safe enough for us to talk.’

This one had to be good. What possible explanation now? He had lost control over everything. While walking around the place, he stumbled on a mirror which had been planted perfectly in a way in which he’d be allowed to look at himself. In the spot he was to get near.

‘Funny thing, isn’t it? I can’t seem to change myself either.’

‘You never could, Malt.’

Sights were lenient. He had never seen so many faces in his vicinity, at least not since working at the factory. Were these the workers? They seemed bluntly enough, hard of head, strong but shady. Did it even matter?

‘I’ll be caught then, with so much chaos being brought so close to me, I can hear them already, from the distance. They’d only have to turn and look underneath the pile.’

‘Give up then, and let them help you. I could help you once you’re in.’

‘Where does this in account for?’

‘The punishment called in by their species is seclusion inside their brains, whence you may be trapped and live in contempt with what you’ve done for quite a few lifetimes.’

‘Can you actually help me? No one offered me a hand. I was supposed to see someone.’

Malt approached it with a child-like curiosity, like that of a lover in search for something which fell out of place.

‘I know that woman named Claire, she’s out there, waiting for you.’

‘Wasn’t she supposed to come after me? Wasn’t I the one being followed?’

‘That had been in your mind but disregard it for now, that’s irrelevant. We need you do be prepared to face some consequences if you fail to listen to me.’

‘Who are you exactly?’

‘I am Tk. Now do we have a deal? Will you allow me to lend some obscure hand into aiding you?’

‘What’s this deal supposed to cost me?’

‘Nothing, only my presence, I require nothing less. I cannot survive without being in someone’s presence. I believe I have found the perfect one to be around.’

‘Then...’

‘Wait, will you accept the shades then? They’re a part of the deal, if you want to proceed, you will be required to take them as well.’

‘I’ll take them, I’ll take them all, if that means I’ll be reunited with her.’

Various periods of waiting had been skipped almost entirely, until he had been completely overwhelmed by the amount of shades which entered him. No other insignificant approach lasted. ‘It is done now, with this second touch, I can finally be certain that you shall not betray me when the time comes.’

‘Where did you go?’

Out of the one second in which he looked away, it disappeared from sight. Malt knew they would meet again, it had been only a matter of time now. Either his capture or his escape would undermine his plans, but trying to avoid them wasn’t going to work.

‘I shall not give in this disease yet. They will accept me as their master or I shall use my power to destroy them.

Yes, I will, it is in my power, I believe.’

His voice had taken to the likes of an echo which spread across the veils of his bloc. Farther than that it had been unknown.

‘Your sudden apparition may have startled me then, but I know now that it was an irrational fear which shouldn’t have haunted me for any reason whatsoever. I will master you no matter what it takes and you shall fall beneath the soles of my feet and wish for some mercy to be given.’

As childish as he’d seem, he was prepared. With each few meters now, he was approaching the point of no return. But the others weren’t welcome here and he could see them well enough to realize that they shouldn’t be there.

‘If you can hear, petty creatures which infested the back of my mind, know that I am in need of help. Go now, spread and destroy as much as much as you can. Do not given in and take no satisfaction until you will have brought complete ruin over what I’ve wrought. My mind will be yours in return.’

With the testimony at hand, he went ahead, bowed to them and completely released them from his reign.

The violators spread, the spreading terror, the steppers and infectors began appearing. In the distance, one of the carriers burst out of the many growing ticks which blew its body as they crushed and destroyed themselves. Even those ultra-galactic intruders had stepped from their high placed after taking upon themselves to use their deceptive manipulation of elements to strike it down.

From the palm of their hands came a rod of energy which shot through the mess which had become one of their losses immediately after a strike of livid iron turned to mercury. It had died in an instant, leaving only the rod still there.

‘We have only a limited use of the elements. But we must make sure that this won’t happen again. Destroy those who carry those tiny blobs inside of them before they react again.’

It was awfully deranged, the way through which they tried to cover their complete cruelty as a means to aid them.

‘Stand still, this is for your own good.’

A rod of fire appeared which burst another victim into an apparition of the burning man. He raised himself for a moment, standing still before he gave into the puffs of green, disappearing from the ether.

One of ice which froze the insides, one of smoke which suffocated two at last, and most importantly, one of metal which, again rematerialized there, left to float inside the air, as monuments of their power. Their presence there had only served as a means to show that they were still, without a chief of a change, beyond their humane means of resistance. Even their mechanical counterparts appeared to be caught off guard by their powers.

‘I see now, he is there, I can feel him. He wants to draw us in.’

‘In that case, let us deliver his sentence at once!’

Earths shook, humans got let behind, spreading as far away as they might in that one moment fond of one another, abandoned by their suddenly courteous defender. It was not meant to be, this look through which one may see the proper bedding of humanity.

‘They got us here only to abandon us again.’

Androids came to disappear at will as well, if it couldn’t be called for what it had been, the obvious trap had come out of no other place but at the hands of their captors. The suits began appearing out of nowhere, no longer friendly but entrapping.

Their marks were off revealing neither head nor swirl which haunted the sight. It was then that their moments had been caught off and dismissed.

‘I don’t think they were sent here to force us to return.’

Troth looked at Fedor for one moment. It had already been decided.

‘Thank you, I appreciate the gesture even though it may be a bit too late now.’

‘This never stopped anyone from doing these sorts of things, hasn’t it?’

Both were looking at each other with a degree of subconscious remarks. It wasn’t meant to be. Not when those titanic heathens came back into view and started chanting their gaseous terms. By then, it was unquestionably forced onto them, this understanding that this had become their execution.

A lot of land lay there with most of its resources ready to be stolen.

No longer would be there be a bunker either but a lot of them spread about everywhere, with no exception in sight.

‘Nadya, are you all right now? You’ve been acting off.’

She stood there at the table with Anna and Ivan. It’s been a while since they had a family dinner together. The only good thing was the fact that there was no one to argue with any longer.

Nadya missed her father, Nadya missed her older brother. She didn’t feel at home now, but refused to consider running away.

‘I’m trying to figure something off, mama.’

‘What is that, dear?’

‘Nothing, it’s nothing really. Should I tell you what we’ve learned at school?’

There was that distinct memory which refused to give in. She had almost convinced herself, to no one's regret to forget everything she learned and move on herself. They would get her brother and she knew of it. He's done some unforgivable things to Ivan that she had been aware off but he was still her brother.

'I remember, mother, when I first stepped in the factory. I know I was supposed to talk to you about the other thing, but this would be more fitting, I suppose.'

Everyone was forced to work there, with no exception. As long as one was of the status, this was mandatory. It was by no specific circumstance that she was there, but this wasn't going to be the expected recollection.

Starting with the factory alone, its many windows were barred, but not in the expected manner. They formed an outer-projection, held out like two mirrored crossbows which served as the immediate distraction which lead to the chaos which happened outside. It was immerusably unworthy of a look.

Work was hard and no distraction was allowed. Life had been miserable for her. Too many hours went by and she couldn't help it but seek some way out, right through the corner, after leaping over the belt, into the first way in. It wasn't easy to break through the first eight locks but she saw it. It wasn't appropriate for a woman her age to take action like that, but she confessed that there weren't many women in the factory. That wasn't even properly addressed.

Hers was a road which had been shaken a lit. A constant streak of turns which lead down. As soon as she stepped in her head had been bashed in by the tip of a small handle. She lay there bleeding, upon the intrusion as one of the annoyed detractors drew in the area.

'You're not allowed here, no one else is. Did you forget what happens when intruders come where they do not belong?'

It was faintly arousing, so much so that she lived through the hit on the head. Whilst this one went back through the opening and began emptying the factory, with his fallacious curvature of long necks which had occupied its arms, drawing forward scissors, axes, pointy blade and rocks. It was a hard hit which followed a quick blunt touch.

'Make it to the doors, I'll hold him in.'

That false promise had been unexpectedly broken as another one of them appeared in his cruelest form. His face only betrayed on giant cut which had been stitched together in the back. In front of them, lay some interesting spout of belts which had been immediately modified in their presence. A third one, a fourth and a fifth appeared which only served as attachments to the belt control directory.

In it they went and began accommodating to the device, spreading themselves across it, making it appear like a many pinpointed ruddy carpet filled with stained needles.

One by one the men had been drawn and thrown against in, forced to part ways at the end.

‘Why must I do this to my own? I cannot help it but bring an end to those I may have called. For, oh, I see that you are confused.

Let me take a bite.’

Within him was a deep desire to hurt. It hadn’t been like him in the past, but he had managed to draw in and push his exuberance out through some quick dismissal of limbs.

It was a dance for him which only made it so much worse. By the time he had managed to pull off a piece of the worker’s head, he drew in too much of his ear and his nostrils that he fell on the ground, readying himself to become either an imitation or evolve.

This had been the most dangerous thing of both of them. If he became an imitation, they could reign together over the frail creatures. If he evolved, which he showed signs of, a thing which frightened everyone in the building, then there’d be trouble.

For starters, it was an immeasurable show of force which would propagate itself as the construction of the bone and muscle would emerge. The mystical energy which emerged and surrounded him gave birth to a great promise. A promise which would serve no master other than itself and its dark purposes of domination.

It rose, like a mighty tool of defiance. His limbs were weary but he had kept at least a semblance of his original aspect, turning him partially deformed. Noticeable at the arms and at the chest, they went out like some masses turned out from inside his legs.

What remained of his feet never touched the ground any longer, but from behind there came a few throats which carried the hands on which it struck for balance. The bigger his body became, the more had it looked like an amber ball, which had grown inside of him instead of the outside.

‘He tried becoming one of us.’

‘I knew we shouldn’t trust you, traitor!’

Before he could repel this mistake, it had wrapped itself around him, crushing his back, breaking what had accompanied him below, protruding to the point where the pain became so intense that he dropped all the weapons he had carried.

‘So much strength.’

A stammer came over him. It was bloody and unwatchable. Everyone knew that their turn would come. Some attempted and ever cooperated with those monsters that had killed their own, so they may have a chance to escape. But it was undeniably hopeless. So much that it couldn't even be right any longer.

Both the slit in the corner and the gates leading out closed. It was supposed to be a fair fight, but it ended the way it had been intended by Malt.

The bunker, now, for it had been overlain in too many directions and there was only one violator who could emerge at a time.

Some were still struck in the movers, in the same instance as they had come to know.

'I think we've come to an agreement then. Anna will switch with Ulrich between who should've been the designated driver.

Deva looked around. There was a table she pulled from beneath the floor, it looked like the conditions were plain enough that they could burn some time off.

'Dear, dear, here, Nadya, would you like to play a game with me while the adults are talking?'

Nadya looked at her. She was in a good mood, which made her look at it. Four edges of the table lay locked in a touch, they couldn't even pay for the centrifuge of allowance, that the ball might fall out of bounds. Four magnets made sure that even in the eventuality that the ball might fall, the tiny metal particle might be pulled back.

'I'll play.'

Ollroy went back to his chamber. He was desperately trying to hide something underneath his bed. Despite the previous arguments, he decided he should be the only one allowed to have secrets. As the door was well locked, he pulled a tiny coffin from inside the floor. It was a delicate pull which had to be subtle enough that it may not upset him too much.

But he collected his regurgitated pieces of Dandrillion, which swam in the coffin liquor.

'It's been a while, my dearly beloved. But I can finally observe you in action, please, take no notice of me and act as if I'm not there.'

A colony has been established and it became obvious that they had a headstart to planting their eggs. It was Rolls' turn to disentangle the Mover from the relic. He came with a quick fix, which stopped the electrical reflux from occurring. They were dwelling there, cowardly, neurotically pinned sand crop-shaped segments, which snuck inside Dandrillion's head, crawling inside through the underbrush of the shaft.

The system had been affected by a power shortage which kept attaching itself to the nearest life-forms. In this case, it had been the head and all of its intruders.

He started at the board, knowing that a piece of it was already disabled. A part of its energy had been misdirected to another side around the mover.

‘It’s going to be another one of these days, isn’t it?’

Rolls began murmuring the song before picking up the wrench. With a few blows, the head should fall right off.

‘Rolls do you need help?’

‘If you don’t mind getting your hands dirty, then be my guest.’

Jonathan stepped in, with little incentive to begin. It wasn’t a competition, not any longer. Not since it had began missing. The Dandrillion had been perfectly cut in shape by what seemed to be a palette. But there hadn’t been anyone in here to do the cutting. This was the right turn of the bolt inside its head, one more.

‘There, I can hear them, can’t you? Another one of the blocs had been filled with my towering degenerate engines. They’re amassing themselves and forming a march.’

Malt now looked at what he’s done. He wanted to be there, to see it himself.

‘It’s dangerous to go there, you will be exposed, vulnerable. Weak.’

‘As I should be, that’s not what I’m counting on. We’ll see whether or not everyone I met and knew could be gotten rid off. If I’m still attached to someone there, I made my mind, I shall lay down my arms in surrender.’

‘And if not?’

‘Then those invaders will be exterminated as well, without a single exception.’

Without coming to his senses, he planted his feet on the ground and stepped forward. This wasn’t going to be any easier, not with them around. The mover began being cradled back and forth by the Violator. It had been a mistake. Him being there had nothing to do with anything, this rage of him had put him on the top of the food chain in comparison with the other released terrors. While the others had been stacking upon one another forming their mounts of siege, he had only ventured as far as to run as far away in search of fresh prey.

Otherwise, it would not be satisfied at all. Clearly, by the means in which it started drooling, it wanted in. eight feet from them stood an empty tray of metal and what had remained of the previous crew. The keys of a piano lay thrown and abandoned, its strings stretch around it. Not long afterwards, it had been ever-so near completion, that the song notes had been spared. Various tunes could be drawn, over the fact that they had been freshly inked. Inside the variously canvassed plots of metal, there were at least the other remains of past artists which had lived there.

Their resonance faded as soon as he was done with them. Now the Violator sang.

Anna was startled by the sound, which prompted her to immediately strike for her room. It was her only zone of safety, the only way she could be sane. As soon as the door closed, she opened the carcass of metal and joined her husband and her son. No tears were there, but she at least tried to make herself tear through the cupboard-like entry.

Her hand felt around the bottom of the bed, where she felt a small hole.

‘Who’s crawled in?’

A strike of terror came over her poor heart, as soon as she realized that her beloved had been spared of everything which made him heavy. Now this was the only way she could actually care, in that strange moment when reality and decency didn’t matter, she pulled pieces of herself and started filling the gaps.

‘See? If only she was here, she would see how nicely we all fit together, my dears. Oh I wish they were, I wish they were. I can you hear, yes, I can.’

Finally they spoke and raised themselves together, from that point where he would no longer be vulnerable against the parasites and the worms that ate his body. A few legs, part metal part deceased muscle and bone came out and began moving. This failed after a few steps, as it had become too heavy.

‘You wasted my legs, how am I going to see my daughter now?’

Before she inquired, it was obvious that she had been crippled with the sole reason which would force her to give in to him.

‘Now you will listen, wench. I am the head of this family and it is time for me to dictate what is right.’

‘But I only wanted to help you, my beloved husband. Have I not been a loyal wife to you for so many years?’

‘That is not important to be any lesser than it should be for you. Do you not hear my God, the Violator, calling?’

I can’t focus on anything else but him and his like. I hear his mad song and I want to join him in death.’

He ripped his upper torso from the cradle and began moving himself in the air. It looked like his arms grabbed invisible ledges which helped him rise up as far as he could go.

‘Please, oh please, let me join you for this one moment, that be may be together after so many failures I’ve been forced to endure. I cannot help it any longer, my body and my kin had become frail and I believe they may betray me again.’

Anna watched as her husband abandoned her, leaving nothing but some disgraceful atonement from which she could raise herself farther than it was necessary.

‘Please do no worry for what I’ve done. I think I see my heaven now. He signs of my glory and what shall be made with my disease.’

At which he smiled, grinned, something in-between and came to rip a few pieces from his surroundings so he could make a hole for himself.

‘My sentence is over now.’

As soon as he ripped the collar from around his neck, somewhere, in the distance, something clicked. A door suddenly stopped counting down and stopped. It opened and inside of it, everything looked clean as in the first day the prisoner had dome.

The collar had been thrown, he remained at the throng, holding with a single arm, before long he threw himself over, to meet his creator, who appeared mad. Its body shook as he approached and in that moment, the body of the man began to float.

It was drawn inside the circle, covered in the pure rage, which crushed his inside and turned him into the oily chum the Violator needed him to become. He was glad to be eaten then, even more to pass the mad sentence on the others. Not likely to him or anyone else, they barred themselves in and barely care about anyone else other than themselves.

Alarmed by the absence of the crewmen Ulrich instructed Deva to take the child away.

‘Hide her, not with her mother, Deva, don’t go in there. I can’t explain it but take her in her room. I’ll try taking the Mover as far away as I can.’

‘Ulrich, what are we going to do?’

‘I don’t know, do this. I’ll figure out the rest once we’re safely away from whatever was pushing us around.’

In the few moments he could even dare himself be quiet and precise, he rushed towards the driver’s cockpit, wrapping himself in tight.

The lights had to be turned to a higher point, to the eight of quarter above them, where he could see. He hadn’t been accustomed with it yet. Anna was supposed to give him the run of the mill driver’s guide to make it through. What appeared to be an unfathomable account of controls resulted in a few useless functions which hadn't had their place there. Not with the system in check. The lights turned up for one last time, flickering for enough times to bring the inconsistency of there ever being any kind of creature out there with them.

The Mover had the opportunity to check everything in sight around him by a series of rotations that ended up in the same spot. There they were though, the other human beings. Their presence had been somewhat reassuring. As the other Movers began moving, there was that as well. Someone was at least in their cockpits. It was undeniable.

Inside their own cabins, there had been a breach, beyond her, that cabin had been completely sealed to prevent exposure. Her moans could still be heard behind the closed gate, and in an attempt to prevent any kind of damage to the crew from ever occurring, that piece had fallen off completely, leaving some flaccid gelatin barely connected between the walls.

Ulrich saw it as a necessity he couldn't get away faster from. He saw the hole in it and decided that the best course of action remained a complete lockdown of the rooms. Informed or not, this had been a necessity from the start, as the safety of the crew came before their happiness.

Ollory had been the only one with the most excruciating choice. He wanted to get out of the room as he realized the mistake he'd done.

'It's not funny, Ulrich, I know you're the one who's done this, it's not fun at all, I want to get out now. I've done something I shouldn't have done. I've brought something in my room and I cannot get rid of it. Do you hear me?

open it, now.'

It spilled on the floor, they started spreading there, spreading their dominion while being aware of the fact that there wasn't another way out. Not the ceiling, not the shaft beneath, he couldn't hide himself into another spot, of empty barrack, this was it. It was just them there and they still managed to hold a grudge over what he's done to them.

As he counted how much time there was until they would start being hungry again, seeing how they were settling with nothing less but what had been underneath his bed as well as the wood of his coffin, he pulled a cabin from below and started looking into the first aid kit. There were a lot of painkillers, and amongst them barbiturates.

With that problem gone off the way, there was still Rolls who was the only one working on the Mover while it had still been active. That had been the most dangerous fact of all, how hard it had been trying to rewire the circuit without having the shock be strangling his synapses, he simply couldn't tell. Sweat ran down his chest and underneath his pits, but he could only bend himself over in order to avoid getting in. No credentials came to him. He had reminded himself that he was no engineer, the schmuck in charge with the repairs.

‘I hope I won’t wake up with some mutant down here. I wouldn’t like ending up the same way you ate the food. Not one to make a lot of noise are you?’

It was a hard crawl, especially since he couldn’t help it but knock his back and the front of his chest against the various circuit alleles which came into contact with his skin. By now he was crawling exposed himself. And the burns were to be permanent. As long as it was done for the crew, he thought, their safety, but this had been incomplete. He couldn’t think of anyone else’s safety but his own. Clearly, there was no way out now.

Worse, worse, worst, his mind kept popping in the plain wires which had been misarranged. Despite being on his belly, stretched, it felt as if he was standing on his two feet, trying to reassemble some device. Some tiny plum connectors were missing. Others had been covered in unnatural bile which couldn’t have belonged there. It smelled like it had been burnt through.

His body would supposedly do less damage if he could activate the manual self-repair robots which lay at the top.

‘Remember the manual, the manual is the key to survival. Every machine had one of those, and use it in case of the emergency.’

It was kept secret until now, but Rolls had been the only one who knew about this. For this he went in. It was a miracle that most of the connections had been well sealed now, otherwise, he would’ve found himself severely electrocuted instead of barely cut and sealed by the heat-electrons. They were still searching for him. Humans didn’t belong there, in the machines and he could swear he was being punished for a good reason.

Otherwise, he couldn’t understand why he would be constantly targeted like that, other than him giving some signs of weakness and the odor it felt.

a few inches forward and I shall manage to set myself free. Was the plain and thorough command in the instruction manual. As soon as he’d release himself, he would simply let go and glide out of the system out where he needed. Everything else would be put under statis, which would also mean the lights were to go out as well.

If there was anything to be drawn from this, it was the fact that below there, he couldn’t feel the tribulations any longer. It was only a matter of time whether they continued, and even worse for where he hid.

But outside, past the place where the exposure hit a point of no return, swarms which had been made completely out of it formed concise motions which made them appear as if they were living.

‘I have found a new friend, a follower of my ways which couldn’t stop himself from repeating what I said and doing the exact thing I did until we both ended up looking ridiculous in the middle of the street which the vehicles were trying to run us over. But they weren’t trying to do anything, no, they didn’t try hitting us, instead they stopped, turned in their stops and opened their rifts to the engineer's wretch where they could no longer be confined in metal but in their true living straps of bodies.'

'Marvelous, you are a hero, you are my hero. The greatest man who ever lived, how many other friends did you find?'

'Oh, but I found so many of them today, there's. Well I didn't keep up their name, they didn't want to tell me. But I know where they live, everything's been disclosed, the streets now. I see that they're no longer empty. Follow me.'

Everything was full, in time to get into the place where everyone was alive but trapped inside their vehicles forever.

'What a mistake that had been. Most of them, I swear, forgot to go out before entering those rifts, those portals into the engineering points. Now they're all part machine, which means.'

'Which means?'

'There's a pocket, or a barrel filled with all the machine and human insides which started combining themselves. I'm afraid now.'

'What of? Certainly, there's nothing someone as great as you are, who could be undecidedly opposed to all wrong and frightening powers, someone like you would never be afraid of anything.'

'But I am, as the mad forced which could be summoned by the sacrifice could throw everything into despair. Machines would live, trees would join this union and we would all become ingrained in our wild mannerisms of masochism and deviancy until we became like them.'

'Who are they?'

'Tall walking deities of the abyss, of the filled voids where there's no space for anything to move and even worse.'

'Much worse than an empty realm and one in which I couldn't even dare to make a step?'

'Indeed, there's that, that strange benign impression they give. They look as tall as our skyscrapers but they also hide themselves. I saw them once, in a vision of a dream I may have had. None of them share a name and they only come in the worlds where chaos becomes weird, not destructive.

As long as it's kept clean, they act like lord who see it as being as close to their ranks as one could think off. They're always in search of new ventures to go on. And I would say, look out there. There's a way to know, there's a way to see through their robes.

But I cannot be sure, I only see some giant arms constantly holding them. OH and their masks, they had masks which look like our Cyclops, yet they're skulls. They're holding half-skulls to be more precise, I know this for a fact.

I am not mad, don't look at me that way, I saw it. Red transparent robes, weird dances, weird teeth which were kept by weirdly caught on nails.

There's an axe as well, a wicked axe, but I only saw it once, bore by one of them. He managed to keep his composure and never lose himself out of it. Why, I think that one is a fighter, and there's a seer as well.'

'Are you mad now? Can't you tell the difference between what is and what ought to be? Everything's normal mere.'

'You were supposed to be my friend. Why can't you act like one, look, we're holding friends. Holding our friends.'

He took a moment to look at both of their hands. This time it had gone too far. Both of them were holding smaller versions of the citizens inside their clenched fists. It hadn't been getting any better now.

'Why can't I stop seeing them? They're the ones who made me do all those terrible things in the past. I think, well maybe not all of them. But one specifically, had instructed me to destroy and crush as much as I could, so he and the others could avoid being invited there.'

'Do they even need to be invited here?'

'No, not, that's now that I mean. It's a formal thing, not the law. All of them could enter at their bound wills and not spend another second there at all. It's dreadful, dreadful, I say, look at yourselves, I'm trying to get away.'

They keep saying, but not them, the ones I'm thinking off. The ones in my mind, sometimes they're give free will and aren't asked to act as any of us would. That's what makes me drawn to them so much.

All of them say and do whatever they want and there's no repercussion for it. Never, at all, that's why everything in their world is pure but never round. You see, being round brought some things which, perhaps makes everything much worse.'

'So their world is supposed to be flat then? What a ridiculous thing to say.'

'No, no, that's not it either. They float and walk as if there's land underneath them, though their space is not dark as ours, it's all red. Even their stars. Most of the time, they're almost invisible, if not for some weird shapes which keep moving in the distance.'

'And you've seen all of this, how? I don't believe your explanation, with the dream and the vision and.'

‘Perhaps I’ve been there, then. Why, perhaps I’m one of them. One who thought himself too good for their world and decided to come here instead, in the body of a man.

My powers would be limitless in that case. I could form, reform, reshape this world and do as I please, and act as I want, for my own self-satisfaction.

And nothing would have to matter and I could trick and outsmart everyone as if life was but a dream.’

He honestly thought that then. In only a few moments, their constant struggles didn’t matter any longer. Not to him. Malt considered bringing all of them back to life, that didn’t matter. There was no longer a shade in him, no longer any creature in his eye, well they were but.

But he wasn’t inside his body any longer. This had been his board, solid and lost. Despite having created so many versions of it, they were. They were incomplete, lost forever in his dream. Even now, they were too busy trying to destroy everything while searching for the man who caused all that chaos. It was a silly quest now.

What turned to be a dreadful hunt for him would end up now. As soon as he had thought of it, those intruders which had arrived through the portal went away. Meaninglessly being forced back into their own directions, but behind their lanes, the last thing which remained was that fool, left by himself.

The others were there as well, but it looked like the dark cloud on top of them dispersed immediately. Of course, he hadn’t taken all of the corruption from the atmosphere but that could be drawn at any given hour with even less interest than it should have been granted.

He was silently pacing around, in look for his muse.

‘What would my name be now?’

A thought recoiled back into his mind, coming forth in a way which didn’t stammer. Of course, he would try looking for a way.

‘But what would you do?’

‘Excuse me?’

‘What would you do, if you didn’t feel like being a man any longer, no longer the champion of humanity, the good one, the wretch?’

‘Then I would simply leave the body and carry on in the same way as I did before. Why, I think, I think I should name him, don’t you think so?’

He deserves a better name. Especially now since there's no reason to delay or care for it all. I can make any change I so desire, there's no need for it to be any other way. This is going to be my satisfaction; I shall see no other as unworthy, the scum, and the trash, forget them. As long as I shall find joy, they will be allowed to reign there.

Look, I shall ever bring back everyone who has ever been killed, for no reason at all.'

'But that would mean their deaths didn't mean anything at all either.'

'So what? They were all going to die anyway, so why should I spare them? Why shouldn't I kill them? Why not bring them all back or start everything again.

We weren't meant to do this, and I can see where I went wrong. I entered this world as a man and in that mistake, I grew perplexed and annoyed at them. These impulses made me ruin every chance I had to set everything right.

So many parts were missing now, everything spread and shed across the many sides of the planet I've split with my might, only serve as a reminder that there's no hope for me to live as one of them. They're petty and morbid.'

'And none of them have the powers you have. No human was supposed to reach such a level of power as yours, don't you understand?

Even now you're walking on a bunch of half planets that aren't your.'

'Indeed and I can see them. These bunkers need to be completely abandoned. They should've served as a testing area, to see how they would react in it. But I'll admit it, the design was wrong. I've placed too many ways through which they might die.

Far too many dangers, too few friends, none of them were given the chance to act upon their own wills. Always subjugated, always under my control. I sometimes do wonder why I have come here. Life had been much simpler there, when we were all called, and we merely acted like guests of honor. Royalty for the ones who did the summons.'

'Return everything back to them now, you've tried your best and failed. Bring their planet to the same way it used to be and everything will be back to normal.'

'No, you don't get it. We're both normal people here, but out there, where in matters, I'm in my original existence, prior to the change.

I cannot do it. I've made so many tiny creatures, so many of the citizens of the blocs and bunkers that I have no intention of giving them away. '

‘And will you allow them to be constantly judged as creatures enter your world constantly? What of the other people as well? Those you kill far outnumber a few selected examples, which only came in the same pairs, only wide spread.’

‘They’re my only copies, without them, every death could be their last. And if I brought them back, they would be different. You know what they are like, a simple lifetime is enough for a living being to make such a change that I myself cannot fathom its existence.’

‘But that change is never going to come now. Not any longer, not since you’ve taken everything from them and instead threw them in a nightmarish world from which they may never emerge.’

‘Enough of it, I’ve heard enough. My joy is tremendously dissipating now, even from your voice. I shall turn around give him no name any longer. Instead, I shall kill the man named Malt and go ahead and reshape everything as I want.

For far too long my mind had been subconsciously been working in altering everything around me, while limited by a weak body which allowed no suffering to the others.

I will force my will upon and watch. And wait, and see that they shall never wake up from this dream of mine ever again.’

With which he turned from his constant feel of air and turned to them again. I’ve seen their polluted fields and turned them back in. All of them belonged beneath the earth, like they were intended to. No exception had to be taken, until it was decided what their lives could be. One union between all the bunkers would stay. No more exposure, no more poison, toxins, the outside world which was his now, as it had been intended.

As the green turned to crimson, so had the field of green, the grass, and everything else in sight. No building stood standing, but a storm, which encompassed everything else. Various twists of the wind turned into hurricanes, the eyes of the storm glinting from outer space in the bloody appearance.

Yet, the god paced, walking in wonder. What was to be done with them?

‘You seem weak, all of the sudden Malt.’

The shadow inside his eye spoke, as he woke up as it from a dream from which there was no hope for him to ever awaken.

‘I can’t do it any longer. I can’t change anything upon will. What happened to me?’

It was difficult now, his every attempt of getting through the walls failed, he felt human again, a grain of loss, a desperate attempt at that, which had been greeted with nothing else but the outer metal caves of the bunker.

From the distance, it looked like the blocs had been exasperatedly forced into one another, creating an underground city completely separated from the other layers. And they were there, the citizens, the androids, which normal. No one bated an eye at him again, everything turned out like it had been intended. With the one exception, the sickness in his veins, the sickness which never gave up, the shades were still there.

The color of his bones had been inverted. It was sickening, to look upon himself in that much of a state. Before he could make it to any kind of desk placed there, during a move, two masked uniforms caught him by the shoulder and held him up. A few people came to see what was going on.

‘The two of you aren’t supposed to be out here.’

‘Malt, is that your name? You’re not feeling well, you can’t help yourself any longer, come on, we’ll help you get up.’

‘What are you? What are you hiding underneath your mask?’

As the uniform pulled it off, he saw a man. Not someone who looked like him but another concerned citizen. All of them looked like citizens, not like one another, but. They were what they claimed to be.

‘Concerned for me? But why should you be? What about the things I’ve done, you couldn’t have forgotten them.’

‘Settle down now, you may be suffering of a shock now. Here, I’ll put you down, slowly.’

The guards were gentle, as they pulled off their gloves and placed their cold hands on his brow. He was burning hot.

‘He shouldn’t be out of bed, could you get him back to his apartment. Does anyone here know him?’

‘I do, sir, I’m a close relationship. Of the kind, I think.’

‘We need to keep him stable until we could contact the medic, do you think you could watch over him for a few minutes?’

‘I’ll ask Mc Connaught to stay with you in case he decides to act up.’

They brought him in.

‘Careful now, don’t break the vases, they’re invaluable.’

It wasn’t likely that they’d be slow about it, but the books creaked, he came in a rush after all. He wasn’t set on trying to get through the fastest way possible, only the matter of looking down. The bedding grown was still there, exactly where he had left it.

‘Let the sun in, will ya?’

A curtain paraphrased them, it had been gloomy, Malt was too much of a recluse for his own good. A hermit, a man nobody knew much about. He had been dizzy, he had a high temperature, his aim hadn’t improved at all. It was a raw deal, the way he felt inside of that skin of his made him uncomfortable.

‘Why is everyone acting up so nicely now?’

‘It’s the migraine, boy, it should settle down in a few minutes. It’s making you say things, forget, you know? I’ve had this happen to me once.’

‘That’s not what I said, I simply wanted an answer, I want to know where I’m supposed to be.’

‘Here, you’re supposed to be here, son.’

Another uniform came. This one had a tag on him. Tags, tags, those seemed familiar, before Malt could be stopped, he almost immediately came off the bag and stood straight, looking ahead at the door. No moving plate, only the apartment number.

Both the officer and the civilian dragged him back unto the bed. It was unexpected, the way in which he had attained enough confidence to look around. What had he missed? Her. She was standing there, right at the edge of the door, the only family relationship he needed. Clair signaled for the older fellow to go.

‘I think I can handle him from here, thanks.’

She exchanged a look with the officer, who was going through everything again. Malt didn’t look like a suspect, but in case.

‘Any prior record, son, uhm, Malt?’

‘Nothing that I know of.’

Well, there were a few, but he had also believed that there weren’t enough details for him to share, none he would actually believe. Also the background check, the finger prints in the small amber box underneath his tabard, and it was done. Safe and sound, not a suspect, for the time being.

‘There’s a medic coming on his way, Joggn found one who had a free schedule. Sure you can look after him? I could ask for...’

‘As I said, I can handle, I know this man more than I know the back of my hand. We’ll be fine.’

‘Right ma’am. Sir.’

He rammed straight out, leaving the two of us here, the two of us, no more exceptions. I could stare at her for hours, I felt like it. For everything we've been through, she may not remember it, I could take that to myself and carry it onto my grave. She stared back, waiting. For what now? Apology, an excuse, or perhaps some words of condescendence?

It wasn't like me, not anymore. Everything I'd say now, as long as I could fathom it would be there, to stay.

If there was one thing, I actually wanted to know. Not to show too much of how much my eyes stinged.

'Can I see my daughter yet?'

There wasn't a direct interest shown. She thought as if to say something, she scowled at herself as well. Claire had been speechless. But she had no intention of talking to me like an adult.

'Why do I have to come here to save you? Every time, you never acted your age you know?'

'I guess not, it wouldn't be right after all. You told me. You told me she didn't get a stepfather.'

'She's occupying most of time, it's hard. No one really looks like a woman with a child, or no one wants to be near Malt's wife, right?'

'But I didn't tell anyone.'

'They can see. She can see it, every time you pass down the corridor. She asks about you, you know?'

It was the one victory he was either proud, or eight caught off guard by.

'Will I ever get to see her then? Not for a glance, I wish I could hold her, like a father would. Like my dad used to before he passed.

I know I don't have a right.'

'For good reasons too, you kicked me out.'

'Then followed you after, Claire. I wasn't willing to give up yet neither am I now. I don't care how long it takes you to let me see her as long as I know I will.'

'She's not yours any longer, I'm not yours either. You drove us out, even before she was born. I know I never asked anything of you, and I can't help it if I look back at the number of times I wanted to return and beg you to take me back, but. I wish you were there with us, from the start, not as a stranger, but as the father of my child.'

What else could I say to her? I should've mentioned that my habits never died. I was still a liar. I could barely stare into her eyes anymore, it was like looking in two tinier mirrors now.

That distance between us had been there from the start. Perhaps I shouldn't be allowed to see her.

'Perhaps it'd be better if I left then.'

'You knew from the start that you being here might hurt us. That didn't prevent you from doing it, this never had.'

It was pitiful now. Talking to her there. Talking to her now. Talking at all for a matter of fact. It wasn't supposed to circle that way. To go in that direction. She clearly didn't like being there, but he felt much worse for her daughter.

'Where is she?'

'There's a local, the local, uhm, there are lessons for the children around the bloc. More than a few educators had been relocated here, luckily for us.'

'Is she getting well with the other kids?'

'I think she's trying. She had this thing, where she, she used to do it as a kid. She used to rip a few locks of hair and rub them off her nose.'

'Like a tobacco pouch.'

'Yeah, yeah.'

It took him a while to go. Claire was still in the room, at least for the time being she didn't mind staying there and watching. The doc did a number on him, bandaging a good piece of his forehead like that, while giving a few painkillers as well. in case, to be sure.

'A mid-to-high fever but you should be fine. In case you're feeling any sick, I'll make sure to send you something for your back pain.'

'How did you know about that?'

'I know what I'm doing Malt, come on, now, you should be fine after a good night's sleep and some rest.'

He nodded and pounced at his nails. He was so onset on being with her now that he could not help it but send the doctor out as soon as he could.

'Now, now, Malt, don't push yourself yet, it's still obvious that you haven't fully recovered. We should at least.'

A flash of cold, his image had been dreadfully changed for a moment until he had been forced into an internal seizure. It happened in his mind but what he saw in front of his eyes was a sudden inversion of the room which took the texture and the look of objects, strapping them on the body of the man, turning everything else into the three of them. partially distinct, held there for a moment until he looked at the many eyes which turned inwardly to his demise.

It was still in him that shadow. Its presence was still there, he could see it hiding in all of them eyes, barely stepping out to the rim of their folds.

‘Promise me you won’t push yourself too much, will you?’

Despite his attempts, it still remained this way. Focus, Malt, this is your one change. A few blinks made him come back.

This is your only moment to have a normal conversation with her. Nothing of what happened before was real. Malt reminded himself. This attempt had been foiled, he chose to be there with her and talk.

‘Doctor, if you don’t mind, I need some personal time with.’

‘We’ve got an understanding Malt. I know perfectly what you want, don’t stretch something you shouldn’t, especially in this condition.’

‘Can’t promise that but I’ll try.’

She turned and looked at me with a slight embarrassment. There were things I said to him that I shouldn’t. I know that now.

‘Claire, do you think our...’

I looked down for a moment. Claire didn’t avert her eyes there, she knew that I had fully intended to say what I was meaning.

‘Is there a future for her here? In the bloc, anywhere at all? And what about you? You’re going to grow older and bitter eventually, have you not stopped resenting me ever since that day?’

‘Have you ever apologized for it? Have you ever showed me you felt wrong about what you’ve done?’

‘Is the fact that I’m not here more than enough?’

‘No, it isn’t. You don’t understand it, you don’t know what it’s like. You can’t stalk me and my daughter and pretend as if everything’s right.

There were nights Malt, when I thought you would barge in through the door and take my daughter away. I thought I did not know anything about the man I've met that day on the steps of the chapel. This isn't the man I fell in love with.

I didn't know who you were, I was young.'

'And now you aren't. That girl needs a father, Claire. Don't forget why I gave you away.'

'You didn't give me away, Malt, you pushed both of us away, and you sent us as far as possible because of a mistake.'

Malt tried cradling or shaking himself there. He tried looking into anything which might pull him out of it. Out of this weird sight of her. He couldn't stand being near her. She wasn't making it easier on him, she's never done it, she'll never understand. let her go again. Malt considered the prospect but he couldn't do it any longer. Not after seeing her for so many times.

It was his daughter. What right did she have to force him away from her?

'Why haven't you reported me then?'

Claire didn't hear it yet. She was standing on the sofa, trying to calm her nerves. Her right arm only extended and stood against her forehead, turning a shade over her eyes.

'Why haven't you reported me yet, Claire?'

'I heard you the first time. I don't know.'

I didn't know why she wanted to continue this. It was unexplainable. Why would she avert herself from him like that?

It made him want to draw near, near anywhere. Too much time passed, the clock stopped. Even the officers left the area, and he knew that most of the neighbors were outside. He could hear them, gathering around the nook, pushing some songs as well as they should. It felt surreal, and at the same time it wasn't.

For him, being there, in his normal apartment felt like an out of body experience he didn't enjoy taking his time though. A heat in his chest prevented him from ever seeing her again.

But she wasn't looking away any longer, it was only a wait.

'There are times when she asks about you. Do you mind if I?'

‘Go ahead, I don’t do it any longer. There’s no need, I won’t open the window until you leave. I don’t want to hear the noise.’

‘A dark haired dad, that’s what she’s asking for. It’s because she sees their parents during the classes. But she’s missing something, I. It’s been.’

One breather, it was at this point that there was something happening with her legs, she was twitching a lot. It felt out of place. Both of them were a pair that didn’t belong there at all.

‘It’s been long since last I saw you cross the hall past our door. I started feeling that you were never going to come again. And I thought that’s what I wanted Malt, but I don’t know about her. She keeps asking about whom her father is and why is that man searching for her.

Children pick up on that kind of stuff, you know? Would it be so terrible?’

‘Go on, Claire, I’m listening.’

A bit had almost been bitten there, I had no clue whether or not I had a right to barge in, but it was late. I simply wanted to know. What if life had been different? Now he may never get the chance again. He contemplated lately, how far would his power reach. It would’ve been grand if he could simply go back and fix everything where he had failed. She was still there, waiting for him to display something, anything out of that crude stare which had been on him. But it wasn’t indistinguishable from a blunt point.

‘Would it be so terrible if we were a family for a little while? It’s all I wish I knew.’

This had been the cue he had been waiting for, he could rise and twist and walk and, and. His chest only pounded, distantly inside. His mind wanted to go into places, distancing itself from her, from his daughter, from himself. Anything but that.

I wish we could start over and I wish I could witness my daughter grow but I can’t. I can’t do that any longer, you know I failed.

Malt had passed her so many times, looking at her grow up like a pup, not like a child. There was nothing in his mind to make him know what it was like being a father. No one to point him in the right direction. It wasn’t likely that he would repeat it, but then, she had to ruin it all.

‘She’s got problems, Malt.’

Her words muttered but he didn’t listen. It was unavoidable, again, and again and again, he would push Ivan and drag him off the ground only to push him on again. And now it’s been so long that what he feared the most happened to cross his mind. He could not feel any guilt or any remorse any longer, this cruel thing never left his side. If there was one thing he couldn't move on from, that had been it. That was the one memory he knew he had, the show of remorse for what he'd done. But all felt empty, like some cruel turn of events, which erased his compassion from his head. It was that scum which made him know that there wasn't any future for either of them.

'I don't think I can deal with another one.'

With that he lowered himself on the side of the bed. Claire's eyes were missing the reflection. It wasn't going to be easy now, but she took the hint and left the room. Alone, again, finally left to heed my own thoughts, I came to wander. I tried to do it, but nothing came to my mind. What was she thinking? Why have I done it?

It couldn't be answered, by my weak feet, and the messy wit which lacked in itself some kind of practice. Now he would never get to see her again. Neither of them.

'I hope this is what you wanted.'

This was meant either for him, or the shadow. Despite the signals, there wasn't anything to confirm that it was still there. He broke through it again and again without respite. No one tried contacting him again, and this silence was messing with his mind. A weird set of pills had been taken before he went out. He wanted to talk to anyone, and there was no one, about, until, him.

'Barnacle.'

'Barnabas Cleicriff, Malt, I told you that a few times already, you need to remember my name, there's no excuse for you to be rude now.'

'I'm sorry, may I come in for a moment now?'

'Well, I was making tea. And I suppose I shouldn't bother myself with trying to give in for far too old a chapter. I'm already late with so many translations on their way, you see? I'm doing quite well already, business's blooming all grand the fact.

Excuse me, Malt, but, you don't seem to be doing too well.'

'It's nothing, a cold, and a simple cold which won't go away. I've had it for some time now.'

'Then I've got the right mix of herbs inside.'

Having said that I was adamantly impressed was nothing but a ruse. I wasn't focus on him either of where he was stirring the conversation, but on the idea which had been aggrandizing, that which couldn't be touched or interacted with.

'Hey, Barnabas, have I grown old? I mean, older? I know this is a weird question, but I'd like to know if I changed.'

‘What a peculiar question, my strange friend, might I say that I have no idea how deep you’ve sunk already? Because, if I were blunt, to put it so, you always seemed lonely to me.

But as of lately, it’s been getting worse. We know you like having your privacy but, there’s talk. Plenty of talk, a lot of it centered around what to do and with whom and the.’

‘Let’s not talk about that or about either of them for now, if you don’t mind. I’ve been faced with something that I tried purposefully avoiding for a while. She’s not, she’s not.’

I knew there was a reason for me never trying to get closer to her. It was my gut feeling, a premonition which made me stray.

Not working properly, she’s not working as intended, now the kid didn’t really feel as if it was his. Now the kid felt like another broken toy he’d have to throw away in the trash pile. But she looked fine, the kid could walk, it wasn’t that. No, it must’ve been in her head. The worst of it was that he had plans with that child. Her and her mother and him and. Done, he had to have done it, somehow, it was her.

‘Malt, your hand is shaking.’

‘I’m tired.’

‘Sit down then, I’ll work something out for you to eat.’

He was rummaging through some of the old stakes near the counter.

It was too cold for consumption. He still felt it. That need to approach it not like a small piece of meat but some bone was in there and it shouldn’t have been.

But he lay resigned, unable to look back, now only time could tell if she was ever going to come back. At least now he knew what to do. Out there, alone, nobody knew, anything less, more than a cue, looking at the hue of roses, he knew they were having fun. Past the windows, up in the air, farther away, it sunk. This sudden connection had been a disaster, only to be merely looked upon confirmed that they were unable to live unjeopardised, with their hopes and aspirations, the free will having poisoned them all.

‘Confession for the sole souls, the twins which need to be brought to the crumb of anchors, I shall take them all and show them the rightful way. To reach our master, above of us, there is only one way, to subjugate our ranks and give into the remarks of woe.’

‘But who shall listen to you, head of the mental basin. You’ve beaten and abused the insane, as the ward of the long lost. Why, I cannot even fathom where you worked before. Where would that be?’

‘I haven’t, it was all in your mind. I was a normal man, like you, employed at the factory, caught by some disease and now that I’m free from that torment, I can do as I please. Must I be judged for some abuse if I can’t help it? It’s not that easy for me now, I’m only trying to do what’s best for my, where are they?’

‘If you’re talking about your hounds, I cannot see them any longer. Perhaps they were killed by those half-creatures we were met by, in the factory.’

‘What are you talking about? I told you before that there were no creatures there. And you keep mentioning them as if you have lived through some vivid interaction with them.’

‘But I have, I have and I can prove it. See? My scars are all around the body. They took turns to stretch me on the belt.’

‘It’s a lie, a deceitful mad lie. Can’t you help yourself now but make lie after lie? Can’t you say the truth for once or are you so far gone that you cannot help yourself now?’

‘I’m only trying to help you the best I can. You used to be my friend, before they came. But then you abandoned me to become the ward and watch over those insane people and I think you became one of them. Seriously, not only are not behaving as you should, but I see the way you look at me.’

‘My dear, you’re projecting quite a lot. But the others had abandoned me so I cannot really throw you away as well. I’d be all lonely and misused, so why won’t you do me a favor and come with me.’

Said Empatriorh, even now, he looked as sharp as a sword, his cutlery was even sharper. He couldn’t see past the pile, but he knew that both of them had landed fine. Past them wasn’t a factory but a rocket, fully secluded, armed with nuclear power. He had been an engineer, a great one at that, soon to be an escapee.

‘And you’re to be my assistant, Charles, what do you say?’

‘First a, a factory worker, then a ward, now a rocket charger, what’s next for you, Empatriorh?’

‘The outer space, we could make it for Mars, wouldn’t that be great? Wouldn’t it be kind at all, if only we could make it through?’

‘What’s this all noise you knuckleheads are throwing forth?’

A voice accompanied the warrior which had arrived. He looked the role, and wore up front pieces of his cattle, it didn’t matter that they grew in the most obscure and unsanitary places. They had been worn in a most repulsive manner, which only opened a way for him to come. It wasn’t right, one could not deny the fact that they were through. With him on board, the battle’s worth, he rippled a yellow shirt to reveal.

‘The mark of an evil claw, blinding the evil eye.’

That hadn’t been something to jest about. For those marks were carved there specifically, with the whole intention for them to come out of it. It was a ruse, as that shirt had hidden away the fact that it could melt and spread into the blend of reality and the walking plane which was alive. After one step, from it came a floating eye, caught and held by many claws, which had been long, armed and hairy, wolfish and warm-blooded. It felt like they were expected to present themselves.

But he did it first.

‘Caprichmold, that’s who I am, my good sirs. I’ve brought to you the most absurd gift I could bring, the ward of evil which may fare us from the beasts down here.’

Before the words were changed, the pile of dirt and filth which had lain around the floor and into the gaps and between the many weird struts of iron, they had been repelled by this. And the yellow edges turned into those vibrant tendrils like that of a sun.

Charles looked below and saw only the deepest desire to join them, those hairy beasts, tiny and beaded, bearing as many eyes as they could bear, only to wear them inside their chests or other parts.

‘May I take one of the eyes?’

‘Do not touch it, the way in which they’re adopting the eyes is painful and know that they are not implanted. They live in a relationship of maternal or paternal seclusion from one another, until the eye might develop and spread the evil of Cower’s realm. I can see that you were trying your best not to confess to the ways of his kin, but you were caught by it.’

It was hard living inside of it, especially with the threat of Yellow. In it they appeared to find some peace. They weren’t struggling any longer, now that they had gotten one way. From where they were standing, it only looked like they wasted more than a few arms for it. But they had started eating themselves in the name of the Yellow, cowardly running away from each other, with as little as no inherited interest to those bleak shades which started sinking in.

‘How about I cut a piece of my rib and I throw it in there?’

‘What for? Madman, you will ruin us all.’

‘No, no, listen to me, I think I know what I’m doing now, they couldn’t be happier if they tried looking away. See? I’m only trying to give them a piece of me, nothing more. I know when to stop.’

He didn’t. And in the wake of the first crude attempt, he fell off entirely.

Caprichmold had given in too much of himself in order to starve them out, before he could do as much as wave at them, they took this opportunity to grab a hold of the arm and go ahead, lowering themselves below.

‘I see you’re in a good physical condition.’

Charles said with a poignant way of searching. He was sure they had to have had weights around the sanatorium, otherwise, all that strength might’ve been achieved by some unnatural manner. By his nose rested the sword.

‘You took a broadsword with you?’

‘Only the best in line, my family heirloom, if you don’t mind, I came here prepared, knowing of the dangers that lay out there. No one shall face me in the fiercest of duels, no one knows none at all might best me like this peasant in front of me. En grade.’

‘I cannot fight, I don’t have a sword.’

‘Pick one of the yellow ones down there, can’t you simply reach and grab one? It’s not likely that they might bite you, as a matter a fact, look, they’re laughing at you.’

But the way to them had been obscured by a piece of the road which had sunken in a piece of mold. Charles’ hand suddenly colored itself. But a bit of it didn’t matter. It fell off as soon as he shook it off.

‘Wasn’t this supposed to stay?’

Him of all looked at it mightily surprised. This yellow paradise was starting to no longer be obscured by a single shade. Everything around him started being washed away. Even the beasts which were merely came in the suits of giant porcupines left their insides and started for the hole they had made in the top of a few inches which lay above them.

‘May I take another cut of a rib?’

‘Don’t, you’ll start feeling it.’

‘Nonsense, I am a knight, one of the most loyal, immortal and unbeatable sirs of the Green Cquight.’

They had to run to make way for those which crawled, propagated by a dense will, as their bodies feel around them, blinded by the desire to escape, they shook themselves of the coat of pain and made way. Made haste, as well as they could get a few children they had kidnapped with them. A few sacks lay around them, to which the knight said.

‘Stay here, I need to rescue the new generation from damnation.’

But he himself was cruel and another cross, to which he passed, made him reenact only what he saw. The upper half of his body came out from inside of him, pushing the skin out as if it had been a coat. Behind him a few pinkish sepia-tails pushed onward as he merely levitated a few inches above the earth. He charged with the blade as Charles and Empatriorh drew back, to avoid getting into conflict.

This battle of theirs resulted in the quick slashing, the mashing and the crude eating of what had been the sifted and most looked after cuisine.

‘Ah, I wondered if I were to taste you again. You have been baited in a most atrocious manner.’

What a good look he had of them, of their emerging heads, the features which became as clear, their thinner lips, flat noses, wider beady eyes which only brought the kind of the Oriental squat. They knew they couldn’t get away any longer from this delinquency of their young.

Caprichmold flew into their proximity and with a slash devoured their children as they were exposed. Barely audible sounds came but it only made him want some more and more he would attain as they attempted to reconstruct themselves again. Failure followed failure and it only came to him now that they could form in his guts, it was a must. That trap of theirs which made him fat, fat, engrossed into his armor, standing like a rock in a puddle of yellow.

This defeat of his came at the cost of the others’ escape. It was dreadful, thinking of the children who would get to be eaten again. Would they look the same out there? He couldn’t tell, but alas, he had damned them to a life of suffering, born out of his quick defeat.

‘Take my blade.’

He shouted and threw the heirloom of his family’s grave. To which only the mighty squire, Charles brought it to his master.

‘I cannot risk being taken again to the sanatorium in case I’m hallucinating again. Empatriorh, only you may be able to take them down. One by one, cut them, slay them and make sure that the children are safe and sound.’

‘But there’s no hope for me, I cannot do it.’

‘Stare into the evil eyes and you’ll understand that the power against their evil is inside of them. Draw from it. Those malignant pieces trying to escape are only part of their pupils.’

‘How do you know?’

‘They spoke with me.’

And came to laugh at that, there was something suspicious about the eyes, but when in doubt, he could only listen.

Another exchange from one of the eyes of evil, not the good ones, not the omen, but a mere trap which fashioned itself as if to lay in it an illusion. One look granted the exchange of souls and Charles found himself lost in another man who wasn't him. He remembered thinking.

I could see the reason behind them choosing to stay. They would be greeted by a band of murderers and despots who had little if no concern for anyone but themselves. In as much as eight moon quarters, they had created their coronary field where they sent their dead and their wicked tiny scratcher to fill the gates which lead to their hellish red stone.

A few months ago, they had dug it from the grasping sight of the unworthy. Deep down their hearts they found the keys hidden inside each, to them, for each had undergone a surgery to take them down. As mad as it appeared, they feared that unless they did they would lose any chance they had, to enter to city at last.

An orb followed, out of nowhere, as it came, it immediately shot a beam of the malign, being spared by none of their desires to return, and it hunted all of them but one. A single man survived the encounter, being allowed by his own like to carry on his crooked rotter. He had acquired it from the city, and spent ages trying to understand what the point of that gift had been. The moment he understood that his arm had become a tool of an utmost lurid fall, he had made his escape, met by a part of reality he didn't like.

'Is he right? I can't seem to point out what happened with his arm but there's something crawling inside of it.'

'Spot on observation, I think it's a pair of leeches, no, it's part of him, I think they're pushing out now.'

'Come, come and see now.'

They kept their distance but followed him like a pack who wanted nothing but a bite. Despite his best attempts to get through with it, he couldn't see himself being forced to stay there and writhe in pain for their own entertainment. This colorful spread beneath his arm resulted in the creation of several blocky flies, which were triangular and hard, spotted and dead, about for a moment before they came to their ungrateful way. As soon as they had met and formed their wide formation, they chose to remain on the ground and instead of prying away, they squeezes themselves until a big worn barely blocked square had come underneath him.

Ecahntryi walked towards it, unable to contain his thirst and hunger. But that distorted only melted a good part of his face and jaw. He fell in it and lost what he had. Before they could disperse as well, they got caught in, unable to tell what had half-turned them into the disabled creatures they devolved into. Drowned by their knees, fallen for nothing but a peace of lost mind. Some lost their entire selves and gave into some weird syndrome of impulses which could only satisfy them if they were shocked as often as possible.

Crarkt came to one of his homes. Down by the streets, up the elevator, a few holes admits the top floors but he couldn't control himself anymore. His mere entry had decided the fate of his house. As the few remains of him emptied themselves, he had been decrepit, he fell into that of which he most admired. An empty trap of many nails, the bed he own, now on every floor inside his home. They were placed for this very moment in which he fooled himself into believed it was right.

‘A little pain shall wake me up from this nightmare and when it does, I will be free. No one else will be like me and I shall come to walk alone in front of the.’

He hadn’t decided, but the decision time had been met by the pain and the rebound he took one he started sinking in the nail. As the rust fell of he had realized that they were too thick to be the ones he owned. It was ever so late that he found himself walking again. What was now a pair of legs, stained with sprays of calves, many of which didn’t belong inside of him now got to be pressed together as we came out?

This shove of pain stopped, he felt like it was time. As he opened himself the railing crossed itself across the walls, opening the way for the change to come. Only animals felt pain, only they would be as cruelly inferior as to allow such a thing to pester their minds. Within the wave which came as he opened the gates for the inglorious searchers to come in, they found themselves thinned at a dire command.

‘Let us search in this one.’

Rules of certainty and logic didn’t apply, if vaguely at all to them. Within a grasp, they started pulling and ripping each nail apart, then they came into the man and witnessed after unwrapping his brain, not by forced, and not in a physical way, but in a strange pair of eight strangled, welded together brawn pieces of strapped glass. Within them words appeared as soon as it was connected, by its glass wires to the brain.

‘I feel as if I should feel guilty for exploiting him, but I must know the reason for which he came here. What a queer fellow he is, to our way, I see that he’s diseased and that he wouldn’t be pleased by the least of us.

If only they knew what was going on. They would judge me, they would throw me.’

Other things didn’t work as planned, they had been recorded or conveyed by words, as none else would matter but the dissatisfied image of the bring to the hauling dens.

Unit four B had been dispatched and called into action in order to deal with the inorganic intrusion which found it degenerating what had been the components which made humanity alike. The drought of thoughts had only made it even near, to the kind of lack of discipline which lack in itself the need for any remorse to be shown. Soon they would cruelly fill their own insides with those of other standing people so they could rise and fill their empty minds with any amount of well-being they could take from others.

Demivison should endure for the time being the likes of the grace they showed on the streets. As they walked like barely formed monstrosities which came together.

‘At last, I have a chance to make my own destroyer, the brute I have been dreaming off.’

As the eye of evil pushed in the essence, they had realized that this was happening outside the bloc. It was the West Hemispherical Bloc Eighteen, placed at the mark, standing on a slightly raised river on which they froze it until it could not be brought back into its old ways.

‘I see now.’

Charles thought, at he wasn’t looking into another dimension, but father into the earth, below him where the senseless contact with this virus went on its way to work their bodies in a myriad of empty forms. Their girths were strapped, and they couldn’t have been snapped apart if one could try. One case before the one cheerful criminal had come, to which he would enslave the beings into a body of his choosing. He had begun stretching them together in front of those concerned people, with no regard, yet to them.

‘I will fashion everything I can and then I shall harm you all instead of trying to fit in.’

There was that deep desire which returned. It was much easier trying to cut one off and watch him squirm out of fun, even if it came from the distance.

‘They brought they high-density cutter. I see how it is.’

As the cold arrive, the snow could not help itself but fall. Though it may have been too sudden, they had been corrupted by their obligation towards the people. I saw them prepare. From the big tank of highly sulfured water they sprayed those mutants, those half-inhuman creatures into disgusting pools which shattered little if no bone at all.

Left behind were dripping remains, the beating could be starved off, but they were breathing and thinking, held by their white collars. Alas, there wasn’t even any worthless desire to push onward, to crush what had remained of it. Entrances by their dances, with the fact that they could not be destroyed, the dispatched unit joined them in their dance. And as soon as they were touched, their clothes started being left unclothed, their arrogance soon folded as they leaped on the nearest buildings, violating the privacies which be.

‘I shall not wonder what I’ve done, I don’t deserve to be gone. I will make it my duty to kill every single one of them, until there’s no one left to slay.’

But commander Ark, to his debut, found himself alone, presented by nothing but the vile fires and the starting mires coming from the retaliation. Damnation be the only way, they couldn’t suffer themselves to be conveyed by the falling rocks the ice beneath them being taken.

‘What is going on in here?’

Charles could not keep his pace. He looked and seemed to have adopted the gaze.

‘Wake up I said, they’re turning you away from me.’

Empatriorh looked resigned. It truly felt like he was working up a sleeveless white coated fool, who couldn’t help be but be cruel. Out of his desire to escape, he had been worried once again that they would try to pull him out.

‘I must seek a way back in, please, give me another chance.’

This Charles had taken upon himself a tiny beady eye which bore the sign of evil, never to be brought apart. There had been only one way out of this. As he pulled it out, he felt the vile creatures shout and wriggle in disgust.

Remnants of the remaining Yellow jolted through the scars and opened up paths for themselves to be set apart. No questions had been asked.

He saw no alternative to the action he took, in order to save his friend, he took out a piece of the sharpest yellow pricks he could find and performed a lobotomy which went too far.

‘What have I done?’

The question only came to him then. But his actions couldn’t have prevailed, over the fact that he had done it again and again, until his bloody head had been filled with poked holes which bounded on the other side of his skull. And that was it, he lay there, turning the ground into the color which left him. Unable to face his actions, he tried leaping it but failed.

As the other deranged being fought against each other to get there, they realized that it was pointless. No more would it lay in waiting, as it stopped. The only thing which lasted was his patience as he looked at the way out being drawn back, repelled again. Regardless of what could be, one could see himself being anything but paranoid, devoid of many of his raw emotions.

Redemption called, as he would kneel. And that’s when the horned being came, bearing only its translucence through a fornicating wound provider, the likes of a fighter being carried by giant arms. They provided one test of might, which had been immediately failed over the fact that it tried crushing him from the inside. A piece of a Mover had repelled the fiend, as soon as it scratched itself, Empat found himself turning and looking at what he caused.

He would not be forgiven from this act being given birth out of his misguided love.

There were times when I could hear the tome and in it the words could not bother but be laid in prone prose, the names of the disciples being torn apart, many of them being strewn without doubt that they would be forgotten by the abhorrent people of the wood. Little of them was known, and for little mind, one could not fathom how many of their years had been taken away. Within each page, one could draw on enough to figure out that most of them should've been dead by the time they were infants. Now they lay in a forest of crimson reeds, unable to see anything from the likes of the red storm in all of its informal girth, the magnitude of which expanding to the point where their eyes could be anything but afflicted by it.

As the voice of Malt still recollected itself from the past, a piece of it had retained enough power to look into the future and live. In the simplest of life forms, it could survive for a few days, with little but in time to see the outcome of what he'd done. Displeased by it, he could only remember what he had forgotten to dismay. To destroy them, and removed the repopulation of the world.

'My plan has been spoiled by you, heathen god.'

Who did not bother to observe, not had be cared for the beings that had been lost there. Whoever could survive the constant impulses of the storm would rather than be faced with the consequences of the deranged.

Going by a few chapters, it was the spoil which drew onward, the one which couldn't have been perceived by the cursed ones who still went.

And another time he winked and looked again.

Chapter 5

The isles

Eight a clock in the afternoon, there was a clear mess which had lain forlorn at the fourth Town Square, east side, where there seemed to reside another entry which lead to the main road to the grouped old planes. It was something incredibly docile, he had thought. Gourney, who seemed to have been delighted of the sight, had always stood there by the window sill, watching the old planes, thinking of any kind of chance that someday someone might hijack one of them and get away with it.

It had been a silly thought, to say the least, the planes were not functional any longer and not only that, there wasn't a man in town who would get inside such a death machine and fly with little fuel and little control over it. That had been one of his very thoughts for a long while, though, the chance of getting in and flying away. Old models, as they were, the progress had been grabbed to a halt some good twenty or forty years ago.

People seemed to have made all kinds of weird predictions which involved the likes of flying automobiles or floating buildings or even flying men, but he knew the better.

‘Your coffee, sir.’

‘Thank you Catherine, I’ll make sure to coin you for today.’

The young lady nodded and seemed to smile at the intention. What a weird design it had been, to be logged under someone else’s name. Otherwise, she would’ve never been allowed to work, he knew that well enough. Sooner or later you’ll be caught and you know how high it gets, paying the fine that is. That had been Jonathan Witt, one of the engineers, or so-called repairmen of today had said. Everyone turned a blind eye when they were to hire them under the boot, but accidents happened.

Someone would flap their lips for far too long or spread a rumor or two. It was even closer, to their likes alone, that they’d find themselves going through old files over and over again. This had to be a professional office after all. But nonetheless, he couldn’t stop thinking of those planes in some peculiar days. He had looked at them from the distance and seemed to have noticed, not today, of course, but in some circumstances, some pieces of them would be displaced on the ground. Wide wings would be spread and turned and would appear on the very ground in front of them.

Even the engine would seem to be inside it, or some would find themselves pushed through another one of the adjacent plane. Of course those visions wouldn’t last for a very second in his mind, until he’d rub them over. But that had been alarming.

‘You know, they say the brain goes first into some layers of fading before it finally dies. First the memories, then the experiences, the feeling in your legs and then.’

‘I’m fine, Alan, I think I’m a under stress, nothing else. There’s no need for you to take care of me or anything. I think I can take care of myself easily.’

With what had been left of him anyway. His arms were sore, he’d been standing in that chair for the entire day. His suit hadn’t been washed, and it had that dark grey with fading steps which had been indistinguishable from the very colour of his shirt by now. But he still couldn’t help but look at him, this Alan. He had been chief of the lower tiers, the middens of town.

In his care, there laid the lives and the livelihood of too many people to count. And he had been, most importantly, a good man, from what he could tell, a bit too harsh of some people, but.

‘I have come to you with a proposal. Say, Gourney, for how long have we known each other for? tell me that, how long have we spoken with? Since when?’

‘Twenty-five years ago, Alan, twenty years ever since that very day we met as children.’

‘And have you ever thought that we may reach such a point where we would have such an influence as we have now?’

‘I can’t say it went through the mind of a child, Alan, but I suppose, there was something there.’

In all honesty, he had always looked at Alan as if he had been some kind of a hero than anything else. The boy, as he had been in his youth appeared out of nowhere and seemed to have looked as if he had been bathed in the very sun. Even now, his colour hadn’t faded and his soul and will appeared to be as strong as they had once been. It was no wonder this man had gotten this far, at least not to him.

But he was getting too distracted now and the clock seemed to have ticked twice more. First the planes, now him. What was it now?

‘You’ve come here with a proposal.’

‘Right, I won’t bore you with the details. But I think, it would only be right for me to enter this term’s next election. I think I may have found my vocation into politics.’

This had been the first time he had heard him even consider the very thought of it. This apolitical fool had not even a recollection of an idea what politics entailed.

‘Have you lost your mind, Alan? Do you have any idea what politics do to a man? Especially one like you?’

There was a sudden fright he felt, which wavered at some of the madder ideas Alan had his charm and likes and things which had been previously excused because they had been friends for so long now came to his mind. Some of the things he may have said in the past frightened him, for as good of a man as he had been, there would be men out there who’d stop at nothing but to smear him.

If there was one thing he knew it to be true, though, was the fact that he did well to keep on promises. That one thing might get him through if he had ever decided to get on that path. Even with the possibilities of digging as much dirt on his past as there was, he knew that people still took more on his act than on his tongue and his pejorative.

‘Well, are you sure there’s no way I might be able to convince you to give up? There’s still time, isn’t there, we can still make something out of it, I’m certain. Perhaps I could help you look into another venture or in some other way for you to spend your time.’

‘Damn it Gourney, I have already told you that my mind is set. This is what I want to, this is what I’m counting on. I was to get into politics as fast as possible. Let me tell you something, ever since I’ve known myself, I’ve come to know that I had a calling.’

‘Like the calling of wanting to become a pilot, right? Or a soldier, a corporate businessman, a boxer as well, and every other kind of dangerous and difficult task you could even think off, wouldn’t that be right?’

‘Certainly, there’s something more to it than that. My past ventures have nothing to do with it. And I might even add that they were lawfully tried on and accomplished in the leave of my absence. I have made a name for myself in every field I have so thoroughly attempted at taking, even if it were short-live at most.’

‘An aviator, field worker, inventor, engineer, and.’

‘Will you listen for one moment, Gourney, I’m being serious right now, and I believe you may have said pilot before.’

‘I haven’t repeated myself, good friend, I have only tried drawing your attention to the fact that an aviator and a pilot would supposedly be two different things. Don’t twist them as you go, or you may forget who you are on the long run.’

‘Have you always been as difficult as you are now or is this an entirely new turn?’

‘One moment please.’

The telephone rang. It seemed to be the missus, not his wife, he wasn’t married. It seemed like he had been planning on writing a few names on paper which couldn’t be concluded as being female alone. As this sort of thing seemed to be an invitational-thing only, there was some quiet ledger by the side.

‘All right now, I’ll make sure they know, at eight, as I said. Take care now.’

‘What are you planning on? You wouldn’t happen to be going somewhere without having invited me?’

‘You haven’t asked, and wouldn’t you so happen to have something else on your mind now? This is a business meeting I’m supposed to be attending, and you’re about to become a busy fellow from now on.’

‘So, I suppose I won’t be able to count on your support, will I?’

‘Listen, Pybough.’

That had been the nickname he had been given for a while now. It suited him well, as ragged of a man as he had been a little bit thicker, sometimes appearing like a tin-man from the distance, this man had no care in the world. It had to be business then, if he had planned on doing that of which he had preached.

‘Pybough, as I have said, I think it’s a crude mistake, and I think you’ll stop at nothing until you get what you want.’

‘What’s the harm in that, now? As long as I harm no one, I don’t think there’s anything which could go wrong.’

He had been ever-so childish when it came to it. But he couldn’t help it there, on the paper, those names had been incomprehensibly scribbled. Damn this man and his distracting gaze, now he would have to call everyone again.

‘Well, then, you wouldn’t be able to set up a meeting with me, would you?’

‘Gourney, you’re not proposing what I think you are now, are you?’

‘Why not, a formal meeting might be exactly what you’re in need of. Someone to take care of your problems and give you enough advice in the matter that you may not stumble on your toes as soon as you start talking to the people.’

‘I won’t actually have to do that, would I? You know I get terribly anxious when there are a lot of people out there.’

‘And what did you expect then, Pybough, that you could stand somewhere behind some hard desk and give orders to some busy body loud mouth? That’s not how it works, for some people it may’ve worked but you won’t be able to get anything out of it.’

As long as there came some desire to push it through, at least, he would know what to expect. It came as no surprise that he stormed out of the room when he hadn’t his way. Catherine came in as soon as the scene went off through the second door and down the stairs.

‘Should I write him in, sir?’

‘No, this would be enough for today, if he wants to set an appointment, he knows where to find me. Oh, and Catherine.’

‘Yes, sir?’

‘You’re a dame, in the truest form of the word.’

‘Thank you sir.’

She bowed as she pleaded to return to the filing of the passages. There had been plenty of small desks behind her which were in need of organizing and re-organizing and so far, there were still a few more hours of daylight in which he needed to work. The day couldn’t have gone any slower than it was then. Clearly, there had been some thorough need to look into it, rather than be caught in whatever was going out now.

‘ what are you planning on doing now, you shady little dark man?’

He was wearing some ratty clothes and seemed to have a small tie around his neck which bore some small symbols he couldn't make out from where he stood. At least from the soles of the window, he saw something close to old worn shoes and pieces of his coat which had belonged to a bunch of different clothes which had been tied together. This fellow inspired no trust from him and undoubtedly from any other man. From the way he acted and how he chose to snick inside the passage at that very hour when honest people worked. It was indubitably worn.

'What was that?'

'Right, we're in the meeting, aren't we?'

'We've entered it perhaps, I'd say, ten minutes ago, Mr. Gourney, are you certain you don't want to reschedule? I'm certain we could do this at another hour, in another day, perhaps somewhere next week?'

'I'm sorry Polp, but we're both busy men and I can assure you that this is nothing but some mild distraction I can't seem to wrap my head around. It'll go away, I'll make certain of it. But in the meantime, say, were you in need of something?'

'Right, the files, there were a few of them stored in your office, If I would happen to be right. I've spoke to the attorney and I think I found them, somewhere, somewhere in the newspaper. There had been an article about some lost case files, something close to twenty years ago. Of course, those nasty people wouldn't happen to let the public be aware that they were lost now, would they? It wouldn't spread as much dough as it would otherwise.'

'I got it. So, you're after some alleged missing files, which you claim to be here.'

'Or some copy of them, Mr. Gourney.'

'Please, call me what you want, I'm only here to help, but I don't suppose you're much in a hurry if you're able to move it to the next week.'

'I'm in a terribly tight schedule and you're not the first lead I have. My apologies, sir, but I don't think I'll be able to say anything else about it. See, I can't find it now, but I think I you were my fourth choice in my long list of checks.'

'You're seriously set on this aren't you? Please, describe me the case you seem to be after.'

And the man seemed to be bent on doing so, after rummaging through the file. There were a few things wrong with it. Not with the case or with the way he presented himself, rather, with how dirty that file holder had been. It wasn't certain, to be clear, what had been stored in it before he had chosen to keep his files inside, but he had taken that from somewhere else.

Something else had been stored in them, and he could smell it. He could feel it, and it make him sick to the very gut that hit. Page after page, through which he went, seemed to appeal to the same kind of intent and he had known of it. Whatever it had been, that wasn't in his best interest to inquire of.

'Well, I could say with some certainty that we may have a copy of the file you're looking for.'

And to be clear about it, this was a murder case. Strange, normally they didn't have to deal with those kinds of things at the archives since most people only searched for some tip and tat, something old like a newspaper or some lost book. What had been even worse was the fact that, creakingly, as it had been, there was something clear about it, in the way he had looked and stared.

He knew very well that neither of us were in the possession of such a file by legal means, and if someone were to speak or say a thing. Well, if he had been undercover and by some wild desired came to expose him, then that strange looking file holder would've been the last of his concerns. Not that he would be unwelcomed by the fact that the prison had been laid the opposite of the place he intended on looking at.

This very turn of events might've even pleased him by some means, if it came near the way he had stared. He could even come to be interested in such a short-vacation.

But the murder, the arson, whoever it had been had lain in that file. Or at least some evidence of it, only if he could remember if the culprit had been caught or not, then he would've been able to help him. Instead, he only rang for Catherine, which promptly called for her.

'My dear Catherine, would you please bring me the file with the number eight five zero forty eight dash eighty one?'

An oddly specific number, but he had known the best. She only bowed to me and the man besides me and closed the door on her way to the storage area.

'You must either have a great memory for these types of things or someone informed you of my coming or intention. Say, which one is it, mister?'

I could only grin at the man, and let him know nothing of it. My very trick had been clumsiness while going through the files myself that morning. Through an accidental approach, I, like any man, had knocked a few files down one of the storage contained and had to re-arrange them myself, as best as I could. But that had been fate, for I knew it very well, how she acted and how she guided me there. With her in the way, I have stumbled in the exact file this man had been looking for, and managed to glance at some of the details.

My grin hadn't betrayed me and I could only shrug at the fact that I have managed to be as conniving as I could. My dear assistant, as I was so delighted to call her, now appeared with the case file in order. There were are least a twenty or more pages which spoke in detail and seemed to bear some information about the case, most of which being mildly disturbing, or rather would've been unnerving for the average person. It was by no means that he would look away from it. In itself, there was a great amount of pages which couldn't do, or wouldn't do for the work around there.

Plenty of words seemed scrambled in the file, even more than usual. And there it seemed like this would be that kind of report. The type which would go on and on, carrying every single insignificant report which included about everything, that being wrapped around the most invaluable information there seemed to be there. Pictures of the suspects, pictures of the buildings, the inside.

'What a mess.'

Gourney said as he rammed the end of the file on his desk. On his wide side, where his lamp seemed to throw a shade of light across his dark stained wood, there was the image of a hooded man. He had been shot inside the building and staked. An eight-inch stick of wood seemed to have been plunged inside his chest. That dreadful thing, the sting seemed to have drained the man of his blood, but only in part. Most of it hadn't even been on the floor but stored in various containers.

'What a whole damned mess.'

'I know, I was in that building, you see? I hope you would've managed to give me some information, I'll admit, I wasn't expecting much to come out of it. So far, eight archives turned me down and told me I wouldn't be able to find anything here, that they don't store those kinds of stuff, you know?'

'Don't hold it to yourself too hard. It's not something we're proud of here, storing things which may be of no proper use. But you seemed to be in need of help.

Wait, don't forget, the files aren't allowed leave of the archive. Don't do us any disservice, will you? You're not thick-headed, you know better than that.'

'I know, I know, it's an ole habit, that's all. Nothing personal, right? It's not like I could make any use of it now that the case's closed.'

And it had been some time ever since. I could still remember that house, that very building in which I lived.

'Close the door, thoroughly, I don't want anyone to hear us now.'

as he spoke, Gourney seemed to have gone near the window before closing in, this time there was no one on the streets to take his sight away. But that wasn't why he'd done it. There were multiple offices around and who knew whoever might be listening from the adjacent ones, or the ones bellow and above his very own. It was unclear as to look into it, but he listened.

A slacker's neighborhood, poor and stricken, to say that one who met and lived in poverty found himself there would most likely be some understatement. At least, from the kind alone, there was something falling off the walls. It was the tapestry, which seemed to have been some rose-coloured patterned circles or crystals, surrounded by some dark grey. The floor was making sounds as usual and about the ninth hour, you'd hear the arguments being had through the thin walls.

No one had been spared from it. Take no offense here, you seem likely to be a good man, who had grown in a good place, but this wasn't one of those dream-scape homes you'd hear people being proud of. People here were nasty, trash, the kind you'd think off upon hearing the mutter of low-life. All of which had been grouped in a single apartment complex there, in which I happened to live.

There were no decorations during winter's eve, or any celebration for us. And people around town knew who we were, what we were, it was obvious to glance us to know what our upbringing was.

'Mary, bring me the damn water, I'm starting to get cold.'

One man in particular stood with me. I believe his name had been Fredrick, young enough to have found work in the slums, but dumb enough to live here. Oh, he stood out of place, all right, reddened hair, pale as they came and even then, he had the guts to put everyone around him down. No one retaliated, not even the hand of a palm or some fist. Everyone knew there was something wrong about him.

The way he kept yelling for a woman to bring him something from here and there.

'Mary bring me the cups, we're having guests. Mary do this, Mary you're worthless, go back to your damned chamber.'

Yet no one seemed to know who she was or have ever seen her. What had been worse was the fact that he paid for two in his apartment, which meant that either he went mad and began being charitable for the constable, or there was something he was hiding.

A nasty fellow at that, wearing by his overalls, and the way he held himself. For as much as he stood inside his own apartment, this man hadn't been weak, he had looked as fit and as healthy as a worker, as a man, as someone who didn't belong here but only came in visit. In other words, he wasn't weary like the others, or lacking in life, no, there was some spirit to the man, which had frightened the others. No one dared approach him too sudden, for every step taken alarmed him.

And he would look at you with that strange gaze, as if his two eyes widened and became somewhat globed within the likes which would make them not be held by any living man. He was dreadfully looking through without being aware at whom he was looking at. This man kept rubbing his chin for some reason, as if he was thinking of measuring us every single time he walked around the proximity of our apartments. To say that he was being suspicious or untrustworthy would be as putting it lightly as one could. He was entirely paranoid and devoid of any kind of attempt to intervene on the behalf of decency. Even in the way he held himself and walked around, pushing and trampling the tiniest rat seemed to be degenerate in the way he would stamp its tail as he would prolong its suffering by minutes at a time.

‘Little John.’

That was Callas, one of the younger fellows who had taken a liking to the tiny white rat.

‘You mean mice, don’t you?’

‘No sir, I meant what I said, that had been as big a rat as they came, perhaps something went wrong and a few pints of paint fell over it, but I know better. I tend to remember these kinds of details and I think you’ll find it interesting to know that there wasn’t any apartment which had been painted in the likes.

Not a single one, which made me think, every now and then, how does a rat find himself covered in a coat of white paint if no one even had the initiative of using that white pigment?’

‘Perhaps it was natural then? You could’ve been right, it could be a rat that might’ve gone through some rare condition and turned white.’

‘Well, now that I think about it, that rat had definitely been painted white, there was something about the texture on its fur and if I didn’t come to forget it, some of it landed inside its eyes.’

‘Perhaps it had been brought to your building by someone, or made it there by mistake.’

‘That can’t be either. I’ve seen the types of rats that are bred here. We have a supply of rotten food and bread we kept throwing at the same place and I think I’ve seen him before, you know, before it had become what it had been. I think someone wanted to make a really nasty joke and this is what it turned out to be.’

‘I understand.’

There was something incredibly calm about the man, he had been patient enough as to let it sink in before he went on. While rummaging through the various papers, he came back to that rat.

‘Bottom line is that kid like the rat and he couldn’t really stand looking at the man and how he was pushing it against the tiny animal. It had been well behaved, and for some reason, it had taken a liking to the kids around the eight floor. For them, this had been something close to some guardian spirit, you see?

As long as they fed and cared for the little fellow, well, there would be nothing too wrong and nothing coming and going forth. They would get to stay there as long as little John had been alive.’

‘I presume the rat had been killed by him, by this Fredrick, right?’

‘Right, in front of the children, who were close to begging the man not to do what he was about to do. But I guess that’s how the man was, he wanted to give them a harsh life lesson, ever so young, that no one gets a break, not even a bunch of children in an old place like that.’

The tiny rat’s head had been crushed by a quick sole, and for a reason, the kill had been rather clean. He knew how to use enough force to crush its tiny skull, but not to push it far enough to leave a splatter. I knew there was something wrong with the man, ever since that very moment. Children may have cried for their lost pet, but this, this was a whole new level.

I was the only one there, other than the children, standing at the bar near the stairs. Thought it was dark, I have no idea whether or not he had seen me, but with the way he had carried himself, I’ve got no doubt that he knew that I saw him. Of course, someone had to come later and drag the rat out, though there were no marks of someone having crushed the little one.

Not even on this tail, that man had somehow punctured its tail through some means that he left any mark there either. Either his balance or his weight had been forced out of his boot, but I couldn’t explain how he had done it. Perhaps he might’ve been the one who painted the rat as a way to mock us ever further.

Regardless, I have a reason to believe that it was this man who not only started the fire, but who’s also walking alive and well as a free bird.

‘And you’ve got any proof of it? From what I’ve heard there were a lot of people who died in that fire, would that be correct?’

‘It would be, I believe that more than half of the people there died, either by exhaustion of the lungs caused in the fumes, or by what they saw.’

‘Don’t, wait, this is the case which had been reported.’

‘Yes sir, as some kind of fume induced hallucination caused by the soot and the various toxic substances which had been spread around. That would be right, again, let me be clear, sir, I’ve got no intention to let this man get away.’

He nodded at the fact and seemed to have called himself in. Without a doubt, there was something to him, which couldn’t be bothered as to be explained. He was there, he knew it, not there, present when the fire started, but there, when this event, the hallucination took place. It was way too clear on his face, and he had to take into consideration that this man wasn’t entirely well to do in his head.

The incident wasn't one, oh, there had been others which were at least occurring individually from this one, not to mention that one may as well take a leap there, and call it out. This man had been the criminal whom had committed that act of arson.

'I could see it in his eyes, I swear, even before I had the chance to do anything about it, I swear it was him, there's no way you could pass off a man like that without realizing what he's up to, you know?

And that's not the worst part.'

He leaped forward, much more than expected, near the day of the incident. That's when the reports of those strange marking on the wall appeared, placed on the exact eight page. It could be said, of no wonder that there was something going on in there, through the way he went and by the means he had employed unto himself to look through the various angles.

'They didn't get plenty of these right, it's all wrong. They're all reconstructions, you know? Every single thing here had been made for show, not for something which may even be remotely close to what happened.'

'So what did happen? What do you suppose this Fredrick man's intention had been? Trapping you all inside the building to have a few victims?

Most of you were out at that hour, I'd say only a small minority had been trapped inside it when it happened.'

'That's...that's, there's no denying that's how it went. But don't forget that the great bulk of the ones which died had been the young. In other words, this man had killed the younger generations instead of having the guts to push forward and step up to us. That's the hardest part, I'd say.'

'Say no more, I think I get it. But shouldn't have they taken the signs on the walls as an ill omen? Aren't your folk, rather, superstitious?'

'Indeed they are, I don't deny that either. But we could only brush it off as something which was placed there to make us scared. Everyone knew who the culprit was.'

'And no one said a thing about it, had they?'

'No sir, everyone kept their mouths shut out of fear that they might retaliate against us if we tried anything funny. Him being what he was and use being, well, you figure.'

'I'm sorry, but I may be a bit.'

Gourney pulled at his own sleeve and seemed to look, at otherwise, what seemed to be twice the corner, once up dry. There was a tiny spider at it, dangling from the sides. He knew this couldn't have been a proper way for him to escape this conversation, but he at least came to wager on it.

The man wasn't buying it, he was only waiting as if he had been as mesmerized by him as he had been of the spider. No escape lay in sight.

'Will you please continue, then? I wouldn't want to bother too much with this. I'd like to know why.'

'Because he hated us, because they hated us, because even now, you find a reason to look away and seem not to take me any serious at all.

Can't you see all of this? Can't you believe me?'

Small sings, rounder, red, marks which bore triangles, squares in the middle, first they were placed near each door step, and they only looked like some kind of vile decoration. Afterwards, they got bigger, to the point where they started to encompass entire door frames, the ceiling and everything near sight.

That wasn't the worst detail of it yet, as hard as it could be, you know? Trying to remove paint from wood can get truly nasty, if you know what I mean, but that wasn't it either. I know what you're thinking of now, but no, I don't think it's blood, there's no way it could've been that. As far as I know, I've seen my good share in my life and that wasn't it, at least, I think it wasn't.

Something had been drawn from it, the stickiness which had lain and pushed and dragged forward as soon as it had been touched. It had the feel of some karamine, you know that substance? It was exactly that, a tiny bit discoloured at them. And its crimson aroma and the kind which had lain in it seemed to be cheerfully peculiar to the touch.

It could only be thought off as some means of trying to get your hands through it. Many of its layers already melted at the touch and soon enough, you'd have halls filled with confused men and women who looked at their hands, licking them dirtily, unaware of what was that or what it could mean.

'And you haven't figured that at the time, would that be correct?'

'No, and it had gotten much worse than that.'

As soon as there was some kind of entry to the point, they started looking around, they began yelling and trying to alarm the others about it as well.

'Murder, someone had been murdered, this must be his blood they've drained him off. Who's responsible for it? Who's the murderer? Where's he hiding?'

It was a mere sample which had spread. One echo went down the cage and through the stairs and soon, you'd have folk suddenly slamming in their homes, pushing their children away and dragging forth a little riot. And they knew, and he knew as well what it had been for. Everyone had been aware of him and how much of a stink eye he had given, no wonder he would be so bent on it afterwards.

He hated us and we hated him, It was clear from that point on that it would start. First, there were no knocks, we slammed his door open. There had already been the screams directed towards his wife, Mary. If only I could think of anything less than deserving, I could swear it had been him that moment.

Fredrick stood there, sunk in the middle of the room. Underneath him, the floor had not only been wet, but the linoleum seemed to have peeled off from the war. His sink had been broken, and it was the worst for the looking. Someone had been there before us, someone bent his head against it, and afterwards he dragged him, partially naked to where he laid.

‘So, it was a murder then?’

‘No, the man was alive. As I said, if you had paid attention to what I had said, he’s still live, somewhere out there, probably scratching his head to some big dilled bump, serving as some kind of reminder against whom he was setting himself against.’

‘And what of her?’

‘That Mary? She was nowhere to be seen, of course that didn’t prevent him from shouting or trying to get her, but, you can figure out how disturbing it had been to hear. We weren’t aware who had done it, at least, not then. Whatever other occasion, for which it’s been for, I could only spare the circumstance as I knew them better.’

‘Look, I’m not trying to intrude or anything, I’m curious. Has anyone from that group actually tried helping him?’

‘Oh, I wasn’t there, you see, I was busy doing something else. I only heard of this when it had been much later and by the time I had seen the man again, his head had been wrapped up and he was in a worse a mood, more so than usual.’

Quite convenient that him, of all would happen to be somewhere else, out of all the men who had been there, it couldn’t be conceived to be otherwise. In itself, he was the first to admit it, even though it didn’t happen directly. The back of his head had been roughly stratched, even though he only saw it momentarily from the side, he could guess who the culprit might be.

I think they made it plenty of clear that he wasn’t welcome there any longer and it would only be a matter of time until someone stronger came to break him in. There had been something to the man though, that thing, the resilience which never went away. Even with everyone around him being against him, he still refused to give in.

And there were incidents, I tell you, there were things happening inside that building which could turn your gut on the inside and on the outside as well. You see, no one has ever managed to break those circles despite how thoroughly they had been scrubbed, despite the force which had been used and even with the help of some questionable people, still, they stood there. It had been ridiculous, how wide-spread they got that they'd jump on fingers and on knees, only to stay.

'So they remained?'

'No, they haven't. That's the worst part. One could've accepted it if that were the case. Some vandalism here and there wasn't anything new, but this had got to a whole new level. We should've known, we should've picked up on the signs but we haven't. It's a terrible thing, I tell you. What happened to them, as strangely as it may sound, I think the paint which had been used was alive?'

It moved from the threshold of the stairs and of the door frames, from the ceilings and from the walls, from everywhere at that, to the point where it had intruded our homes and refused to go away. What had been most distracting was the fact that I swear, they glowed through the night, which made it ever so disturbing.

'Still, you haven't reported?'

'Reported what? That a bunch of people had a few circles written off inside their homes? What do you think they might've written it off as? At best, they were one eight spread across a few floors, through and through together.'

'But I thought they were. '

'Hold on now, I may have exaggerated a few, but that doesn't make it any less important. It wasn't as much as how many but a matter of where they had been placed.'

That had been the ordeal, all of them, despite being originally placed in peculiarly chosen spots ended up in the same place in each apartment, in every floor, to the point of making one line, or a scope through each floor, leading to the basement of the building.

It wasn't until the rat appeared again that the children had begun being frightened. They seemed to have taken a liking to it, as I have said, but this wasn't anything to have a liking taken to. First of all, he hadn't come back in a piece.

The first sighting of the rat had been its white head, attached on the back of another rat. Andrew had been the first kid to see him, or see it. Rather, the kid had been brushed off as having had quite the imagination, well, unless you held into account the other kids who surrounded him as well.

'What's that?'

The eight's side of the ceiling, from which a few scraps of the material fell. There were floor boarding which had been stuffed, as to make up for the hollow inside they tried covering up. Through some small hole, there he made his entrance, falling through like some tiny hard and heavy rock, which bounced a bit at he fell on the floor.

'Don't get near him. '

'But I think he's hurt, look, he's, he's.'

A stumble of words couldn't prepare for what had been seen. Perhaps it had been that thickening of the tail, which had been attached to the back of the small white neck which lay on its back. Or that might've been made up by the children, either way, that's what they said they saw. Tiny bones which pushed its legs to the point where this thing bore not the legs of a rat, but some kind of weird, thinned, arched things, which were interconnected on each side.

What had been weird about the two rats now was the fact that their legs had been so peculiarly shaped that they could only walk side-ways. It wasn't even that had to figure out, in their round motion that they wanted to get the children surrounded. Or, it wanted, certainly it would be hard to figure out whether or not that thing had any consideration or any mind of its own, the rat on the bottom.

'I think we're already dwelling a bit too far, aren't we? From moving circles, bashed heads, missing women and now, rats tied together?'

He could only dwell on it as much as he had heard. But what had been so, ever interesting was the fact that it came from children.

'Sir, Gourney, I believe with my honest heart that children cannot lie. I know you may not take this well, but you must understand where I'm coming from.'

An immediate eyebrow had been raised. This man had come up here with a ridiculous story which had been unrelated to anything close to what may have laid in the realms of reality, asking for some kind of help he couldn't provide. He knew this man needed help, a lot of help and he hadn't expected this to proceed in this manner.

What would he do now? Either he would push the man or attempt to listen to his mad stories of pieced rats which came together and left the side.

'How? You're telling me the rat had simply vanished afterwards through one of the holes?'

'It was an old place, you can't expect anything else, can you? It wasn't like it's been intended to end up that way.'

'Can we at least draw the line there and ignore the side of the story coming from a bunch of children? I mean no offense but this isn't something which could be verified. If there's no reputable source to confirm any of the supposed events, I refuse to take any of it into consideration.'

‘Very well then, I have definitive proof of it, if you don’t mind.’

And with a sudden care, he pulled something from a bag and appeared to have gently thrown the head of a white rat onto his table.

‘Have you lost whatever’s in that damned mind of yours? Did you seriously consider taking the head of a rat only to throw into my face?’

What were you thinking? It can’t even be the same damned rat, look, it looks like a fresh kill, your mutthead.’

As the rage subsided, momentarily, there appeared to be a twitch.

Gourney could do nothing but cover his mouth at the sight of it. Something had been ever so clear then, as the man had provided this understanding.

He should’ve known something was wrong with the way in which he interacted with that thing, ever since he brought it in.

‘So what’s the tick here, mister? Did you shove some device inside the head which goes every now and then to shake off the thing?’

‘There’s no trick here, Gourney, this very peculiar rat head I brought with me.’

‘I don’t give up easily, you must know that, I won’t fall for an an easy trick.’

‘Go ahead and do whatever you must do.’

Said the man as he looked at the needle I took out of the small haystack holder I took out of one of my drawers. A few attempts would have to do. If there was a device in there, he would reach the metal end and stop. If not.

There it went, a few needles struck in that rat. He kept pushing it to the point where it looked like one of the late century anatomy charts, which presented variously dissected animals being spread apart. He couldn’t believe how much he had managed to get through without a single flinch or shock out of the device.

Even as he pushed it in the animal’s brain, the very core which sent every signal in every direction, there was nothing there. No small box, no prick, no wire going out, nothing which may keep that thing alive.

‘Now do you get it? Why I said those children couldn’t have lied? Now, if you saw what I saw you wouldn’t have doubted any child, whatever he may tell you. Not with things like that in the world.’

‘But how, this is impossible, it shouldn’t be alive if there’s nothing inside.’

‘My rat head if you could?’

I scrambled as I turned towards it, trying my best not to pull the rat away. With a small napkin, taken from the same drawer, I started picking up every prick which was in there. Little could I tell about what had been going in there, but as much as I had been interested, this was something worthy of my time.

‘I’ll clear my schedule, we’ll talk all day, and we’ll meet as often as possible, everything you need.’

‘Mr. Gourney, you don’t have to change your tune now, this is something personal to me. Don’t turn it into something which may overcome your life as it did mine.

Ever since this incident.’

He said as he picked that head, placing in the small bag he had on him. The thing was that it had been only one of many.

‘What else?’

‘What would that be, sir?’

‘What else did you see there, or heard about? Were there other rats?’

‘No, this own, whatever it had been, let’s say that we eventually found out why that red paint had been so resilient to begin with.’

It had been right away that people were starting to get sick for a reason or another. Not sick in their minds, though there was already some kind of way of knowing that it didn’t wasn’t getting any better.

But those crimson marks couldn’t help themselves, you see? They weren’t marks at all. They were formations made out of tiny patched of red worms, and if anything they had gotten hungry from all the waiting. During the night, they would crawl from across the room and implant themselves into the sleeping old ladies and old folk who stood mostly unprotected.

‘And they didn’t move from those apartments despite those red marks being there?’

‘How could they? Most of them had been unable.’

That thing only caused mostly trouble in the morning, when they had been disturbed. Insomnia, apnea, sudden waking of pain, other sleeping disorders which had taken place only added to the fact that no one found one another any trustworthy than they had been. Red marks around their bodies, but nothing of those worms.

‘By now I supposed no one knew of them, correct?’

‘Not a single soul had crossed the idea that there might be something to it.’

They were simple folk after all. Working all day, a few hours a night of rest and that was mostly their lives, poor folk, simple folk. Dead folk.

In August, twenty first, there came the first man who died. Apparently the cause of death had been a stroke, but hear this:

‘I know I’m not supposed to be in possession of this, but if one wants to get closer to the bottom of this, some rules need to be broken, right? In my case, some laws would have to do.

Here’s the anatomy file, I keep it on me, as a matter of fact, and I keep everything on.’

He showed me his back pack, which had been filled with many files, notes, papers, pictures and everything else he had collected. What was he even thinking now? I should’ve known by the looks of the man that he had looked a bit rustled, with his unwashed clothes and shaken appearance, this man probably didn’t have a place to live any longer.

Both stared and drew up enough information from one another, as if not to ask. Still, even as he had been passed that file, with the murder, he could see something being spared inside his backpack. He was actually carrying something with him, which was plenty disturbing on its own.

‘So this is it.’

‘See what I’m talking about, his heart is missing and every other organ had been scrambled in one direction and another.’

‘And you believe the red worms had done it.’

‘Look at the organs, look carefully. You know, I thought I had lost it with this obsession, but here it were, , look, really close.’

The image was enough to deal a blow to one wicked of heart, but there it was, small rubbing holes inside of them. Red, bloodied, but not from the blood. The file said they had been robbed of it, drained, completely empty, no sign of any entry.

‘How did they get inside?’

‘I’m still trying to get this out. Maybe through one of his ears, or nostrils, or any other bodily entrance.’

And there had also been the moving automatons, twins.

‘You’ll need to slow down a little, I can’t move as easily from this as you may take me.’

‘Listen, they’re connected. I think that’s how he managed to snick the worms inside our buildings. He thought we were dumb, that we wouldn’t find them, but there it was.

That might’ve sounded downright taken, as if he would be seen like some bottle-presser than a man with a sense of his own. But, there were pictures of those things as well and it looked rather close to them being down-right made with some craftsmanship. Not the kind a master would have gotten, but it bore the appearance of something tribal.

‘Do you have any idea where it might’ve been taken from?’

‘I could only guess myself, but I think they were brought here, from somewhere around the African Subcontinent, as a mean of controlling the population. See?’

Of course there were some vague sketches and some weird journals which seemed to define those things with some peculiar means of operation, but those tiny red worms appeared to be drawn by their skin. They acted like some carriers, breeding grounds.

Even a patent laid inside, which mean this man had taken the time to, not only find himself into a position where he could closely get into contact with the statue but also have his hands have a got at either of them.

‘By the time I had managed to open one of them and carve them up, it was obvious that there wasn’t anything left inside of them. Look, I wasn’t planning to disturb your work or interrupt you by any means, but this thing had been brought into my building for that sole reason which had been tied to him pushing us around and everything else that happened around there.

See the inside of the belly? One of the automatons had been empty, but at the very bottom of it, they left some rotten wood. With its pigmentation out of the way, the woodish brown aside, there had been rotten red marks all over.

I think they didn’t have anything else to eat and they began trying to eat one another or whatever they could get their tiny mouths at.’

I took a moment then, to force him to slow down a moment. Not because my interest slowed down but because there wasn’t anything else I could be forced to do but proceed with it.

‘Catherine, could you clear the rest of my schedule for today?

Be a good dear and make sure everyone’s called. We’ll reappoint them some other day, all right?’

‘Right away sir, and, sir, should I simply.’

‘Close the door, thank you Catherine. You’re a gift given from above.’

He had no interest in what laid there. Such a twisted half they lived, moving, or being moved as to avoid what was going on. Half-the-side of their weird concoction of a town had been made out of solidified springs of metal. Every tiny spray appeared to have formed some kind of alternative way of holding such an incredible weight that it would have to content with the fact that there was something to it which kept it moving at all times.

As long as no man saw what was outside town, from within their noses, eyes were partially blinded by the atmosphere in which air had forced some kind of slight crushing of the lungs, only so it would prevent nothing other than the full development of their eyes.

That hadn’t been the only cause, as apparently, there was this out of the ordinary peculiar grin of misalignment, which kept the cities high above the ground. Yet they moved, or had been moved by the constantly rotating plane of shattered dirt holes which pushed one another as they intersected. Somehow the springs of metal had pierced through them and had formed giant legs which held the towns moving at all time. It was a unison which couldn’t have been gathered by any sight at all.

Tiny air molecules had been struck in those twisted springs, the many swimming metal wings which pushed in every side now appeared to be anything but fright inducing for the men who had died. Through the sewage system, the dying, not the dead, would be slowly moved and pushed until they’d end up being half-submerged through those springs.

And they would swim through some kind of filthy metallic water which could only make it so they seemed weary of the time they would be there. It couldn’t be conceived that by the end of this, either they would add to the bulk of the pillars which kept the cities above the disintegrated ground, or if they had been lead down there, where no sight could behold what was had been inside.

One could wager and be no stranger to such a world as it’d be damning. There, somewhere in enough space and enough of a twist, there was a small rounded, plane for one or two bodies to stay. At least three more were still alive.

Carrions and vultures appeared to have made nests around everywhere. Such a sight would be nothing but cruel to one who were to throw a glance. No one dared make too much noise or move too sudden out of fear that they might attract them near.

It was depressive, to see and look upon the high ceiling, darkened by the fact that every leg pushed inside. Suddenly a body would fall and not even get to go through one of the leg-tunnels, but be completely picked apart bit huge carrions, grub-scarabs which would be thrown from one side to the other as a means of breaking it apart before it fell down there.

Everyone depended on the system. Whatever it may be, they would have to wait.

‘Food, there’s food, here. Legs, raw meat, look.’

One of the old-men who looked malnourished from the back side of his lower torso only pushed himself to the place where he grew nearer. He hadn’t stretched, but felt like he had suddenly pulled the whole mass of his behind into some large and wide pocket which allowed his other side to grow, looking more youthful than he had ever seemed to be. From the way he had appeared to be, though he had looked pitiful from behind, now he looked like he was young and beautiful on one side.

‘You don’t have to worry for yourselves, my dear friends. I shall cook these for you and make sure everyone will be well fed.’

He gave a smile which made the others, who weren’t as fortunate as he was to take on such an appearance and youthful strength feel well. They couldn’t explain what it was they desired so much, even less than that. But the other corpses around only seemed to bicker as if not spoken to.

‘Well, well, you won’t have to tell me a thing. I shall make sure that once everyone else is properly fed, that you’ll be taken care of and be groomed. Within my expectations, I know you to be of my kin so I shall make sure you’ll be branded, cleaned and made so you’d look in awe.

Please, make it so you can abide yourselves to this and not look into any other way which may matter.’

They were all distraught by the fact that there wasn’t a single way of knowing if they could make it through in one piece. Many of those large vulture propagandists seemed to be flying over, harmlessly aware of the very misinformation they spread around.

See, they weren’t real but acted as some kind of decoys born out of the constant paranoia and fear of their lives they felt upon being stranded there in the middle of nowhere. No one could even bother to read on the conundrum they were set it, especially that one who had taken upon himself to take care of them. Less than it would’ve been expected, there could be some kind of interruption which may be had.

Once or twice, with little in mind of the frightening stares which had been had over the stranded birds of prey, those malnourished looked open-minded. It wasn’t that often that they would get to see what those malignant vultures looked like. And since they stopped mid-air, it’s been confirmed that they were nothing of the light. Or it was, but not entirely.

Only in part, had they been like that, with their bellies being much fuller, to the very point where they were too broad to be unworthily sustained by the system of flight they bore. No consideration could be had, at least not without daring to think of anything of the diseased mind there was there. Those wings fell and hadn’t flapped, but nothing bled.

With the fall of decay, they understood why those vultures had acted like some kind of decoy-kind of fright-spreader being. Inside of them, they bore the likes of many children which had all been kept inside pocket of membranes which made it so they would be protected. Without a doubt, it couldn't have been denied that there would be something to this very fact which tainted and brought something extremely unnerving to the table, since it didn't seem to be anything but natural.

It had been part of their anatomy, that sudden release of its mind and head. But for what reason, other than to facilitate the escape of the release of its children, the starved mind couldn't think of it. Perhaps that had been the way it had been overanalyzing every passing creature.

One of the nests, a bid farther away, in the secluded area which reigned between the top entryway between the giant legs and the top of the city, laid one of the nests. A gathering was held. Carefully secluded so it may not be seen, it had been made quaintly clear that there was something to it. No man could go ahead and look forward and be less of a stranger to the means of being told what was going on.

He held himself high to the point of staring at his brethren. These strange vultures which were no vultures at all but poorly resembled the animals, which those men had associated them with inside their minds. They were reluctant to begin whatever that had been.

A kind of observation, which could not be thought as anything else but a way for them to take each one for themselves. Heavy as they seemed to be, those wings didn't act like they were supposed to be, having had to deal with a heaviness which couldn't be denied the likes, appeared likely to have stores inside of them air, between the walls of their flapping bottoms and the feather-like prodding teeth they bore.

Those teeth had holes in them which forced them to eat air molecules and regurgitate them into their wing stomachs, being as well what kept them floating and alive. Not only had they been kept by it but it seemed like they had been at a constant risk of having suffered of the air diseased.

See, those teeth could be forced into drawing in pieces of the nervous system, dumping down the flying vultures and coming off like tooth-parasites, falling off, unable to survive on their own. In cases like that, where they would happen in clusters, there would be some kind of immediate repercussion which was had.

Many of them would fly in flocks as they would appear to be startled by the fact, with one of their own having fallen down, bloated in the head as those marking teeth tried to go back inwardly to the point where they made their way to the central system, which they alone would've invaded. Inside that brain they would outgrow their shells but not in any kind of redeeming way.

It would look that in such a case, the brain would've been greedily forced to grow inside small shells, doing more damage than it should've done. And in that point, those who hadn't ripped themselves off had received the equivalent of some brain-injury forced obstruction of the mind which instead killed everyone attached to the body. But such cases were rare.

Other cases had been sad, for, if this happened to one who bore children, the results would've been rather mad and unnerving for the mind. No one could deal with such a blow, not to the unknown selves which forced themselves on them.

Oh what a pity, it might've been for one to suffer such insolence as it's been had. They all gathered at that, going over some tension which could be had. That risk hadn't happened here as of yet and suddenly it had begun. As long as the head came first and wasn't attached to those feathers and their nasty unwashed swarm-like tiny hairs, there would be no risk that they would immediately die off. No, not a single chance.

The wings followed and suddenly its children had been given escape. An immediate rabid interest came in those who observed and looked for the strongest of that vile pack. Each of them had begun eating from inside their parent, never stopping, ever-watching, then.

'Gourney, what were you thinking off? You've been staring out of the window for the past few minutes.'

'Nothing, I wasn't thinking of anything. Perhaps something distant but that's about it.'

Gourney looked as a small figure he kept on his desk. Its eyes had been thoroughly chewed by a rabid dog which used to come around his area. It was something he thought about more now than often. Thought like these often occurred to him when he was given free reign to reflect upon it.

But if there was something which connected with him as that point was this. He had come into contact with the dog then, that's how he picked up on the small wooden figure he now owned. Whoever he may have taken it from was little if not entirely his concern at all. What else could he ask this man about if not it?

'How did this Fredrick come into contact with those statues then? How did he manage to get them inside unnoticed?

You didn't make a solid case on his being a wealthy enough person to facilitate the purchase and delivery of those things, especially from such a long distance, as from one continent to another.'

'I may not be able to fully answer this, but I always suspected he wasn't entirely what he claimed to be. At least, he must've had help, some kind of help, if he was to succeed getting through his stay in one piece.

His temper always got him in trouble with the folk and it was obvious that he couldn't control it by no means whatsoever.'

'So it got worse.'

‘Indeed it had. The worms there had been put all on him, nothing more. It wasn’t even clear and it didn’t have to matter for him to be responsible for it. Everyone knew he’d be the one forced to answer for what’s been going on there.’

Broken pipes, doors bashed throughout the night, light left open, more of those scum-worms moving around the area during late hours only to return to their chosen place before the light of day would come. It was getting on people’s nerves already. That thing inside your chest which keeps popping and needs to remind you that things could be better, something wrong, you need to get out.

‘Then you should’ve left.’

‘And I would’ve missed it. The day of the fire, in which I should’ve been on of the dead men inside that grave. But I wasn’t, and instead, they had.’

It wasn’t only the circles, but the basement as well. There had been an accumulation of wide-spread dust clouds which had rendered entry and passage through it impossible. It couldn’t even be taken into consideration, for as long as one were to stay inside of it without any protection, he would be at risk of getting that nasty lung disease which spread.

‘That’s on him as well?’

‘I wouldn’t put it past him, though the circumstances of the appearance of those fumes had been rather curiously strange as well.’

It was undeniable that something was hidden in them as well, something highly flammable which had helped it spread across the base and filaments of the building. They spread through the frames, like small and tiny servants for those worms.

By some unnatural way, they were given orders by them, that’s why I think it wasn’t fumes down there alone. And they didn’t spread on both sides and both wings of the building, they only wanted that side to be completely engulfed by flames.

‘So as soon as you discovered it, has no one made any attempt to remove or clean that basement? No help, no assistance? Nothing? Was it simply allowed to happen?’

‘We couldn’t do anything. Most of us had already been disturbed, you know?’

‘Something of this kind is rather dangerous if left unwatched, so, anyone else there would’ve at least tried doing anything.’

‘Neither of us had, and I’m sorry to say, I was indisposed at the time to act.’

Another thing wrong, four in the afternoon. First body came into the light. She had been named Ophelia.

A lady in her late fifties, caught by them, in a most repulsive manner. It had been the first time I have managed to see how they act, how they would react in pacts.

This is the reason why I have come to assume those dust fumes worked under the command of those worms or of Frederick. Either one would've made for a perfect explanation if only I could make it through to one shot.

I carried a revolver those days and I know I wasn't supposed to carry one. They're banned for us, you know? But that didn't prevent me from reaching out.

She hadn't been dead apparently by the time I had stumbled on the corridor and saw the end of her door opened. If anything, at the end of the staircase, there was a young girl, standing with her small bear wrapped around her arms.

That had been her mother and she seemed clever enough to sit there teary-eyed. I kind of understood what she saw there and why she left the room. I could only nod to her as I made my way inside the room slowly.

as thought, it couldn't have been anything but worse to the smell, for the scent had me choking for the first few seconds.

'That couldn't have been good for your lungs.'

'It wasn't. It still isn't.'

'You're suffering of.'

He could only nod and carry on with it. That explained why he looked rather distant and frail at times, except in the moments when he was trying to get to his recollections of what was going on inside his building.

But it hadn't been easy to stay focused in there. Not when they appeared again. This time there wasn't any animal attached to them, but a pair of springs, tied to some scissor-shaped long needles came as if from the corner of the room. It looked like it had been part of the very ceiling, merely having escape for itself while looking for a host.

How many of them had there been inside of the place? how did they all manage to mobilize in such a manner?

It couldn't be conceived at all. Those tiny scraps of metal which had formed could only be seen as they were acting akin to sewing devices. What I had previously seen before hand hadn't been legs at all but the very device which had sewed the two rats together. Now, it was only looking for the two of us, and as I came to turn around I hear the door crick.

Someone had locked the door behind me and I only had need of a few guesses to know who it had been. Now, I don't know what he promised or told the girl, but she had no shame as she made her way towards closing me inside that room. It was for the better that she hadn't shown her face after, as I would've made sure to push her face in if we met again.

'Don't you think that's kind of harsh for child?'

'I think that's mild in comparison with what I thought of doing to her after. You'll have gone on me on this on, my instincts, you see, would've made me do much worse to her.'

'What happened in that room?'

There was little to be told of the even. He came there with this personal investigation, yet he was reluctant to ask for any kind of specific help. One would think he was only in it for something, though I dare not push the stroke of luck to dig deeper.

Whatever happened in that room, between the two of them had been his concern and his alone? He chose not to say a word in the matter.

But, by the looks of it, he couldn't help himself then. There was as little control over his impulsive nature as there could've been and as soon as he saw that device sharpening itself against the frame and the edge of the ceiling, he pulled out his revolver and shot at it. His eyes were somewhat bleak and red, his lips chapped from a previous bit he had before coming to the room.

between the woman who had been accosted by what seemed to be a small gathering of the dust and the worms and the device, there's been nothing which would follow through. Nothing scarped that small device.

'Damn you Fredrick, with your filthy machines, break, break!'

The hole it had come from, there were other devices like he had seen walking inside the room. He must've worked it out from some pattern or he made or something. But that device was properly making its way, leaving pin marks all over the walls on the track it had made.

I started wondering, could they see me? So far they only walked in straight directions across the walls but I swear I hear the children say they had possessed the body of the rats. It couldn't have been my mind working it now; those things had been sending there for me. Though my body may not have been that of a rat, I had little doubt that those things would've forced themselves on me in order to do some irreparable damage no man would have to face.

'I'll tell you this, Gourney. What I have come out of the room with had been something which had grown on my leg. And that thing, let me tell you spread. Quickly. No amount of washing, scraping, pushing away removed them.

They buried themselves inside my leg, like some rash or some kind of mites. I had to run to my room in order to do something I don't regret doing. A piece of my skin had to be cut off, there was simply no way of getting rid of it.

Don't mind me with that, for I'll have known it by the time I was done cutting.'

With a piece of cloth inside my mouth, there had been little noise inside the neighbor might have heard.

'But they had to have heard the shots. I was in pain, rather dulled by the sweat, forced to a limp to the same room. There was nothing in there, only her. She hadn't disappeared. But the room looked normal to me.'

Gourney was rather confused by what happened in the short time this man had been locked inside his room. There couldn't have been a thing pushing through him, not now, not for the likes of wanting to care. He had been stripped of any kind of desire of knowing what had been going on there.

By his hand stood a bottle of booze he had picked up on his way. For a few minutes he stared, between the room and the hallway. It hadn't been closed on the way out, now he even wondered if it had been closed at all.

Though those small devices had been there, and he had a way to see it. See, though he may have been struck by some fever-dream, he managed to drink a good two ounce off it immediately. But he saw it, exactly how small those worms and how tiny those mites had been. They crawled through the pin holes which had been made out of those devices.

And it made sense in some way, as the metal hadn't been anything but colored in some dark hue. Well, to say the least, it appeared like there had been something to it. Some trinkets to the statues he had brought here. One check would properly confirm if only he had done quick enough, before someone caught on the fact that he was standing in the same room with a body.

He would have to deal with the fact that the girl had seen it all, and that wasn't right. As long as it happened, he couldn't have helped it in the least. If there was something to it, one would have to wonder, who had the girl sold her young soul to.

A meeting cancelled after two. It had been strange, seeing how time went so slow when he was busy. For each moment or expanded on minute, there was some kind of extension in which he could only watch.

Far into the distance, there were still chains, tied to out-grasp for planes. They bore no pilots and appeared likely to have been set together as if to carry on something kind of important heavy load. Gourney turned towards the window to look at them go up there. It helped him pass off the time and think about it. Before anything could be done about it, there was some kind of deduction to be had there.

In some sudden woe to this man, he raised a hand. He wanted to think about how ridiculous this story had sounded. Would he entertain the man for six more hours? Certainly he couldn't sit here to listen to what would only be the hallucinatory episode of a man who had been caught in the fire.

Though there was still the problem with that rat, which had shocked him at least for the time being. He couldn't explain it, and he had pricked that head with his needle at least a few times. Without a sudden reaction, that had been it. A dreadful arrogance could only last for so much longer than it had been.

Plenty of shocks lay there in the sky alone. Moving objects, small glowing lights, and the end of life.

But Gourney turned as he had decided he would entertain the man a little longer. If anything, this had been an interesting conversation he could share with his colleagues, even if it wasn't real. This delusional man seemed harmless enough in any case.

'Did you confront this Fredrick then? I would expect you to have at least considered trying to get into contact with him after this incident.'

To not add that he most likely would've done something much worse than that. It could be thought of less than being something to be spared off and more so of some vile descent into the likes of that complex. It wasn't easy for him after that point, dragging him, limping, moving with an empty bottle.

The first thought which came into his mind was that he would smash that bottle into someone's head, likened to some kind of awareness that only ended up nearing to it. He would crush it, smash it, and break his legs.

'That man shouldn't have lived after what happened to me and I was sure that I was going to kill him right then.'

'Without trying to have him explain himself? Did you at least have any proof that he was the one responsible for it?'

'I didn't need any proof anymore. I had everything I ever needed on me. Don't let me show anything less of the kind, for I could've had him then.'

If only he had been there in the first place. But he wasn't there. The man had been missing from his room, from his place. I know that because I broke into his house. There weren't any rounds left in my revolver, as it was already hard to get them as they were, with everything being taken into consideration.

Now, a few things about his room, I expected something to be there. Anything, from a patch of worms, of those dust-things or even, even something close to...

I couldn't take my mind away from it. There was something Gourney didn't have to know. Before he had come to his senses, he forgot that he left that woman there. That old woman had still been alive. It wasn't something he had thought off until then, but the shame had been flabbergasting. Upon the time he had entered the room and in-between his chance of escape or that through which he had gotten himself through, he forgot all about her.

Uncertain whether she had died of her body exposure, he couldn't face the fact that he left her there. But Fredrick, and her, the man, the lady, the one cause the problem. No, he could only focus on his so far, it had to have been him.

It was for him to do something unforgivable. This time he would make the damage be permanent, no exception, without a doubt and in no way would he forgive the man.

‘So he wasn’t there.’

Well either way, it had been irrelevant. If one were to push ever so much forth, he would’ve found out that this sounded all too familiar. He wasn’t there, this man wasn’t there, somewhere, along the way, and he must’ve gone out.

‘But if one thing, I found his Mary after I trashed his entire place. I still don’t know what to make out of it. Either he had lost his mind or this man had hidden somewhere she shouldn’t have been.’

It wasn’t much, but he found her picture, a sea-eyed beauty dressed in white, who had her hands wrapped around their child. If there had been a moment to show him any kind of empathy towards the man that had been it. Though I could simply not glance over everything this man had ever done to us and I threw his tiny idol on the ground.

Poor fool should’ve known better than to come here amongst us. Now he would pay for everything he’d done. Yet again, not a single word to Gourney, he had only to know that this man was missing, and no less than that.

‘Well, do what you want with it. If that man is out there, I won’t want intervene.’

Though Gourney could only let it out like some kind of muffled nervous mutter. He had little more of an idea if he was serious about trying to hunt the man, after all, this man who stood in front of him had been rather, broken. At the time he had stepped into his office, he had limped and took his time to enter.

He didn’t know whether to feel any pity for the man or deny him that. One would be inclined to think this man could approach the status of being deranged, with how he acted and how tension had come into play there. First that, then this, there had been an entry as well then. He couldn’t think of it as anything less than what it had been a man’s attempt to get some attention.

It had been clear ever since the start that this man wasn’t right in the head and this little fact only confirmed it. He at least tried reasoning with the man, and offered him to take him wherever he needed to go, but this had been met by some reluctance and some discovery in them. No man had ever encountered such an event, like that of which he had described and got out in one piece of the mind.

For that reason, Gourney doubted that this man would be right in the head if he ever went through with hunting that man.

‘Should I schedule you sometimes this week or the next one? I don’t like giving up on my clients you know.’

‘Don’t worry, I know where to find you.’

‘That’s not what I meant, I have other people coming here on set dates, and it’s not as easy as barging in and making demands.’

‘It’ll be fine, I know you won’t be able to refuse me, Mr. Gourney.’

With the slam of the door, he simply left. There hadn’t even been any kind of mark left on the brass knuckle around the door handle. He hadn’t even pulled it properly in order to set it in place. What a strange man, with a strange coat and now he left.

Without even giving his farewell, the man even took those old case files with him without even asking if that were right. One would be peeved by this if it weren’t for that very fact that he had bought himself a few good hours.

‘Catherine, would you mind coming on to take a coffee with me? I would seem to have forgotten my manners then, but it seems like we have a good few hours now. Would you like to accompany me and have diner?’

‘Certainly sir, might I add that you made a great choice in clearing your appointments for today?’

She could only wink her dark eyes in excitement and flicker a brow as her straight locks went to work. The two of them were gone out of the office forty minutes later.

Without the proper work of legs they stood out there, spread and flying. Many of their bodies had united and scouted the ground work which stood under placement of the legs. Their needs made out of slippery skin seemed to be holding their frail bodies together in some sort of peculiar bondage bred out of the flying device they had made.

It seemed like these men who had one gone through the process of malnourishment had become clever in their technique and craftsmanship of tools. Every single one of them would go ahead and grab a hold of small sticks and nets and other things which may have been thrown by the citizens of the city. And it wasn’t a coincidence that all of their trash had somewhat come there, right above the holes below.

One couldn’t help but imagine the heaps of trash and the mountains made out of them, below and out of reach of that place and more importantly, the life which would develop there. For, no living thing had a desire to live in a desecrated holes, one which had only been permitted sight at some intervals of time, from which light would only come unasked for.

And every now and then, they would be looked by the most naive faces which only looked like some kind of distracted and dumbfounded gazes no man should’ve been met with.

There were drips coming out of that ugly and disturbed face but without a doubt, it couldn’t have been held accountable by no means. Something disturbing had happened, there would be no explanation for the kind of desire this half-form had upon seeing the one who had descended on the hindered eaten leg. It wasn’t like there could’ve been any desire to have known what was going on.

No cruelty could be spared. No one dared. They were hunting through the planes in the air, actively avoiding the falling debris which found it daring them with every movement and every strike. It couldn't be denied that there was an unconscious desire to eat as much as they could. For far too long they had been starved and in a moment there, one of the vulture beings had been trapped.

Small strings came from inside their fingers. It had been hard and painful, trying to dig up in the very area where their bones and meat had met. But through them, they pushed and seemed to push ahead, until nothing had been to it, without a heed to go through it, they could only reveal how deep they went.

Upon trapping the vulture, many of them had lost fingers in the struggle. They wouldn't get to hunt again afterwards. And not only that, but they had been dragged down by the wait and the constant shaking it bore, for this one had been carrying one of its offspring inside, or at least one it had taken.

The parties had been caught in that dreadful fight and actual flight, through which one could be the victor. Since they couldn't communicate through their mouths, it had been revealed that their only way, which had remained was the fact that there would be nothing to heed again. For that, they would look through the holes and the broken wings in the flying vulture-like emissary like some rabid animals, starving for a bite.

With a shimmer of communication which had been done solely through their eyes, they managed to steer the flying bird into the metal podium tied to the very leg they had been about to land on.

Its head had twisted from the high turbulence and as it drew near to the base of the metal leg, its neck had been popped in its socket and shot through the opposite direction, missing their living-glider by mere inches. Within their grasp, on that platform lay some kind of disturbing meal.

With their perforated mouth beaks, they revealed how many pairs of reeling teeth they had pushed inside of those bodies, shoving in deeper while searching for a way deeper in. Some organs inside those tiny offspring appeared to be acting up. Their high small strips started unfolding at those teeth came into contact with them.

Immediately, they would get to be forced into some kind of vileness of the eye. Inside of them, the mass of their pupils had grown to a normal size. Now those creeps would be blind no longer. A strange vitality had overcome them as soon as they had devoured the children, beckoning their mad return.

But farther away, in that sunken place, there seemed to be a turn which may not be seen kindly. From the base of it, something had appeared to be about straddles from within. That place seemed to have communicated, resonated with another similar way below, somewhere in the past.

Those vile black pools communicated inter-dimensionally without any affect of space or time. A certain determination seemed to be there as the half-formed tower seemed to be brought there. But such a transition had been stopped from within before it could have taken place.

Immediately, as this catastrophe could happen, the great ending from below had to be sealed. The tower stopped half-forming and it appeared like its insides had remained revealed. It had not been formed of shell but the kind of flesh and organs lay inside belonging to a man. Such a creature couldn't be conceived off by any means, it couldn't be embraced, unloved, uncared for.

One of the vessel had stopped, as they had all formed the great system of inter-universal communication. By the time they had realized that the same cataclysm, the great schism could happen, the hole and the bile of that planet, upon which the legs had been set, started sealing itself. Many great abominations of living creatures gauntly formed like worms, with the faces of human beings, beaked, many legged, formed with inter-connections between them, but most importantly dead started appearing and being stacked upon one another.

They would act like disease carriers, only so nothing may live below, only the insects which carried their pestilence inside. This madness could help itself as to seal the wound of the earth.

But one creature had observed. As it was still looked down upon by that one face, it had come to realize that it would die there without a chance to escape. Something had to be done in order for it to escape. Without a chance of protesting the happening of the coming corruption, the vile had appeared in their veins.

Filthy mongrels of the depths, oh, vile in kind, managed to awaken themselves by the mere virus which had been forced inside of them. Every single one of them had been alarmed of that single one creature which would attempt its escape. That mad one had climbed on a pile of trash, going forward as to push through the heap of the vile.

It would crash itself and see itself near the arrogance of the likes of man. But they would swear to serve him and protect him from any kind of malignance which may be.

Fear ran in its wicked eyes, as suddenly it found itself leaping from the pile and growing small appendages to climb on the leg. Of course they wouldn't stay, they couldn't, as no vile approach and no dark would come through afterwards.

So much harder had it been to watch, after seeing so many bodies form, sprouting from one another, the likes of which could never be thanked off. Even the partially formed towers had fallen prey, as from their insides, those creeping bodies pushed and yanked, and seemed to glance at it in their short-lived living stance. From the sight of the unknown, this creature had escaped in the midst of a second, in time.

No more would it be deceived by the likes, not a single second about them. Would there be something to be looked upon by them? Without a doubt, they seemed to be vile, for their likes alone couldn't have been deceived.

The growth of the many mongrel forms stopped there, at the end of their holes. And yet that wouldn't be the end of them, as they opened their dead mouths in an attempt to store the heaps of malign decay which fell from atop the city. Inside them, as far inside as it would go, there lay acid, of the bitterest kind.

One slip and this mad being wouldn't be alive any longer. And there in the light, it had revealed its full body, fat, and filled with lumps. Legs keep falling away but it kept growing them. For what had been worth, it hadn't had a face of its own, but it had taken, in the likes of an imitation, the appearance of the first face it had seen.

Not a single worth of it had there been shown. This thing wasn't human, neither of them were. But it had joined this malnourished creature there, after its struggles had been over. No more could it have become clear that there was something to it. The two of them stood there, sharing what seemed to be one of those flying vultures which had been set aside.

Apparently, it had managed to bash its own head in the likes of a metal wall against which it stood about. No appearance and no woe could it had been, no disgrace and no emotion shown so far. Both of them simply stared peculiarly at one another. Their meal had arrived, and it looked like it had been battered up quite well. Not only would they begin feasting while taking their time to remove all of the impurities inside of it, but there hadn't been any other need to be had. It wasn't even close to being what they had seen, that the various insides started crawling in an attempt to get away.

A sapient of its own roundness came to show itself popping out, a parasitic compressor which had a small metal device implanted in its head, with a cruel way of trying to snatch one of the various off springs, it leapt and started pushing through the back of its head. With little in mind, for its own kind had been what it had looked like inside. An insidious remark came over this wrathless shriek which came as soon as it had opened itself up.

Without a doubt, little could be told and foretold about the magnificence of the skin it had displayed. Soon, the device had entered the offspring and let out a shock. Both the malnourished and this other, who may not have a kind or way of his own looked at it. A few steps away and it would've freed itself from that.

But only the device managed to fling itself past capture. They had stared in a determined glaze to get through the madness of hope. It could only be that they would be paranoid now, pushed through and drowned through the veils of the air. The sphere through which one may normally breathe inside of had been cut off as the invisible air tubs which had lain there seemed to have been restricted by the new division which happened below.

Those mad interlopers, the corpses down there managed to pollute the tubes with their own essence to the point where pieces of themselves manifested in the air. Of course they couldn't possibly exist in there, instead, it looked like there was some kind of dread to be had. The dead never liked their own kind. Within the toxic ranger of a few feet, those small globes of meat tried expanding as they levitated, drawing into the air, pushing through the limit of their own extension.

And their puffs had been controlled, as they hadn't been destroyed. No, despite having looked that way, what happened was that they extended to such an extent that they had become completely transparent. All of that space which could be seen, surrounded by the gas was actually nothing more but the inside of a pocket made from the bodies of those sudden apparitions. To the extent of watching and of pushing through, they would be dreadful in the way they had been looked at.

One mouth formed inside and it had laughed at the others. Its chin had been pointed, the way up the tip of the nose dotted, and it looked like it had only stretched as far as to leave something in its behind. With the woe of a desire, the likes of some dependency lasted for as long as it would. That thing needed the insides of its own cage, of its own extended body.

Soon, there had been signs that it would give in. And as that happened, as its cage started being protruded by its own self, pushing forth, then inwardly, it so happened that it would begin choking. Its inaudible laughs were no longer heard and in there, now, it suffocated. Slowly, it had come to be, the likes of which one may never see. The light of day had been missing, to the point of pushing and drawing it towards the night.

By the time the stars had shown their growth, there remained the mouths, many of which had been formed and abandoned. They floated as their insides had been thinned to such molecular levels as to never reveal anything of any kind. Small holes lay everywhere through them, pushing through air, until there was nothing to be had in there.

A jockey's hit, a small rock landed on it. As one of the braver men of malnourished kind had been way too bored to sit and hide, he threw it against one of those targets. It had been largely unprotected, as it penetrated its skin way too easily. Its yellow-turpentine texture and overly fattened teeth, which had become that way from the continuous exposure had drawn down and pushed it down.

It would only be for their likes alone that they would suffer that way, eaten by their own. Of course those mindless compactors, those who served only as means to drown the bodies in acid couldn't have been that way. A decisive blow had been dealt through the small tip of the tongue, which had killed another mouth before it could even come in contact with itself.

But if there had been a more important thing, after that flying creature had been killed, the two companions stood watching, not at the patches above, which had been the separations between the two cities, through which they may look and bear themselves through. And it wasn't for their likes to be told, of unruly help, and many such desires as had been.

Though that lumped struggle of many packs of whitely-placed bodies of pale meat had desired to know what was up there. Leading not only through the bottom of the city but through everything. The malnourished man could only weep as it hadn't the strength to undergo the journey. It hadn't that change which the other one had, it couldn't become young as it would only be frail for the rest of his life.

His faced crumpled from the lack of any sustenance, to having so many clamps of skin and many mazes within the lack of pancreatic thinned tails he had developed. There had been a sudden set of mutations caused by stress. Many of those tails weren't supposed to be there, nor were its bones supposed to be shaped in such a manner.

It was disturbing for as long as they could drag themselves over, a shimmer of life remained. Those who lived down there only suffered on the spares before something better came along. And in the city life had been grand.

From both sides of the streets, the buildings threatened to reach the sky within their magnificence and their much beloved grandeur. Not a single thing seemed to be happening there, with every man having lived a relatively decent life around it. No one outcrosses town, no one saw what there had been outside.

Most importantly, it looked like nature had taken over in the distance. Mountains laid there forlorn, forests surrounding them, the floors stood placed as if there were new ventures to be explored. But in a corner of the city, one dark man came into his place of hiding. He had brought for himself a small box of tiny construction materials, plane parts, a small emporium battery and seemingly plenty of living material to work on.

He had been caught into a trap of immorality and despair. It wouldn't be fair for him to think it otherwise, as he had seen himself like some man of grand stature.

'Bring me the extenders, I need to connect the battery to the main source. We shall revive it, if not give birth to the grandest of them all.'

His servants weren't living. They had been flawed, piston pumping small-headed clotted fools which bored themselves inside wheel chaired walkers. As a matter of being, he had made a single cut at the middle so he could facilitate some kind of forceful balance to be employed by them. Otherwise they would be set back by stairs and other kind of similar impediments.

For the time being, what kept them working had been a small black box which recorded and played some kind of animated recording which showed their master going through the steps with them, holding their bodies as they walked on each step. It was incredible how easily a savant could do if he had put his mind to it.

Plenty of people knew of him, this stranger, and this actor who had snicked inside his locked room. And it was hard to break through the various locks he had designed. Forty attempted forced entries that month alone. One would have to give it to him that then, there'd be nothing more to spare but the need to block each and every entry he could and rework them all over again.

He prized himself a locksmith as well as a creator. But those devices were of little interest to him. At best, his servants were part living, bearing their bloated bodies of pig and ostrich meat tied to the bottom of machines, going on their wheels, pumping at the bottom while they were powered by small batteries.

It was kind of limited, their functionality, since they only had tiny metal arms which had been banded together. So much so had they been taken for granted that they pulled everything which had to be stored in the small pocket whole they bore in their chests. No more would he be frightened by their mad appeal.

As in the past they had become aggressive. They had shown signs of developing personalities and they hadn't been liked at all. More than dreadful as it had been, there was only something to be had there. The need to draw oneself as far away from the sight it bore, before paranoia stroke in.

I swear, I have removed their brains. But why have I combined them in the past? What went through my head?

When he'd happen to hear some unquestionable sounds from one occasion or another, he'd start to wonder and question whether or not he had lobotomized every single one of them or had missed one. But this computer of this, his creation had to take precedence. He would program small pieces of meat in order to create beings out of them.

And he would brainwash this new life form into being programmable. That had been his dream, to create perfect living computers, and their likes would be enabled to pilot the planes as they would be set for an invasion.

His house hadn't been comfortably placed or set for the likings of guests. No, it had been re-appropriated as a bunker. There'd be nothing to last for far too long. Much less the fact that there were plenty of other projects waiting in the same room. So many things rested there unfelt and unlooked for.

Misappropriated parts lay as they were hanged or kept in the air by hooks. Those creations of him, the winged menaces which had been made to carry small grain sacks didn't work properly. It was obvious that they had too many wings attached, eight of them, which were shaped to take on the appearance of cockroach implants.

It had been a failure of the most extreme kind of experimentation. Luckily, it had never left his laboratory, even though he feared it. Something moved inside of it. He had always found it a bad choice that he had taken, to look upon in this way, that he had implanted cockroach eggs inside the grains. They would be shocked inside their heads in order to create a unity or a roach hive-mind, which would in turn help the machine be given life. Of course it wouldn't work. It couldn't and it hadn't.

Instead, he would be constantly be distracted by the movement inside the grain sack. And every single day, that sack appeared to have grown to some mild increase in size, by the time of which one couldn't deny the fact that there was no return after. After, or at least if we were to open the sack and release them in his lab.

He couldn't concentrate afterwards, which would make it ever so impossible to focus on what was going on with his current project. Things had already slowed down a lot. People were watching and asking too many questions.

He was standing out too much every single time he stepped outside. Not only were his clothes unwashed and dirty, but it looked like he wouldn't be spared a shame. They looked at him as if he had been a comer from a different age who somehow stumbled there amongst them.

Clearly, he had not only looked like it but he hadn't been acting like it either.

'Isn't he that eccentric guy people keep talking about? what is that man doing at this unholy hour?'

Asked a woman out of her balcony. This man had been observed way too many times, not only that but they had noticed what he was walking out with.'

'Don't look at him, we shouldn't try provoking him, look, he has a blade on him. The kind of men that walk at that hour bearing a knife can't be trusted at all.'

'Worry not, we shall make it so they know we're scum.'

A voice had come but it wasn't from the balcony. No, that had been hanging from inside the lamp-lights which stood there. One mistake had been set in motion. It was what had been held inside the metal shaft, the long-palette of crawling legged twists which had turned inside of it. From its body shape, it could be discerned that it looked like an artist's sketch of a flying machine, if it had been living and if it had been stretched to an unnatural order.

Of course inside the body of the lamp, it couldn't stretch, but what it had done was to twist itself around the wires so it may draw within it some of the static and power which had been emanated within them. With little doubt in mind, there could be nothing gained from it. A shout had been displaced from the entity which remained uncalled for.

They grew fatter in there and on second thought, they only leeches from it, without any kind of shame. But they had felt each step which came from the coming streets, on a regular basis. In their long reign, in that system of interconnected lights, they had long bodies waiting underneath the flaps and empty asphalt rows, which had been sectioned in such a way that they would connect to one another in a final congregation.

Each of them felt something going on at an hourly basis. As this had been going for such a long time, they had managed to record each of the schedules for every single living man in this city, no irregularities having lain there, with one exception. He, this man, Aurelio, was an exception. He popped out of nowhere and knew how to cover his tracks.

It was almost as if he had known he was being tracked, and that's why he somehow found himself regretting knowing what he knew. Within his sight, he could see, presently, the bulge of the forms which were coming out. Some dreadful cloud had gathered above him, but he didn't know if that had been in his mind or if whether it should be avoided.

'Barr your windows, Mary, there's that man again. I swear it, if he comes down this lane again, I shall march on the streets and put him down myself. He has no shame and no consideration for the good folk here which deserve not to be walked on.'

'But, you can't do that, that would be shameful. Leave him be. He's old and sick, and he can't walk properly, and I think he has a touch of something.'

‘Shut your mouth Mary, I won’t allow you to make excuses for this stranger. That’s what he is, a thief and a, and scum. Someone needs to get rid of people like him.’

‘But he hasn’t done anything wrong so far.’

‘I know his type Mary, trust me on this one, only one more time.’

He had been looked down upon for far too many times now. It couldn’t be counted as a thing of glory that while he was out there looking for parts, his living pieces kept growing. Though less of a laboratory and more of a workshop on which he worked upon parts, he seemed to be caught by it. Unlike what it’s been told so far, there had been a few good things called into question.

First, he was there with a reason. Second, that reason was drawing of parts, pieces of anything he could found. He stumbled on lonely streets in the mid-dark, lost and dazed, until he found himself where he needed to be.

Third, the morgue had been vacated by the likes of corpses. Most of them had been taken and displaced. It couldn’t be conceived where either of them could be at. It hadn’t been explained since there had been no one in to ify this disappearing act of bodies.

Aurelio could only think of what was going to happen if he were found. He broke the lock after all, he was in need of something fresh. In his workshop, most of the things he had gathered appeared like they had vacated their obscure permeability to the stress of time, and had began giving in to this aging process which lessened their bodies.

Not only would the meat become stale, but the liquids would harden and his creations would stumble over their poor function ability. It couldn’t be believed how much they had fallen. Their steps were uncanny and as they acted in their master’s absence, none may watch ahead. It couldn’t be thought as anything but what the likes had been of being dead. This strange appearance it bore to itself, this disillusion of being caught in its own body, trapped while being welded together couldn’t have lasted long.

They had begun the process of dying and their last time on the planet had been one of pity as the metal parts started dragging themselves away, kicking in the process of ever-so-selected world. No break would be allowed. Those were only the foot grunts, which meant there was little consequence to them dying off. It would be unquestionably said whether or not someone was to go ahead and feel some kind of remorse that they had been abandoned. Their master was out there while they were dying.

Inside the sack of grain though, it was undeniably said that they’d be growing and spreading and pushing on each other’s backs. When one would die, another one would jump and take its place. Another one would leap against him, pushing in and spreading through the various bottlenecks of cockroach populations there. Some would sprout from another one’s insides. Others would decapitate one another immediately, living off the various organs which had been spread while attaching themselves to them.

These proto-roaches could only become long and form cords made out of various organs. Exposed to the nature of the others, their alternative had only been to crawl and lay into quiet. Spots lay between the grains and the distracted insects, in which there had been enough space to crawl and curl so they would be undisturbed.

In there, they'd wait and hibernate for ages. Unquestionably said, the entire weight couldn't succumb yet. Other discretions there weren't as lucky as that flying machine. Various parts which had been filled to the brim of skin with the pushing of the limbs that were forced inside the central intelligence started tearing themselves apart.

His workshop was meant as a way for him to give it form. To give it a body which would be able to walk or be carried, or even be given the ability of flight. Otherwise, this entire experiment would've been either a mistake or a failure. Various parts rejected one another. Arms and tentacles and animal torsion and extreme suppression of the entire bodies which had been forced to the side now began reeking in the most awful manner.

The plan had been to insert eight bodies into it, headless, armless, only using their lower body strength which electronic parts had been attached to them, which in turn would reanimate them. With that they would carry this deity of metal and bring it to the light of day.

Much of the city would be overrun once the citizens knew that a new supreme cognitive power, much greater than his had arrived. But the man had been mad. His creations were flawed, they could barely function for a limited time.

And this intelligence, though artificial, had been limited and dumb. It was a failure he would not admit to himself, all of them were. Simple tools which were attached to foolish body parts, making him appear less of the genius that he had painted himself as and more of a madman.

Failure after failure after failure, which meant that this was no workshop he left behind but a butcher's den. He knew that on the way out and it had been for that reason alone why he abandoned it, going ahead to find a new place to begin anew. The mad part hadn't been that, but the fact that he abandoned eight such dens around the city.

None of which had been found yet. But one in particular, where he had fit a body of metal so wide and long that it took the body of an unnerving half-serpent, great in size, dying for a bite for the many coiling things that popped on its back.

Perhaps that had been his most dangerous of creations. Because, regardless of the fire used, the heat, the acid, the various poisonous toxins, it wouldn't die. And those things that came out of its back wanted to feed. They were very much alive and in need to feed. To feed, to feed, that kept popping and popping in his mind now and then.

He would be struck by the idea, by this choice, whether to use a body for the experiment or to return to that place and feed it. Otherwise, it would escape, somehow, he knew it would, out of all his failures, this had been his greatest after all. It knew him well enough, he knew it would try seeking him and once that happened. Nothing left out of his body. No piece to spare.

The city had been going through a Renaissance of its own lately. Large sprays of colored vandals rose from the amidst the city streets, filling it with colour from within the likes of the golden paved road stones. Children ran and decorated their likes, and drew tiny roses and exposed suns amongst.

No one seemed to care or have a bother of what went on amidst their living quarters. Foreigners had somehow arrived and the streets had already much more than a grander gathering to it.

‘Isn’t it beautiful? I’ve never seen so many hues to it.’

One woman said, while looking above her head at the widespread string flags and their balloons. The poles had been raised high and moved in patterns that only a barber would look proudly at. One yellow light came from the sun as it was the midst of day in which they ran their strife.

There had been a promise from the Mayor on the day they were to arrive. This hasn’t happened yet, exactly. Most men had already been drunk, out of expectation. But they decided they’d do it anyway, as the reason for this event had been the fact that they were promised a special delivery.

Two cargoes were to be brought on top of two coming ships, amongst the docks, bringing them exotic goods which had been promised by the Mayor to bring the city to be olden days, where there was greatness to it, the grand exposure which would put their place to the rank of homage. It would finally be put on the map, where it had so thoroughly belonged.

It was impressive to say the least, that they would be looked so highly and considered grand. The first arrival came soon enough. No sea lay in the horizon, though there had been a ship in the docks. Without a question, and without having to look forward, the workers had begun unpacking.

‘Outstanding, my good friend, Leopold, I think this shall make us a fortune.’

‘Indeed, look at this venture that lies ahead. Certainly the people here will spare no expense to buy our wares. They fancy themselves cheerful and colored, isn’t this fantastic?’

‘It is and you know what this means, don’t you?’

He shook his chin and pushed himself past that point where he was standing at the docks. The cargo unclenched, the placed merchandise had come in one piece despite the storms through which they came. And most passengers and their employees still thought they got there by sea. But past the shallow level, there had been nothing underneath it. Only that emptiness and the scavengers below.

‘Might I add that this is a fine city? I’ve never seen such an architectural demise before. Look at those brightly colored and enthusiastic their statues are. How they’re finely crafted to be set in stone and bear themselves forth.

Are those spires I see? And tall buildings and roses placed at balconies and red-painted curtains, yellow in the sky?

Would those be the wings on top of the gates welcoming us now?’

‘They are indeed. I could see that they had borrowed something from about everything. From ancient Rome and from the Greeks as well, I see their columns rising, I can see the foreigners wizing up finally to our ways.’

‘Marvelous, simply marvelous, have we entered the new world yet? I feel like we’re passing the threshold between ours and their. Look, the welcoming party.’

A group of citizens had already gathered at the gates. Their women wore simple white and appeared to be humbly showing themselves off while walking in stoles. Men with their cigars and dark suits and tall hats, and white shirts underneath decorated buttons and golden watches with iron chains.

But, cigars for women, men sniffed tobacco pouches. Who were those pretenders? Even the workers, who had their oil-stained wife-beaters and their blue caps appeared to be laughing at how they presented themselves. Oh, the gentlemen were quite offended by this turn of events. It was clear that they’d scowl while in hiding.

‘Aren’t they a bit prissy a jibber?’

‘I suppose they’re a bit queer’. You wouldn’t find me dressing that way, no.’

‘But their women aren’t that bad, at least they’re not getting what they’re having. Hey, look.’

Both of the workers were already on their break. The sound of steam-alarm already started off. Now, they were on their mandatory luncheon.

And the dames were staring quite thoroughly, whispering to themselves while the area about the gates was being filled. They themselves were quite weirdly dressed, the two business men wore their high-clothes with high-coats and blue-ultramarine with white stripes between. No hats for either, but their hair was lighter, feathery, light brown, which only complemented their suit-matching watching globes.

‘Well, shall we greet the men? It seems like they are waiting for us.’

‘Greeting constable, I assume you may be the leader of the lot?’

‘Indeed you have sir. And who are you? I don’t believe we may have acquainted ourselves, well, I see that the two of you share some of the same wealth, I would suppose.’

Those both of them looked different, both in features and in height. One could draw the conclusion that they share more differences than they shared alike.

‘Jacquo, pleased to meet you constable. My friend here, William introduced me to this venture. And, I and my brother have decided to accompany him. ‘

‘You have a brother, Jack?’

‘That’s Jacquo, constable. And yes, he had decided to accompany us. He’s in one of the cabins now, mightily sick, might I add. You wouldn’t like him, I suppose he wouldn’t take your nature as kindly and joyfully as I have.’

This Jacquo, easily name Jack seemed to be a bit more off the cliff compared to William. He would fit in the south well. Not easily entertained, not because he’d fit, but because he appeared to be the type of person who enjoys putting people into shape.

by the way he looked at his own men, who were of the same color and constitution, it was something which put him off about the man.

An assumption came there, how, there was this social hierarchy. They would deny it if asked, but from wherever they came, it seemed rather low and uncanny.

‘William, a word, if I may.’

‘Very well, constable. You may have me at any time now, I am mightily onset on learning more about this place.’

‘Indeed, well, as.’

At least eight million cities lay widespread around, as far as they could be seen. They covered a wide patch of ground. then, upon their arrival from their, one of the cities had been dragged down a few feet below. Some of the many mouth had eaten and pulled down one of them, trying their best to gnaw while hiding what they were doing from the presence their mindless bodies felt.

A numbed dumb-creature presented itself in them. They used this sudden strangeness as a distraction to push themselves forward. On two steps, there were none hiding.

The emptiness of a commune in the abandoned Yerlb stood by. Farther away than where it happened, no one was supposed to know of the dye which had been gone missing from there. It was important to know that, in the many journeys William had entertained himself through, he had stumbled upon one of these escapes.

He had been alone, and it looks like this secret of his had been well preserved. Alone wouldn’t be exactly right, as there had been people who had accompanied him before. But those people were not alive any longer. Not at all, unexplained disappearance.

The disappearance wasn't as important now, as the trade. William distanced himself from his trading partner and came closer to the Mayor, by the docks. His mind had still been set on that abandoned place where he had found the dye. As a matter of fact, the compact holder in which the substance had been set was anything but used. Not much of it had been used.

If there was something to be learned from it, that had been the fact that there was a bad feeling, an omen to it, as if it shouldn't have been taken away from there or even used. Where it had lain, abandoned, appeared to have been left out in the open. Someone mixed it as well.

'My good friend, but, this friend of yours, Jack, doesn't do me any good. I mean no offence but he's not one to be taken lightly. He sounds like he has a temper to him. And his brother of his, if he has the same countenance as him.'

William raised a hand as to appeal the case. He didn't show any change of expression nor any kind of concern about what was going on.

'Look around. Our people are already starting to interact. Why, I'd say they're not much different, or any different at all from where I come than where you are.'

I believe this trading relationship is only the beginning, as I'm planning on purchasing some of your estates and investing in your beauty of a place.'

'Are you now, William? I wouldn't have believed you had it in you. Come to think of it, this town is kind of running in shortage of men and the work is falling behind.'

My office is in need of renovation, my schools, the public square, oh and the statues are in need of restoration.'

'All in good time, dear friend, all in good time. For now, let me assure you that I will provide you not only with goods, but with service and with as many lives as you want to spare.'

The way in which he smiled would've made a much-beloved maiden cry. Both were interested in this venture that involved more than enough shady materials there.

'Ma'am?'

Said one of the sailors, who were in his pause. One of the dames had approached, floundering her dress in his direction. It felt like she was fancy and dandy and had something of a neck to show.

'You're from out there, aren't you?'

'Where would that out there be ma'am?'

‘The other continent, ain’t you? There’s a whole other continent mainland, out there, where there’s green pasture and animals. Do you like animals?’

‘Jonathan. My name is Jonathan, and I had a Sheppard’ flock back home I used to look after before becoming a sailor.

It was wolf-breed, something of a mutt, you see? It took care that no fox made it through the flock.’

‘I’ve never seen a real sheep before, not outside one of the books. Would you take me sometime, back home, Jonathan, if there’s no trouble to it and show it to me?’

‘I think I would like that, ma’am.’

There was some sadness in his eyes and a split lip on the side.

The gates stood adjacent to their strange sphere. It didn’t look right, when it came into the light. But that hadn’t been as important as what they were bringing there.

‘We have arrived, dear brother.’

A door opened on top of the ship. He settled down in the cabin his brother had been placed in. Sea-sickness would be unbearable for him or any other decent man. But here he was, pushing himself through.

The man was puking in his small bucket, looking at Jacquoe from the midst of his placed canteen and the broken table inside his tiny room.

‘What have you done now, Marques?’

‘I haven’t done anything but emptied my gut for the last fifteen hours. What do you think I’ve been standing in here for?’

‘We’re on land now, and you should come meet the Mayor, it’s something expected of you.’

‘No.’

‘No?’

The two of them met face to face as he knelt in front of him. The man looked like he was half-way passed out between the floor and the bed, with a bucket tied to his neck, looking like some donkey who didn’t know how to properly behave. It was quite obvious that he wasn’t in any mood for it. With no harm, foul, he came to his neck and whispered.

‘We need to press of advancement over William, do you understand? If we give him free reign, he’ll abandon both of us and sign a deal with that man outside.

And if he does, we’ll lose a lot. Not only our fortune but a part of our estate, which, may I remind you, we have signed it to him? And our reputation and political power will have all gone to drain.

He’s as much of a snake as we are a bunch of jackals.’

‘I can’t move at all.’

‘Then limp and throw that bucket away, man. Act like one while we’re out there, at least for the ladies.’

At which mere mention, he got back on his two feet and threw one of the suits on. He was in no shape to get out of bed or even get as far as he could without being held.

‘We’ll do him well, I tell you, and he won’t get us yet.’

The birds had been released by now, doves, white, bearing some of the light the sun had shone about the water stave. As filled with light, the people’s blight in the front, left to some obscure distant table in a silent place amongst the back of the Lamplot district.

‘So, Catherine, may I add that you look well-behaved today?’

‘You’ve told me this before, Gourney. This. You always do it, you always find a way with words, don’t you?’

If there was something on Gourney’s mind, he wasn’t going to reveal it then. Without much in doubt, they looked like two doves stranded together on a raft. They weren’t aware how lonely the place looked in their absence, the street, the bottom row, the office in which they both worked and now that place.

Distant, though it may be, Gourney’s house had been filled with dust and old manuals he never read. For someone like him, who, for the last few months slept in his office rather than at home, was something deplorable. Mountains of dust had accumulated, small ants rummaging through his abandoned fridge. Electricity hadn’t been paid and the place looked like some crypt than an apartment.

His next door friend had marked of his absence, even though he hadn’t been involved into it, there seemed to have been a break in, with the only problem being the fact that there wasn’t anything to steal. It hadn’t been a close case either. Many such homes were in the same condition as this one, bottlenecked through layers of abandonment.

They were like children of some kind, left by their parents, looked on after one of the janitors. And there had been one as such, with an undisclosed age, and an undisclosed number of dorms to look after. It wasn’t even certain who paid for his job. That man had worn the vestments of a blacksmith, a robe of tattered metal sheet in the front, a body of a fighter, he bore the marks of some kind of survivor. A few marks and cuts lay across his face.

His white hair had grown long but he had shaved his beard off. No color in his eyes came and it looked only that his eccentric had only spread as far as to reveal a few tattoos marked on his arms and on the rest of his body. No one knew his name or why he was so strange, only that he looked after the places which had been sold, lost or never occupied.

It was only the Mayor's fault that they weren't occupied. Why, this venture had only been a trick up his sleeves as well, a means of attracting fresh meat. But he wouldn't take.

'Dirty vermin's, I'll have you all.'

At the end of his mop, he had discovered a small edge of metal he carried around. He used it quite well to push down the back of small animals which found themselves in. They wouldn't be found, he made sure. If there was something he discovered in the twenty ears which had lain in that building, it was that the walls were listening.

And if they were, that meant that the floors had to be eating as well. It was something which had to be tested. He ripped a small slab of boarding below him. It was a small wooden square, barely standing, which could only have been lifted with the help of something sharp which was needed to cut around the chase.

It was then that he saw the endless rows of insects which had walked upon one another, marching underneath the entire bottom frame of the boarding. A system which was mightily infectious, one would think. So many of them, so many breeds, which hadn't been insects any longer, they were animals. Or at least animalistic in fact that they bore skin, bone and hair, some sort of filthy evolution process had occurred.

And it was uncontrollable. Especially since some borrowed or had imitated some pieces of the human or the various rodent or feline features, which had been shrunk and added to them. But not all of them were like that.

They shared everything between then and every now and then, the various insects which did look like what they were appeared, though in a lesser frequency than their peers. It was obvious that he had caused this. As there was no retaliation over the fact that he had revealed them time after time.

'My dear friends, I see that you have consumed my previous gift I had shared with you.'

He had brought them an old tenant which had previously died. They were already in the midst of becoming human, somewhat, though it may have been spread between various examples of their species. He himself was frightened over the mere fact that he might one day end up there, but he resigned to the thought and threw the remains of the cat inside its gutter.

There was another thing he wondered, well, if the walls listened with those wooden ear carvings, and the floors were eating, who was doing the seeing there? It was obvious that he was being constantly watched.

Something was breathing over the back of his neck. It needed to breathe as well, but it was not the building that was doing it. No, there was something else residing inside the various pieces which had been overlain around the place. And each of them acted in a certain way or manner which complemented himself.

Inside his large wooden mop, he knew something was crawling. The head which had been produced by its body was way too obvious to be ignored. Not only that but he had thought there'd be an interesting way of knowing what was going on there.

It was a way of knowing and of going about their way, through which they couldn't help but move to the side. Without doubt, there wasn't any conscious thought, nothing brought to their awareness at that. They were there, looking and growing. He had to know where from. Not in the tint of the glass.

'I'm sorry, I haven't meant to disturb you from your work.'

A man had entered the vicinity. He had spoke way too quickly, without having observed what the janitor was dressed in or what he looked like. Even the wooden bucket he had carried was something to be looked at, not in the rightist feeling or way.

'I'm distracting you from your work, perhaps I should leave.'

Good, the man would've been too much of a pest to get rid off. He almost came back to his senses now. He was looking for something around the area, anything as a particular kind of gazing surface, like some glass or something reflective. Anything of the kind would do.

The sight of the deranged only could've come at that hour. While he was busy looking around, cleaning what crevices and apartments came into his view, or at the doorstep, the creation of the first bodies inside the floor had begun. Within their reach had been enough material to create their own human beings.

But he wasn't interested in looking after what he had started. With a keychain that granted him access to about every room inside the building, he entered on. Usually they didn't trust strangers to come in and mess with their things, but this had been an exception. So much dust had accumulated over the months most of these had been left into that one could draw the conclusion that they had been abandoned.

Clearly, it had been wrong to look into it. Too many questions asked, not enough of them answered. A few things stood hidden there, which no normal man should've looked into.

Behind the bookshelf, he almost expected there to be a hidden room or at least enough space to hide a body. But no, there was only dust behind it, and he dragged it too soon. There was still enough time to look around. All the time in the world, to clean the dust and pull the curtain and to reveal nothing on the other side of it.

Wherever he looked there was something to do.

‘It’ll take me at least a half-a-day to clean this room alone.’

He spoke in an obsolete tone. It wasn’t even his responsibility to this, but an agent of the Mayor found him and he had been forced to parley with the most mundane of tasks. Plus, these kind of rooms were wrong. As thoroughly examined as they were, no doubt remained about it.

Farther below there were those low-lives who were hidden in break-through apartments. What had been meant by that is that, there were adjacent rooms which had been left alone, which the wall between them had broken through. It looked like some giant house, or some disjointed place which had been previously wrecked by the tenant who had decided he had paid too much responsibility and left.

‘Crane, what do we have here?’

‘Enough to get us through for a few more weeks, we’re fine.’

Baster said. He had been in the business of scoundrel and getting those implants through the buildings and hiding them inside. Tiny freckled transparent heads, long and able to implant themselves into about any material. They looked like glass cases which had long extended noses and protruding mouths. Inside of them lay floating brains which were as long, were held by nothing and appeared to have a missing piece of their cortex in the form of a giant air bubble.

Looking at their brains made one look uncomfortable, as he’d notice how strange they were compared to their own. They were wider and looked to be of one piece at the top, bending at the back to create the image of a clamp which held a big ball-like lump in the middle of it. There were no cramps, and no formations, no roads or any kind of imperfection. The area was plane and receded in the back, connecting everything there.

Holding this glass implant had been easy at that. It wanted to connect with the wooden floor and enter it. Those were the unnatural eyes which were spying, the living things which acted as objects to prevent themselves from being hurt.

As soon as they had been implanted somewhere, they would leave an afterimage or a two dimensional mark in the place they had entered through. Only through that way they could return to surface and reenter the world. Otherwise, they would be caught on forever, without chance to escape, in the insides of objects, having the chance to be broken with them if someone had been clumsy with the handling.

One such after image stood on a wooden table. That had been an accident, the way in which it had arrived there. It had been a grave mistake to find out how they work there.

‘When will Horko come?’

‘He was supposed to be here by now. You know this can’t go any further than that. It’s obvious that you cannot even surpass that conniving thing over there.

Wouldn’t have it enter you as well?’

‘No, you told me it’s dangerous. I know what it does to a man and I’m not an object for it to enter and possess.’

It was one kind of thick and elastic plaster dust which prevented them from being entered. Their hands looked dirty white but at least they could handle it. And these creatures weren’t easy to break, no, though they looked like glass, even the blow of a hammer would fail to break them. It was even suggested that these creatures were nigh-indestructible, with the only option to destroy or end them being breaking them while they were inside something.

And that had been impossible as well since there wasn’t any way for detection to be had. Dangerously in awe, as they had been, nothing could be seen. At least not out of it, without that being there.

‘They can’t come out of surface you know? I haven’t told anyone this, but if you place something on top of their exit hole, they won’t be able to get through and escape.

It’s their second weakness, or second wind of retreat if you will, there’s no other way for them to get through afterwards. And that’s how you get them, either trapped or snapped while inside.’

Here, though unknown to the janitor, was the answer to his question, still lost on him. There wasn’t any way of knowing whether or they were there near them, or how dangerous they were, only that hint that they could move objects if they put themselves onto it. Alas, it was time.

‘He arrived, I think.’

Both men starkly followed the creaking of the floor boards. They looked at it and saw the face which popped out of the wood. It had been their friend who came out, but only his face could be seen. His lips moved though no sound came out.

‘What did he say he was going to do?’

‘He said something about mastering the implants. I think he had become one. But I can’t be sure what’s happening now.’

‘I think we’re hallucinating from the exposure to its skin, don’t you think? You were the one who told me that prolonged exposure caused that thing, haven’t you?’

He only nodded then. No more of an account could be held about it than what it mattered. One draw of the lotter seemed to bear some resemblance to his now. As his body started drawing out of the floor, he revealed how most of it had become glassy and transparent. He had spent so much time in there that his body was becoming an implant in itself.

It was a sight to be hold, and one which made him weary. They couldn’t possibly begin to understand what was going through his head then. No, his inner organs and bones had been compressed and changed into those weird connected brain-like formation they saw in the little one. But they were sure it had to be a brain, his organs had and bones had been transformed into one. A functional giant corded brain which projected enough power to show them, how slowly he was being encompassed by this.

He was their friend, a human no longer. A sad look reigned on him. Both men looked as saddened, teary eyed mostly. Sure they were scum, but they weren’t murderers, they weren’t thieves. At best they destroyed some property and dealt with the implants but, this wasn’t supposed to happen.

‘Call, I’m sorry this had to happen. I don’t know if you can hear me.’

His face drew in, leaving the same transparent outline of glass outside. As a human, he had only been recognizable by the figure, not by features, not by texture or anything at all. Angst felt at him, pushing through his entire body as he watched in confusion.

At this stage, he didn’t belong in the world any longer, he belonged there.

‘You’re leaving, inside of there.’

There had been a slow nod.

‘Are we ever going to see you any longer?’

A second nod appeared. Both men chose to suddenly rise up from sitting.

This body had had a story of its own, as had the man inside of it. But now, now, it was time for Call to leave. He had lived a great and sad life and now, it had ended. He bowed and let them know that he still kept the same charm as in that day they met and in the end he left at last, with nothing but a vague smile.

Below him laid the imprint which lasted for a few minutes before the room shook. It was almost like the will of the world had manifested then, that an earthquake had suddenly came into being and only left that giant wide-spread crack in the floor, where the imprint had been, right before it stopped.

That way, he would never get the chance to return again, not in this world at least, not anymore.

A long time ago, the three of them had met. Baster, Crane and Call, more than a few good years, in the lower down street area, called the poor zone. The three of them were laymen, the trashy kind. Broken windows clanging at around every building around, from their rock flingers, made by their friend Call.

‘Good one Crane, that’s the fourth one in a row.’

‘Stop breaking them, that’s now what I made them for. You said you’d only break bottles, nothing more.’

It was obvious that Call had no intention on rigging or flinging on metal cases, small bird or anything other than that. Crane might’ve had this complex of breaking glass. It never came back to his mind, especially by the time that happened, but he had some kind of obsession with breaking them.

Lampposts, broken, small light bulbs smashed. If it weren’t for the flinger, which had looked like a marvelous tool, made out of some polychrome pusher connected to a pan-holder and many wired lock-exchangers. At the top lay a band which had been connected to two strips of wood at the end. From the distance it would look like some crossbow, or firearms, if one didn’t know any better.

‘They’re coming, come on, let’s go.’

‘Stop, scoundrels, stop, you’ve broken the last windows I say. You’ll have to pay for every single one of them until every debt is paid, you hear?’

His shouts had already been lost then. It couldn’t be forgiven any longer. There were some obvious exceptions here and there, where the windows had been too old and needed to be replaced. Sometimes it couldn’t be helped.

Yet they outran the man and outsmarted him as well.

‘Open the trash holder, it’s empty, I checked it.’

Said Baster, he was the one with the backup plan which came right on time. He had also been the one who had lead the other two in the direction they were running, his father had been one of the architects of the city, so he would keep a lot of plan and a lot of maps around the house.

Though he didn’t pay enough attention to Baster, the kid learned by looking at him work, until he had memorized every nook, cranny and turn. ‘That was a close one Baster.’

‘Shh, don’t make any noise yet. He’s still after us.’

Said Crane, almost as quick to wit as they had been on their feet. It was safe to go then. The pig’s voice had already gone beyond any kind of stretch of the word, to the point of having been taken as far as he could.

‘Well now, what would that be?’

‘Don’t go that way, don’t follow it, we’re not supposed to be there.’ Call spoke with a slight hint of repulsion. The other two were being drawn in by a smell or a filthy scent which disturbed all three of them, but peered into them then. By the dead end, there was nothing.

‘See? There wasn’t anything to fear here, only this weird thing.’

First sings. You never forged those regardless of how hard you might try acting up. And they were marked all over the place. It was then that they had their sight of a nest of implants. They appeared to be clustered together, gathering and placing themselves at a neat’s comfort.

He had touched it then, one of those marks on the walls. I think it was then that Call had taken it on himself. It wasn’t only one, I don’t think so. We haven’t seen them, not directly, only that his hand had loomed over it and suddenly a few marks disappeared off the wall.

‘Did you see that? I think I managed to wipe them off.’

‘I don’t know about this.

‘Got you, you bandits!’

There he was, turned. He was missing a good chunk of it, his face being turned into some flat cut-off hole which remained on him before he fell. We scream and began running away from him, scared.

‘What happened to him?’

‘Don’t look at him, we need to make it to the hiding place before someone sees us near him.’

‘Crane, wait, I don’t want to get beaten for this. Please, tell me what happened.’

‘I don’t know, Baster, I don’t know. Let’s go.’

Most workers were out at the hour, the spanner being at least a few hours behind before one could make it through. They were weeding out the minutes by going around and sniffing the air. As soon as they came around their senses, they were there, in one of the barely lived-in buildings. The Janitor was there, waiting by the door, like usual.

He gave the kids a stink eye but he pulled his mop away and let them in. It wasn’t in his best interest to stop them yet.

‘I think he saw us.’

‘He definitely did, you snottier, and he’ll find out sooner or later that he was chasing us.’

‘What then? I can’t be expected to say something. I don’t know what happened there, he said something then he had no face.’

‘Don’t say anything then, we’ll work a story out.’

Baster had been sure they could come up with something. The three of them were smart kids, at least that’s what he thought. For a place which had been well-taken care off, the building hadn’t looked as depraved as it had always been. Something had to have happened then than the janitor would’ve become as sloppy.

He had been busy sometimes. Leaving and returning. He disliked strangers, people, some kind of distrust and misgivings. There wasn’t much he said or did, but no one thought he ever spoke the truth. It was clear that he had been lying about what he was doing there.

This man appeared and had been gone whenever he cared enough to pay some heed to what others were doing. But that hadn’t prevented him from taking care of some lost children. They sat silently in their hiding place, always trying to track who was doing the moving, the back and forth and the many feet which followed.

It wasn’t as clear then, but this building was rather wide-spread, in terms of being connected to the adjacent one near it, while being separated by a thin wall which might easily be taken down if one were to punch through it.

‘Well, are we safe or what?’

‘Give it a moment.’

Back then, it looked like things hadn’t been any different below, with one exception. There had been that living brooder. He had appeared out of nowhere, from the inner works of the city. Long legs, in number of eight spanned from a hard body, shaped like tin can, pushing some long pins and sharp tongues out of its top. Eight tiny, tiny-head, so small that they would fit in a man’s hand decorated his top. It looked like a construct of metal but acted like a living thing.

The texture of its flesh felt human to the touch, but had been blunt. Every now and then it would head down below in order to make sure no heap trash had been stuck inside those legs, but otherwise, it had always lived inside the upper levels with its many brothers.

While in there, that obscure dark appeared to have tainted his minds. Each head had a personality and produced a growth of yellow as the light faded from the outside. It was by that means that they followed and kept track of one another. And each of them had an act of taking care and making sure their valuable work wouldn’t be the least wasted.

Engineers of the insides, they called themselves, not by speech. And this, this had been one of the rare occasions they had gotten out, this one obscure moment in the past. It hadn't been observed by the malnourished people. Nor had it been attacked by the flying things of prey, their malignancy made other distaste their wicked-looking grave-formation forms.

But they had been in charge with making sure the trash was will going in the right direction. From their long and thin legs, a few blades emerged and started rubbing the piping system, like some sharper spanners.

It was highly required that a certain precision was being staved off to avoid sudden lacerations and damage on the long run which may eventually prevent any kind of loss of function which may occur. Instead, they specialized into blunt stroke which moved the tubes and the compact thrash throwers only inches at a time.

There was a dependency there. By the time the actions had been repeated, small packs of gas were being released after forming around the base of the ceiling in which they extended. It was for that reason why they never left the place, they were addicted to the feeling the inhalation of those various chemicals produced. No less than it had been in awe, one could pay enough attention to what was going on in there.

And one who paid enough of it would be vaguely surprised to find out that it had been a deranged connection, this relationship between those inanimate objects which happened there. Each one of them had been that way, flaccid and away, both physically and whatever had lain inside their strange bodies.

'Well, Call, it's up to you. What do you want to do? We've been messing around this room for the past few minutes.'

'I know, I know, but I think I still need to sit in bed for a bit. I'm not feeling well.'

Crane came up to him and as he drew nearer, he pushed it past his two eyes. He was at least burning, which was an understatement of its own. No one could be compelled enough to check for help yet. Out there, the body disappeared, being dragged away by itself.

An explanation had been in order. From inside his face it puked a pile of moving oils which slowly encompassed enough ground for it to slide away. The oil would eventually evaporate. Many abandoned buildings lay in the area, and it knew that. It had dragged itself away into one of them in which it waited to this very day. Others like him had been placed around town.

The most impoverished case being the one who had been repurposed by the doctor, in one of his many journeys around the area where he worked, he found himself rather on-set on acquiring new material. And it did not happen that often that one prime specimen would stumble on its own where he was. No, that hadn't been it. Without a doubt, this one had been special. Whatever affected it hadn't eaten a part of his face, but also a good chunk of his chest and legs and arms.

He had almost been forced to be flatly cut off the bottom, to look in such a manner. Of the way it acted, oh, he appeared at the doorstep of a remotely enclosed location. Many turns around the streets hid these kinds of entries. From the side they looked like giant prison barred holes or basement windows which had been rounded and occupied two thirds of the wall and of the steps in which it had been projected.

Usually those small entryways lead to select taverns and places where only the most secret of encounters could be had. Or used to be had, until people started being pushed away from it.

It knocked on the door, silently and well behaved. He had been welcomed inside by him and repurposed for one of the experiments. That day had been marked on one of the calendars he owned as the day of some mild sacrifice. He had undergone the process of digesting it, to find out what the insides of this creature's body had looked like.

Pleased by what he saw, this was no human at all, but some creature which hid inside of it. In time he could control it with the help of shocks, so he would get to create his machines with its body, as it produced that valuable oil. He placed pig head inside, not alive, but merely looking animated by the metallic skulls he had placed inside the skull.

No longer would he be able to confess to itself what it had done. They would be in awe of one another and the kind of interest which had been shown there could only go one way. It was in pain. Forced to stay in a shell which hadn't been to its liking, this mask wouldn't make it any better. And stress affected it more, to the point of not being able to last more than a few extended periods of time.

Agony aside, these creatures hid and hibernated most of the time. Whenever it happened for them to stumble upon one another, they'd leave their suits and breed. They never took hold of someone who was alive, which was strange. That mad there had died in an instant. And inside of it, the creature leapt from its storage.

'Baster, Baster, wake up. I think Call's feeling better. We waited long enough, we should be clear, I think.'

'But what if they suspect we're at fault? They could look at the windows and know.'

'No, that's the point, we spoke about it. We spent our entire day at our hiding place.'

Crane couldn't focus right, not since his friend was slowly rising on his two feet.

'Like I said, we hanged out here, taking care of our sick friend, Call, who may have picked up a chill on his way.'

They nodded for a moment, shaking on it.

'But what of the janitor? What if they get a hold of him?'

He at the door, staring. They all froze as they say him there. Not only had he come out of nowhere, but he had this way of simply being there without shame, waiting, eavesdropping, being around them simply being an unacceptable act of its own. As an adult being near a few unsupervised children of whom he knew nothing about and to whom he was nigh-a-stranger.

No proper context had been given as to how long he had waited there. It wasn't until a few minutes of total eye-contact had taken place that he left the room.

'I told you he was watching.'

The kids weren't set on it for long. They ran. All three of them had been set on getting as far away as possible without being distracted or taken away. It wasn't something even less than unnerving, despite the lookers. It happened quickly then, that they split and found each other thinking to themselves.

'How long had he been standing there? How much did he know?'

Crane couldn't help it. He would have to tell his parents some of it. And there was that dead eye who kept taking leaps around. It wasn't actually what he thought it was, a frog missing an eye. But he felt being watched by it, as if the working eye had been a tiny ruby which emulated vision. He felt uncomfortable being in its area of vision for a long period of time.

But that thing kept trying to rear itself closer to the house, whence he lived.

'I need to tell my parents.'

He repeated, making through the roundabout, getting by the lane, up the stairs, in front of the door ahead. The old dark wood had kind of flair to it. His father had brought a small metal skull and placed it at the top, so strangers or carpet merchants got the message. No one else which wasn't in his trust had been welcome there.

Crane entered and budged on them. It was a normal family dinner he busted in, from which he had been missing, especially the cold plate which had been placed for him.

'You were supposed to be here by four.'

'I was busy, father.'

'Get your hands washed, kiss your mom and sit down, boy.'

'Yes, father.'

The bathroom window, a pane to the outdoors, he looked outside and saw it. A woman missing the sides of her palms, she moved unnaturally. He could see the dark colors in it and the slime which had been pushing in. Despite the cold-dead stare, he knew, he somehow knew she wasn't watching him. Her eyes weren't trailing him during his attempt to get out and back into the view.

Her body fell and the dragging began. what had there been going on?

It wasn't like any of the kids could've known about it, but those weren't living creatures. waste, as the sewage plants and other means of expulsion of the various malign inside the town had been overflowing. This was the work of an engineer.

Inside of his tank body, he emptied his insides and started taking some of the overflowing trash inside of him. The result had been a programmed mind-controlling pile of digested oily remains which would drag themselves out of view and eventually be eaten by disease. What had made it so efficient was the fact that he had inflicted some extra-adorned amount of refined sugar in it.

Tiny holes would emerge in the body and as soon as that happened, there would be no oil produced, only that pain, which couldn't be satiated by anything else other than the slow epitome of self-congestion.

'Baster, I told you to return to your room, you've been gone for so long, I think you should be punished.'

Without excuse and without argument, there wasn't any other need for a conversation to be had. His father was red, steamed, to the point where he didn't care for any argument or excuse. This is what he waited for, a simple line before he dragged the body into his room to beat him mad.

Which left Call, who returned to the orphanage, he wasn't of the legal age?

They all remembered what happened that day and how it hadn't been brought up. With so many things happening between the slips, it was strange how no one notice what happened in there at all. But one day, they would, especially since the town was about to be repopulated again.

'We should leave, now.'

'But what of him?'

'We'll light a candle later, Baster, I can't stand being here, not after seeing this.'

'Call would've wanted us to remember.'

'I will, but not now, not now!'

Two shakes of the heads and they ran away again. The same circumstance apparently, with the only difference being that both of their parents were dead.

'Catherine.'

'Gourney.'

‘Say, you wouldn’t like to go out there and see what this fuss is about, would you?’

‘No, I think I’d rather enjoy the day for now, why? Do you think there’s something worth going for?’

‘Perhaps we could try looking for a way to get through to the people in charge, and set forth a meeting.

I mean since they’re mostly businessmen, I bet many of them could be interested into the archives and how the place works.’

‘Gourney, I don’t believe that’s such a great idea. There are some happening written down in the files which wouldn’t be believable at all to anyone else.’

She was clearly nervous there. It was something she read, often, not a single file, but multiple ones which seemed to bear some consistency there.

The piles that were eaten, the oily remains had never disappeared, they only thinned to such wild surfaces that they spread in every corner and appeared to breed tiny slithers of disease. This was the curse of the engineer, which went on unreported, as it might be added. All because of some kid who saw it happen and identified a moving body but refused to talk about it.

It had to be noted that those oily overflows had been widespread quite a lot around town. No more would one have to look ahead. There was the sight and the feel of the malign to be prodded at. It wasn’t certain if it would be there, by no means.

A few files in particular didn’t bode well with him, at least to his best suppositions. They were quite revealing and obscure. One basement on Eighth Avenue, vanguard’s eve. It looked like some damn caved in tunnel which had been accidentally discovered by a man by the name of Granth. His discovery was quite fascinating as it had been kept in quiet and hidden for a great deal of time.

At least for long enough to wager some distrust from a bunch of fellows underneath the Isle. He made an altar in it. From the looks of that caved in tunnel, it seemed like nothing he had even seen, the stone was too hard to smash by pickaxe and he tried. On the other side, only the sound of wind came through the cracks but that had been enough.

‘What is this?’

The sound of confusion echoed. He had purchased one of the great apartments of the building which had a fully functional basement below of the dormitory, which he hadn’t meant to stumble upon. Fully functional as in everything which had been stored in it still appeared to work. Granth was hadn’t expected an apprentice’s lab in there, but his immediate reaction was to smash it.

‘I will not have this foul thing inside my house. The landlord shall hear of it immediately.’

But he stopped in his tracks and looked down there. He had doubted that the basement, or more so, this hidden room was intended for his sight, as he had to dig underneath the floor to find it. Either he mistook it for an intended basement, or something had been in the way. An accident brought him here.

Granth took a piece of the tapestry and pulled it away. It curled the wall and as it had, the material crumbled and fell down to his feet. This strange thing couldn't have been any worse now. A dangerous mark on his finger made him be weary of the corners.

He had almost been beheaded in this accident, and as his sight came to view, he saw the extension of the room. The separation between them had been, wrong. First, a step made him turn and look back. There wasn't anything in the back any longer now.

It had been another remnant of the past, but he could see only the dark and the floating puffs of dust, like he had been transported somewhere else. Whatever had gotten in his mind in that dead end, wherever he had gotten the stone from, perhaps he pulled one of the huge chunks away, dragging it into position before he began carving. But that's what he did. He made a small altar in there.

If he had descended through some stairs or anything else, those weren't there any longer. He dragged more stoned and leaped to that hole in order to crawl out of it. But he got the appropriate tools in order to stare the stone masonry he thoroughly needed. This was a descendant of a man of cloth, he was frightful and had fear of his lord.

But this thing had put a scare into him. As he went in, more often, the normal-looking basement had been filled with decadence, the same primordial look of stone which had inflicted itself upon it. The lab he had destroyed had been encompassed in sharp bits as if a quarry had been attempted to be broken through. He feared drawing near it out of a glimpse of the mind.

'If I will trip, my neck and body shall be pierced. Do not tempt me, as I shall not take my life yet.'

Surprising, even after this change and his shift of thought, as soon as he passed the threshold, he still saw the veil which removed any kind of fear that he might be watched from behind. It was his project, the thing he had been working on. What he didn't know was the fact that he had walked through overlapping billions of dark creatures. They were being fed by those tiny puffs of dust.

Dark eyes, bulking bodies, large soft pins pushing out of their hands, which looked like some kind of missing, thins. One more look, he said, one more look behind.

A warm but dark sienna had encompassed it. Some eyes began glowing with a hue of red, bearing tins as they seemed to trail in dots before disappearing then. They postulated with some fading particles of organs which gave them an appearance of constant melting.

The shades changed, mockingly to him. There was something crawling, that he saw between them.

‘Enough, I want to see the rest of it.’

He had managed to dismiss them for now.

‘What is going on in this basement?’

The two sides had appeared again, with the broken lab in one of the corners. The chest which was on the side lay locked and he had seen a drawer ticked on the wall above it.

‘My altar, my very own altar.’

It looked crude, but now he was a heathen. Unexplainably so.

Gourney dosed off thinking about it. Again, so many accurate pictures, yet he never knew who the photographer was. It wasn’t safe, it couldn’t have been safe, but he was the same one for every case. Either that or some people had decided to carry his legacy. Two initials came to his head. A.L., though he never found out who he was.

Neither that Granth, who sought after himself to pray in front of the stones, or what lay behind them. It was some feeling he tried reproducing, but that never came back. He desperately tried breaking through but never could. A feeble man with no strength, no pickaxe which may never break and with a non-understandable, insatiable interest in what waited for him on the other side.

His mind carved for escape, which had never been granted. At least that’s what the report said, the site looked unchanged by time.

At least past the point of the creation of the altar, when the candles had been laid around. Some had different shades which ranged from hues of red, orange and yellow, which had dripped in a mass on the altar. This had been repeated several times, coaxing it in wax.

What had been important was the fact that Granth started working on the images which appeared on the mass in front of him. At times the head turned it into a movable substance which was as easily malleable as anything there was. It couldn’t be anything but noted that there was the image of the bars in it. He saw them appear and form, slowly pulling his fingers in.

He felt trapped in there. Perhaps in was the time he had spent down the basement which gave him the impression. As he draw himself in, another layer of was covered the gaps between the bars. But he felt space in there.

‘If I could find a way to clear myself an opening, I could see what there is on the other side.’

He spoke as he had looked down there. An entire hole of wax waited for him beneath the altar. First he had to know how deep it had been, without any kind of remorse over the lives he took, he brought in the tray. A few freshly killed frogs and a rooster stood inside. It was the only way to check it thoroughly without risking any other damage.

‘Let’s see if you enjoy it. If it’s safe enough for their bodies, I shall make it through myself. Here, I tied with a rope long and hard enough for you to feel it don’t disappoint me.’

They were watching, again from behind. Though every time he looked back at it, he had failed to see them manifest again. It wasn’t far that he had to be there all alone. Poor and abandoned man, he had been left by his wife again, only before he moved in.

It was through this that he had found refuge. And he wasn’t pleased by the barring of the other side. What he had wanted, more than anything was to get there. But this could work.

‘If I could feel the hole curving in front, I swear it; I shall find a way to get through.’

The animals were slowly lowered and there, he felt the reach of a dead space. It was deep enough for him to feel not the extend of the bars, but a whole entry point he had made for himself. Clearly outspoken, he had himself be aware of what happened down there.

‘Augh, damned thing, you bit me.’

A piece of his rope got repelled from his hand. It had reached the top of its dead end, expelling some of the wax it had produced from its insides. Through it, the wax had managed to push from inside the hole from which it came and began spreading as quickly as possible. It reeled back in and covered itself then.

Granth had known this to be dangerous ever since the start. He couldn’t be troubled any longer. The rest of the rope had been discarded in the hole as well as the other animals.

Next day he came there and cleaned it, thoroughly until there wasn’t anything left on it. Much to his surprise, there was nothing left there. No marks of the animal bodies or the rope.

‘Well, if the wax won’t work, I shall find a way to get through with it.’

A hive-worth honey would have to do it for now. It wasn’t a great idea, especially since he hadn’t any clue what the reaction might be, but this had been the next coat which the altar had embraced. For now he settled with it and came to his senses until everything had been rightfully placed, the honey dripping on the floor as well.

‘I will make neither of us might have to suffer through this.’

He spoke the words and shoved his hand, but not until placing a chain-encumbered cut sleeve-arm holder over himself for protection. It would have to do for now, sooner or later, he'd be drowned in it. That had to be the cause for fear.

This didn't have the feeling of being submerged, instead it felt more like some ooze through which he began prodding. He felt something.

'I got you, oh. I see that you're a big one, aren't you? If I had been any sooner, I would've missed you.'

He pulled the pulsating sack of a bee, it had drone and had tried wrapping itself not with a hard sting but with a soft one which moved. It had two bulging eyes and it had been flat at the bottom. This sting had been its head, the body was weak but the bee-spawn wasn't dead. He saw something which resembled some crossed ogre teeth it bore.

The head would grab pieces of the chain and try pulling it to the base. Now that he focused down there, he saw that many of them swam deeply in the honey as this one had.

It was suffocating in his hand, being unable to breathe the same air as man.

'We'll try doing it some way, don't worry about it. I kind of like you, aggressive little pet. Perhaps you should become my helper now.'

It kept trying to jeer itself to wrap its teeth against my hand. No, there wasn't any possible way for it to do it, not without any kind of help. There wasn't any muscle on it, no force but spasm.

'Don't try struggling. I'm going to apply some force to your sack to see how you react.'

This was his good left hand he was coming in with. It bore no glove and he wasn't certain if this would be safe at all. Without much in mind he stopped himself from doing it. All in good time.

He had been forced to rethink what had been the normal way of going about it, the code of conduct when it came to handling unlawful hazardous beings, especially those who spewed blood out of their mouths. It came as no surprise that this thins had been strongly felt by him. The sudden drainage had come and mixed with the honey, producing some kind of infested new colored pool beneath.

The tinge of yellowish-orange turned into a hardened ruby-colored thing and he could see the pump inside it suddenly shrink. Inside of them there had been a real infestation.

A shock entered him when he had looked away. One tiny cockroach entered the room. It was unexpected, sudden, to the point where he hadn't expected anything of the kind do happen. It looked likely to be pushing through the mass of stacked piles, to his surprise, entering the altar.

Granth got so startled that he dropped this sack. It was something he had never previously seen before. This tiny dark and long pocket of disgusting brown winged forms started rushing through and spreading itself inside their sweet biodome. It split into many similar pieces and as it did, they sped up the process of assimilation.

It was a reverse process, to be sure. Despite their attempts to swim towards them and eat their tiny dark bodies, they had begun being overwhelmed by so many of them. There wasn't any simple way of dealing with so many. And if they got out, which was inevitable, he'd have to deal with an infestation. And then they began eating those creatures and breeding more of their kind from inside their bodies.

'No, I can't have this on my head now. There's so many of them down there. I need a lid.'

He hadn't any better idea on how to get rid of the excess of honey. No, he'd have to somehow get rid of it entirely so the altar would change again. By the counter, he picked up a piece of some cover, some covering cloth he had taken in and then, he began closing it in.

Without any derangement, he came up to his senses and waited, looking at how it moved.

'If I keep rubbing you in, the altar should eventually come off. Don't try anything yet. I will destroy you before you get the chance to do anything yet.'

Keep calm, keep calm. He thought about shouting, out of fear that they might spread. It was irrational. After everything which had happened before, after so many things which happened, why was it that he feared a cockroach infestation? They were tiny, almost harmless but innumerable and hard to stamp out.

His eyes shifted in every corner. Paranoid and delusional, he looked around his room as well. They could come from any corner now, where there was one, there had to be many. It could have already spread its eggs by now. This very basement was a room for infestation. Tight spots and tiny spaces remained and provided enough room for them to crawl under and breed in quiet.

Check your legs, make sure neither of them crawled one them. He had this plain idea that they might appear out of nowhere and startle him even more. If he were to let go of it, they could leap and jump and dance and he wouldn't be safe at all. This dangerous thing had been slightly unnerving. He wanted them dead, all of them dead, purged, those filthy tiny demons.

Neither of them deserved a chance at survival. Not a single one could escape. The walls check the walls, they were clean, or clear, for stone that is.

'Please drown in the honey, you can't survive down there, it should be impossible.'

He thought he was rubbing the honey off but it felt harder, squishier, as if some bodies got in the way and they were being rubbed against the stone. The sight of it, of how they presented their body forms against the soft material.

Where had they been? In the dark, he saw them crawl and move. They had been there, crawling. It was unsafe and unnerving. So hard, had it been for him to focus on anything else other than that blasted roach which made it through.

It was leaking now, honey was dripping over the floor. Through it, headless and broken bodies pushed through, spilling pieces of roaches or of those bee-beings which tried spreading on the side. From their insides there was some kind of magnificent leap which spewed brown blood all over the floor.

Thankfully, despite the show, they had been dead. No survivors yet. And the bodies were too broken and cracked for them to be able to survive. Check behind you.

Nothing, they still haven't appeared. Various parts of his body trickled and appeared to be shaking over the fact that he knew they would appear about anywhere. He could wake up with them inside his clothes or hiding in the upper floor.

'Keep rubbing, I need to keep rubbing until there's nothing inside. Filth will never pass through this house again, you won't spread under my watch.'

But there wasn't any rope tying the cloth to the altar. Dreadfully caught in it, there was this strange idea. What if it was already too late? This piece he was rubbing could be contaminated. Perhaps the bodies on the floor kept eggs stored in them. It wasn't safe, but he rushed to the chest and smashed through the lock with the first hammer he got his hands on.

'Oil, there's oil, there's oil in it.'

He saw nothing but fire in it, the spread which had encompassed both the altar, the piece of the cloth and a part of the floor. Within the light of a match, he saw the hellfire emerge and purge that pestilence of a cockroach honey drop. It wasn't safe any longer to be there, he backed away from the smoke and emerged out of the basement hole.

He had left the basement that way for one day, busying himself with ruminating on it. From what he could tell, upon his return, this burst of fire had culminated in the complete destruction of the threat. There weren't any roaches in sight. But he still couldn't shake the feeling which had been instilled on him then.

With him, he brought a small box with a few necessities, to be certain that nothing like this would ever happen again. The chest still had a few oil containers, some burning rags and a few torched which stood there resting on a rope. It was a tight rope, not for short distances but for deep excavation. It meant that someone had once made it through the tunnel.

'I brought you something else now. Hopefully we'll make it so we won't be disturbed any longer during our experiments.'

Pesticide had been used on every corner of the room. It wasn't certain whether or not it would work now but he went with either way. An old wives-tale method of leaving moist bread out in the open, as it had been dealt with the pesticide. If there were still roaches down there, they would either be drawn to the breath or they would die from the amount of toxin which spread.

'This will be interesting. I know it won't work entirely, but I can only hope it does. Now, I have brought you something a bit different.'

For now, he only concluded that it was affected by substances, which would be projected and sink inside the altar. Another thing occurred to him, there was always the chance that he could spill something on the rocks blocking the path ahead of him while he'd try making it through. But that would be far too dangerous and he'd be unable to control it if something went wrong.

Being so present to the fact that behind it, he not only had no impact on what entered it but he wouldn't be able to close it either. He brought the melted essence drawn out of a multitude of species which had their eyes repurposed. A liquid had been made out of all of them, and it would seem that this sacrifice had been accepted as well.

Not only had this been reassuring, but he also struggled to understand what was going in there. Before it spread, there had been a jolt to it. Some meaning had been drawn and taken, pulling various strains which would be seen in there.

He had been sad. For no unexpected reason, he felt as if this experiment of his had been taken a bit too far. It wasn't the reaction which made him pull away but the fact that in that mass of white, he thought he had seen a pair of eyes down there. He was made uncomfortable by it, not in terms of what he'd done, but because he felt like it was someone, another person who was watching him.

Over the past few days he had tried looking forward and resisting the urge to move on. His beard had grown, his eyes were widely shut, there were bags underneath them and this time he simply reached with his head and pulled it off as if it had been only a slug.

There was a drain near the altar which hadn't been there before. Or he hadn't seen it. The eyes liquor drained.

The man spent the rest of his day sitting against the altar.

'I wish you spent more time with us, Call.'

'There's been a few things going on now in my life. I don't want to talk about it any longer. It's personal stuff, problems with my dad, being alone and.'

'Right, right, so, do you want to come with us then? Perhaps there's a thing which I may be able to?'

‘No, it’s fine, Crane. Have you spoken to Baster yet? You know you’re the only two friends I got.’

‘I know, I know. You know, it’s not your fault, neither is his nor mine. People grow apart for some time, but this doesn’t mean he’s not your friend any longer.’

We’re still going to see one another from time to time, he only needs some time to read to things. Neither of us wanted things to end up this way.’

They both kicked around a few rocks. Neither of them had any idea of the happenings around town. It was something they simply refused to talk about.

‘I think we should.’

Look at the docks. This was almost from another era. The men were about finished unpacking everything, which left the Mayor sitting far away into his office with three of his new business partners.

‘William, Jack, Jack’s brother?’

‘His name is Marques, but well, since you disregarded everything I asked of you, and then you shall call him Mark.’

Jacquo said, with a tip of some venom and spite in his words. The Mayor knew what he was doing, both of them got it from the grin on his face. He knew their proper names, he did it on purpose to annoy them. This man knew how to search for snakes in the tall grass. It wasn’t going to get any easier trying to get their way with him, but they were still going to try.

‘Well, as I said to William before the two of you snicked in, might I add that you have quite the method? The front door was locked and this is the fifth floor leading to my office. So you must’ve either picked the lock when I was gone or climbed into it.’

‘You’re not indisposed or offended that we came in, are you? After all, we only wanted to make our grand entrance as verifiably quaint as well. But, mayor, you have to admit that it was you who put us on the spot by leaving without me having introduced my brother to you.’

‘Not at all, if it weren’t for you to break in, I would’ve let you in myself. But if you don’t mind, good men, this is nothing personal at all, a habit for people who barge in uninvited.’

He took a moment to check his every drawer, to make sure nothing was missing. There, the dead-cold stares which followed him like the eyes of cats. Both of them will be trouble if you don’t mind yourself, said William.

‘So, what are we going to do now? Shall we begin? Please, take a seat, Sir William.’

This was going to be interesting.

Interestingly set on the altar, after leaving it to the exposure of the room, something wrong happened inside it while Granth had been away. The pesticides entered it, obscuring the edges where it was supposed to end, turning it into a floating cloud while carried a plethora of being on top of it as well on the sides.

The cockroaches, the rats, mice, even some dead fish, some eyes and even the bee creatures stood there drawing up and down, up and down until something from inside would enter them.

‘This isn’t right. It should’ve never got it, how?’

Upon the closer examination, he had seen those dreadful bandits and how they’ve done it. Each one of the surviving roaches which had ended up being killed appeared to have made a long trail connecting one of the edges of the room to the altar. They had each bitten off each other’s heads to they could open that tiny pocket of gas which sprouted from their insides.

As each of them had become carriers, there hadn’t been a second chance for a revival to occur. They could’ve spread like animals, but they hadn’t. It was the toxin which prevented the spread of the insect and it was the toxin which made it hard to breathe. He would return.

Second entry into the basement, this time he was properly prepared. Within him laid a gas mask, covering every corner of his face, pushing in some sort of attachment. No exit and only one entry remained. He could breathe down there again. Dressed in some extra amount of burnt umber-colored coats, with their sleeves tied around their ivory gloves, he was prepared to face this kind of threat of extinction.

It would be less likely that he would omit anything else other than it. There wasn’t a single thing he desire more but to grab it. While he approached, he saw it, what had been given birth or that which had entered the process of conception. Down there, there was the heart of corruption, kept in place by the vital veins held by the bodies of roaches and rats. the two of them held it right.

As he pulled the heart out, he had prevented the spread of the toxin further. Crudity returned within the altar and then, he was set to look upon it again. This thing pulsed with the gas from time to live. It was held within a leash by those dead creatures.

He allowed it free reign for the moment and released it on the altar. The roaches and the rats had grown in size, inflated and allowed the heart to set itself into flight, only so it could avoid being destroyed by the altar.

‘What do you want of me?’

It hadn’t the capability of speech or that of interaction, yet, it waited and appeared to be dragged in by some kind of magnificence, a delight which had been laid in the fact that he had wanted to dissect it and see for him what had been to it.

But it wasn't meant to be. It fell prey to its own toxin, it appeared, as the gas started eating through its mass, revealing that the insides had been calcified into some mustard mass which spread into the rest of them as soon as it had. The heart died in front of him, expelling all the terror he might've felt about him being affected by it.

If he had inhaled the toxin, he dreaded the thought of what might've happened at all. No amount of certainty had been planned there.

'I will look after them. I will make sure they are taken care off.'

He spoke to the nothingness in the air. It looked like the bodies of the dead roaches in the trail had been fertilized by in. Small and sharp points came out of their backs, pointing at the fact that they had the same texture like the organ he had looked after. The first signs of it came.

It wouldn't be safe. What had I been thinking?

Granth stepped in and started crushing them underneath his foot. The delusion had to be stopped immediately as he realized what might happen if he were to give it free reign. It couldn't grow and couldn't spread either.

He wouldn't allow it under any circumstance whatsoever. That danger would bring doom upon him and upon any man who stumbled into contact with it. But those things grew on bread. He stomped it as quickly as possible. What else had it been there?

Moisture, it grew on it. But that had been enough, as another catastrophe had been prevented, for as long as it appeared to have been. The air wouldn't be clear for hours but the wind came from the end of the tunnel.

One way or another, he would master the altar, no matter what it took. No compassion was left for anyone else.

Otherwise, the streets were quiet in the night. Solace remained an alternative for everyone else who stumbled like stray cats and left their own behind. Danger came over the fact that there were feline heads rolling through the night with no explanation. And only a selected few appeared to pay attention to them to carry on the strange image they bore. Their every movement had been a play.

It was a strange life it bought into. This cat head joined the ranks of a tiny flock of flying cat heads which came right through the night. Their eyes were emerald and cut in black halves, and their screeches were rather hard to hear as if they had little intention on being heard. As closely related to anything important, there was an important desire to know of anger.

As their flock met with a rival one they jousting before they stopped, looking below them in awe. Bodies suddenly turned and positioned so they could catch their heads in case they fell. Dumb things, you were supposed to be in hiding.

‘This is enough for the night. We may be caught if we wait for too long. Listen to this, we will meet again at the same hour tomorrow.’

‘Very well, fare thee well and make sure you slay and satiate the hunger by whatever means you can. No one shall look down on whatever you desire most.’

Anger and annoyance, distrust came onto them as soon as they fell behind. They hid the fact, now that each of them was out of place they were no longer alone. As they face split in halves they revealed two perfectly shaped cat-faces which had united through a kiss to keep this facade.

‘No one shall find out secret.’

One said to the other, looking at its precious twinned-colored eyes. Their whiskers shook and this could be mistaken as an act of peril and one of mistrust.

‘We need to be truthful to one another, shouldn’t we? I think this is ending us both. We cannot continue this connection forever, we can’t keep living in hiding as one head. Sooner or later we shall be dead and everything we’ll ever have experienced is ourselves.’

‘Why would you want to leave me now? I thought you were meant for me.’

Though one of the bodies split as well, revealing their ability to spread like some cat’s paw, a plant-like twist which wrapped itself like some kind of moving fist against the building in an attempt to regain its head. It wasn’t quaint, how it stopped and got affected. This self-dissection had been so dangerous that it revealed its one weakness, being contact with the air in its most virulent form. A bubble formed on its back and popped.

The body fell on the ground and died, wrapping its many legs, or fingers on top. As they rested in that position, it couldn’t have been clearer what went on.

‘I believe your body died. Down there, I see it now. Only my body remains there, are you certain you don’t want to be with me now?’

‘There’s no other place for you to go any longer.’

‘I’ll be fine now, no more arrangements, nothing holding me back any longer.’

One half left and never came back. Now, all he was left with was a crawling head with a head, half a body and that moment in his mind. They would never see each other again.

But there were darker things below, in the machinations made by the engineers. These passive creatures, these felines had been observed. For, in them, there had been higher meanings, more hope for some experiments to be made.

Since their bodies were highly mobile, plastic and shapeable, they could be used. Not only had they been spread and cornered, but they had been misshapen into the most damned things possible. And the engineers didn't even have to approach them.

First one taken, but not to be mistaken for anything physical. The test arrived, by forcing its body to push in every direction, it had been concurred that it wasn't completely malleable. It had been completely destroyed and killed then. It looked like this twist into the other form had been only a way of unwrapping the insides into its outsides, which had granted it mobility.

But what if they could be separated? A thin layer of meat would walk as weightless as a feather, bearing only its hollow insides as well as the hair which hid everything else. The insides were much more valuable, especially mixed with another type of oil they had messed with.

It gave like to a whole new fluid body. The many claw-like legs had been able to crawl and mount walls with a much deeper ease.

The first coming had ended, and there were bricks which had been replaced after they had been drawn outside. Though they may have looked out of place, no one wondered and no one cared about the many needs which were encompassed by this desire.

Creation could be attained by it eventually. Sooner or later, the engineers brooded on a way to create life of their own without being forced to repurpose what they had and when it happened. There'd be no one safe in town.

'I shall master you by whatever means possible, this is what I have attained, the dread of many living a thing, dampness from within and a body which may not be seen by normal eyes.'

He had brought a mass of moist and transparent body of a sea-shalp. It looked like a manta-ray but flatter and broader and almost white-imploding in the water. As it swam and wrapped itself around the stone, it had been spread as it was time for him to return back home.

Granth would enter it now, down the hole, and never come back to life as he was in the throng. As he entered now, knowingly afraid of the consequences and the mere fact that there could be no return if he had failed this time, he came to say goodbye, for one last time to the world.

'They shall never find my body now. I know that by the time I will submerge, the water will have spilled in the drain and the body of the sea-shalp will have disintegrated in the air.'

There hadn't been any hope to begin with that I may ever escape.'

Granth looked through the sledge of stones, and he thought he almost saw them moving. It was as strange a thought as that of inaction. He was being drawn towards escape now, no longer thinking of anything in particular. There had been a chance for him to return and pull out when the sudden feeling of drowning began taking him by surprise but that had been it.

He pulled himself upward out of shock but the process already started with him not being on board with it any longer. The sea-shalp was already partly gone and as he plucked himself out, above the chest area, he's been cut, but there no bleeding as he bounced and threw himself over the ground.

It was painful to watch, and to feel him not full-bodied any longer. His eyes flashed, his irises extended and shrunk as soon as it happened and it a strange kind of complexion, they appeared. From their strange world, they came again, stepping in through the threshold to pick their servant up. As soon as he was dragged and placed, taken and left for no lack of grace floating in their peculiar world, he looked around and saw only the stars in the distance.

Was this an illusion? They weren't standing on anything at all, they weren't falling, they weren't trying to do anything, and it was only that. It felt calm, but this wasn't space. He saw their barely visible feet, in numbers of four, standing on some flat space-flatness. An area which had been obscurely untouched, which felt unnervingly brought to some sense of loneliness.

Never had he felt such an alienation as he had felt then, even when met by all that time inside his basement. Neither of them spoke to him or changed their sight any longer, they were see-through but they didn't show any of the warmth belonging to the stars. Only the cold touch of space remained.

'I see that I cannot move past this basement.'

He said once he floated enough to be aware of the surroundings of his cage. Granth was saddened by the fact that he would float there in this state, for as long as the foreseeable future could tell, but he resigned to his fate.

There, out there, in the confines of a locked space, the man remained, and of his altar and the purpose of it, not a single thought remained.

'It's hard to tell how many of them are legitimate, Catherine. Sometimes I feel as if going through the files inside the archive only to be met by the most fictitious stories I could be met by.

Not a single thing works. There's nothing which may work, not a single desire, not one way back once you've gone through them. Even if there's some truth to them, it can't all be what they make of these cases.

Either we're in a world of liars, cheats or.'

‘Your coffee is getting cold Gourney. ‘

‘I’m sorry.’

‘It’s not easy you know, with everything going on for so long, with people dying or leaving, perhaps people’s mind started sparking again.

As a way to cope with their problems, you know? I know I would do the same if I was in their position and if I hadn’t such a decent life.’

‘This was a decent life, hasn’t it?’

Gourney tried to keep his hand on top of her but she drew away. It wasn’t easy, their lives here hadn’t been easier, nor had he tried to make up for it any longer. But life moved on nonetheless. They couldn’t push it through any longer, the lies and the hidden calls and.

‘No one’s going to return from the dead either, unless some of those stories are actually true. No one wants to commit anymore to anything else than their simple jobs.

It’s not something I’m proud of, Catherine, but I’m trying.’

She felt distant, both of them had, running their fingers around the outer rims of their mugs. His every attempt to get somewhere ended up bringing something from the past that neither of them wanted to remember.

Remember, remember, it was hard to cope with a memory which didn’t show it right. The apartment complex which had burnt down, not completely, to be minded of it, nothing was right any longer. Most of the top apartments and floors were still in some great condition but no one lives there any longer. It was abandoned.

Going through the night there had been an old habit for a particular older man who couldn’t give up on the past. Luckily, there wasn’t any danger there, from what he could tell. He had carried a tiny face mask before planning on heading for the basement of the building. It was dangerous down there. It looked like the dust and the fragments of tiny stones had found themselves lodged and merged with the walls.

It gave the impression of some out of this world vision made out of moving tiny hands popping out of every side, including the pillars and the pipes, fingerless but long and wide. And none of them pushed away from the source from which they came. Without paying any attention to it, he started checking around with his flashlight.

Though the complex was made in the least eight decades, it stood the test of time. Its foundation was still strong and refused to give in. To be sure about it, one could draw the conclusion that there wasn’t any way to return now. He had dwelled too deep in for his curiosity to be satiated. The deeper he went, the harder it had become to desire some return.

‘It must be here, I know you must’ve left something on your track Fredrick. Sloppy, that’s what you are, that’s what you always were, and I need to find it.’

He weighted what that thing could be, anything of the kind. Without a doubt, it hadn’t been right. This was his mode of being incognito, getting through the narrowing passage, which only dictated that the walls would push inwardly with every passing second. Perhaps it was an illusion of some kind or not, but he couldn’t focus on it for too long, as it blurred his vision and his sight. It was important to him to get away from all those fact, and all those memories.

He saw the mice down there, not the big ones but the tiny ones, laying dead, eaten by rats. It was a sad turn, seeing how they were so nasty in their appetite.

‘I wish I knew where this was going, but I have to return.’

It was the only decent choice, without a doubt. No one wanted to care about what was going down there. His neighbors had remained up there during his lifetime and not a single one tried getting here for some reason. There wasn’t any way for him to return any longer, not to his past nor to any other place than this one, henceforth, the only option remained to continue.

Until the crackle came, someone was there with him. Without a way of knowing if the candle in his hand would last, he looked at the many inched and squared pillars and noticed how many of them were out there. Whoever was there with him could only bring him closer to resentment, clearly something wasn’t working right. He could be anywhere, at any time. The thickness they had made it so they could hide a big enough figure that he couldn’t fight it off.

‘Show yourself or I’ll draw my revolver.’

It was a bluff, he had run out of ammunition and of means of getting it by shady means a long time ago. Now he kept it with him to scare off the strangers, no one approached him too often any longer. There was this dangerous look on his face which never went away. The strangers were kept at bay.

‘I’m not going to give you a second warning now.’

Within his reach there were a few things which didn’t go right. First the constant watch at the base of the pillar on his left. Something was constantly drawing it a few patches of the dust which formed most of the ground area there. And there was that constantly blowing air which pulled itself in, with more than a little care.

It couldn’t have been questioned by any means, why they were there, those moving tails. Fur never came in that shade, but he started running away only to be met by the standing man. He was there, after all this seeking and searching and this paranoia, the man was there!

He had found Freddrick, without a care for himself, alone in this obscure world. He felt threatened by his mere presence there, especially since he stood there like a wax statue, unmoving. The image that followed was the reason he decided to fall back. An insect leg, sharp and jointed like a scythe came from inside his belly, making way for a big sagging bulge at each tip which connected the many legs which came after.

They kept exiting and exiting from inside him gut and chest until there wasn't anywhere else from them to come out from. It had not only left a mark, but it released him from the pain of standing.

I hadn't a choice then but to run, as far away as possible, not to be caught or estranged from my feelings of disgust, I held it in my until I had made it to the stairs. Before emptying my stomach, I close the door behind and heard the end of the chase.

The distance had been long but I believe I had made it through fast enough for it not to make a difference. My legs were fine. It was the strangest feeling I had ever felt, my legs were working, more than unnaturally so. I should not have been able to make this spring especially for such a distance. My search wasn't over yet, but I think there was something wrong with them.

Somehow the muscle had grown back and I could see two bulks of meat there, hardened, even worse, hard of touch. They felt too hard for them to be made out of muscle alone. I suspected something was resting there, two of them, or.

I had to get away from the area and make it to one of the rooms. There was no one to care if I broken and pushed down one of the doors, since they left. It was one of the most frightening things I could have ever felt, and I knew I had left that dusty area with something unnatural in me.

Was that really him? I could only wonder and think about it while trying not to do anything rash. Regardless of it, something did come out of his body, so what if it came inside of me?

He wondered whether or not it would be too risky, too dangerous to act on it. Either it would be an impulse or such an action which would cripple him at least on one side. But he was far too set on it that this wasn't right. It wasn't natural, or humane, how a man could grow back his strength in such a short span of time.

'But with what now? What could I use?'

The kitchen was free and there were plenty of some sharp tools he may be able to use. Neither he nor anyone else might care about what was to happen there. It was only a matter of time until they broke off this illusion. If they grew inside of him and it was too late, he could only turn the knife on his throat instead of his muscle.

I need a rag to clasp on with my teeth, give me anything. The sheets spread on the bed were his first go-to. He bit on a roll he made out of them after rolling them around. There was a turn at how it came to be. As the gushing wound started being opened by him he noticed the pupa growing inside his muscle. It managed to cut off the blood supply around the area so it could avoid making a mess from bleeding.

What had disturbed him the most was the fact that he didn't feel any pain at all. As he went on to cut through the pupa, he felt the stench of its secretion. While bleeding, it started grasping and receding as its development had been not only reversed but it had begun drawing the sustenance from its shell, in a way which had been unwanted and undesired. It pushed out of him and fell on the ground, leaving that empty gap inside of his leg.

Something had to replace that, and his alternatives were ill. He couldn't think of anything else for not, but he had enough time to come up with something, as long as he didn't bleed. You still got one, he said, within his mind, being more coherent now than ever.

By the door there came the creaks. If someone or something headed it, he would be exposed, at for now, he lost the feeling of strength he had felt inside his muscles. Without a doubt, this end would leave him crippled by as much pain as he could muster. Not much to his mind, he came to cut through the other side and immediately expelled the other pupa out.

They bled and squirmed for one last time, like some prunes which had been staunched by the pain of having no host. In their parasitical embrace, they had attempted to sprout a leg or two in order to pierce through one another's bodies so they may try to draw sustenance from one another.

I couldn't risk allowing them to find a way to reattach to my body. No, I threw myself away and crawled, a thing they would be more than likely unable to proceed with. Neither of them followed, without a single doubt or an important jerk. A reaction came to him as fast as it was over.

He needed to sew his flaps back but not until something would be shoved inside. It wasn't easy cutting through one of the legs beneath the bed, especially with a dull knife, slowly as well, as he desired to draw no attention to himself and make no sound. A conscious effort had been made to look away into the sight of the scope on the door.

No one was there on the other side, the light had been clear enough. On the other side, there was a certain break.

With a jolt of pain which finally kicked in, he pushed the small joint of wood inside the gap. It was the right side, as both of the pupas hadn't been big enough. He hadn't anything to sew it with, which left him with nothing but a few bed sheets wrapped around his legs. The man passed out in the room.

But things weren't as damaging on other islands as they had been there. No, they may have been scared and lay in some kind of balance but there was one abandoned one, from which an obscure dye had been taken away.

It hadn't been completely abandoned, even though the homes looked as if they had been struck one way or another by some stone-fall, or bitter taste of their intruders. Stalkish people, but they were very much alive and stood hiding into plain sight.

They gathered only during their rituals. And awe and behold, their might was nasty, their method begged for repulse.

'We need to bring back one of our own. He fell and cracked his skull.'

These strange gatherers wore a plethora of body pains which symbolized the maddest of paintings, image of running men burning and sights of torture which were not only embed but had the sight of oil. Various pigments had been used not only for the imagery but for the very master-like appearance which had been propagated on them.

It was strange now. His head looked normal with all those tiny bloody bodies which had gathered on the man's bald head. A few of them were barely covered in the most simple of fashion. But there was one thing which stuck out. Fragments of sharp bone which shot and spread out of their bodies, acting like long fingers which came out.

Spider lings would often show some kind of jealousy to the fact that they crawled and tried looking at them. For human beings, they were rather docile and static. They allowed them inner bone structures and sutures to act for them instead of them using their limbs and tools.

'How shall we proceed about it? Is he worth it to be revived or should we sacrifice him and make some dye?'

'Careful now Azhol, if this goes wrong, we shall have to deal with the inner extraction, which may be dangerous for all of us. It could jeopardize our very existence.'

Fear was displayed at the fact that those weren't entirely bones, they had muscles and hid themselves inside. But they were dominators, crawlers, hider and beings which had possessed all of them. And they weren't in this world, but theirs. Inter-dimensional projected creatures, which bore their normal shapes in their plane of existence but here they could only draw the texture of the nearest organ or state they could get a grasp of.

For some of them it was bone, for others, muscle came out, and in rarer occasions, fish-like limbs had been stored after coming into contact with their guts and digested food. But they had allowed this symbiosis as a result of their summon.

'It's a hard trade to make do with. Let us not try angering one of our benefactors or we may find ourselves entirely dismissed from being alive.'

'Fien, if you don't trust me with this, then there can be no unity amongst us. And if there's none, perhaps there's no reason to live after all.'

Everyone turned towards the member who bore of long and curved knife. It was definitely not out of the qualm that he felt going through it again.

‘Let us at least attempt to release it from its prison.’

He approached and began cutting him apart with the sole desire of taking everything apart, bones, ribs, and the insides, which looked paling in comparison to that thing which had manifested in it. They were shallow and non-human in appearance, set like cast to cover for the peculiarness inside.

‘I will be the first one to begin by saying, oh, one possessor, we owe our lives to you. Without your benevolence, we may not have been kept alive.’

No answer but it came to leave as soon as there was a decent entry for it to acquire, going through a cloak of energy which pulsed itself against the insides and the outside rim above the point where it ended. Behind it, this receding mass left a tiny pool which engulfed the rest of the body in a visible aura which set itself apart by the runes and drawings beneath it.

The black chalk marks became red and ochre, being filled with the likes of the dye.

‘Bring in one of the cauldrons, I believe we may have enough to fill one this time.’

As they gathered around and started bowing and standing still while he, who cherished himself as a murderer of men, started cutting himself to mix one of his own likes of lifeblood in an utmost shamanistic manner. Winds obeyed his call and there came the call of the storm. Around their abandoned city, the sea roared and then, the portal had awakened for one moment.

Between their worlds, the dye manifested solid in form, travelling between their two dimensions as mined ore. It needed to be combined with the remnants of the body of a human and as that happened, Fien suddenly roared.

‘We bring into this world another one of your magnificent gifts so we may be repulsed amidst this engulfance of power. As we bask in its essence we grow so much stronger that we may inflict upon this world the means of opening a permanent gateway which may one day allow you full entry and the satisfaction that we may be delivered to you.’

Fien was humble and naive. He didn’t know that entry was impossible for their kind and with each attempt at the ritual and with each attempted waste of the dye inside the ground and on their island, they brought themselves closer to their world.

This exchange would only, suffice to say, bring them there, to their new masters. Deliver their island to their mad world. It was a jest for them, as their projections had only managed to hurt them as far as they had now.

‘Listen, I am merely trying to come here as a servant not as a defiler. I want you to come and change this empty world of us with hope that we may be set free from it.’

‘Cease the ritual, look, the man had already been formed into the dye. His body melted and became solidified but it won’t last.

This communion shouldn’t have lasted this long, quick, gather it before it vanishes away.’

‘Don’t pause the ritual, I have to see it. I have to look into their world and see for myself.’

How they build their own stars and their own decks which floated into space, adjacent to their own unitary planet, which had the utilitarian purpose of delivering that glow which granted them flight and teleportation. They could move on any plane out there and walk on their own artificial stars.

Sometimes, their legs grew so long that they walked like longer-legged bacteriophage which had lost its body and its head but bore that tiny sack instead. Their walkers still looked like blades which curved around the edges. Deviations occurred in which their legs had been shorted and that mass above them evolved to acquire permanent flight.

But they showed no feature, as they needn’t one. What they had was that multiple consciousnesses which spread across dimensions, each working on itself like some inner tunnel of webs, each string sending some message to each side.

And their decks were steady and still, wide enough for human settlements to be made. It was for that reason why he wanted them to come. If their planet could achieve what they had achieved, there’d be hope for humanity that they may overcome their primal fears.

‘Enough of this, Fiend, you’re changing.’

The man looked at himself and saw that he had almost grown, enough that he stood at risk of losing his opposable toes and fingers in exchange of the growth. His fingers had begun being joined together, his eyes almost got encompassed by an epicanthic fold. Now he looked in some obscure fashion which could only make him look more paranoid that he had been.

In that moment he winced and fell, caught by the others as well as the man who had come.

‘It’s fine, I’ll be fine. We have gone a long way now to stop and I have seen them, I have taken a look into them and I am satisfied.’

An event like this could only be obscured by the fact that there was no one around to see it happen again. No one was supposed to lay eyes on it, not even the least of the dreadful lookers which gathered from around the island, which only reinforced the fact that it hadn't been abandoned at all, rather, it had been safe to dwell.

The storm ended, the sea at rest, now there came the likes of looking, at which had been most detested. It happened around their soil now. Only one important aspect of the dye was present, that being the fact that it was near impossible to miss. Like splats of ink, they were widespread over tiny areas, hidden from sight at times and lost.

Their dinner had been over by now. Goruney would take her to see what the fuss had been about. It was near the gates now, still on-going despite the Mayor's absence that they went and saw what was going on.

'I appear to be quite tense as of lately, Catherine and I think it's all because of you.'

'Why would that be sir? I'm only your secretary, nothing more. You don't need to pay any attention to me at all. I could be working around my desk all day, you could be in your office and afterwards, we could both be on our separate way.'

You never informed me of there being something more out there.'

'Haven't we discussed this on a separate occasion?'

'We were.'

It was a stop. They had blocked the road now, even as close as it would boggle through the mass of people. Obviously neither of them had been indisposed to move aside. This would be a dead end now.

'There are ways to make a man out of the slimiest of pieces. If I could make two of you instead of one, my servants, you shall achieve something unbearably close to a union of servitude. From this bond there'd be no return from and you shall force yourself to breed with the bats I had found you.'

The professor came to his senses now. 'Call me Lothius, that should fit me from this moment to the one I die. Without this word, I shall be known as one who springs into the blasted world which stands there lost and dying.'

His bodies had been found in some abandoned slop and within his disturbing lack of hope and anger, he came back to the abode. There they awaited form him, the servants quaint, standing for their master. It was the sight of the disaster which turned it into a hopeless approach.

'Your bodies had been broken, I see. What's in it for me that I may look for into rebuilding the meat? I see that it's inevitable and that you may never get to live through the unity. Perhaps I was wrong in my experiments but make no mistakes, as I won't be as hard of head any longer.'

He nodded and looked inside the room. The bag was still being populated by the roaches as it would appear. There, that table would be perfect, jointed with metal bonds, he would keep all of them in place stacked one next to the other. It was impressive how well he worked in such a short notice, getting through his head that it wasn't important that they were dead. On the contrary, it had been irrelevant.

As soon as he has placed them into the rightful positions, they were locked so tightly that their wrists disobeyed. Within a few moments, the grunts appeared. Something about his very lab made them wake up from their rigor mortis and start jerking with their still-dead expressions on their faces. IT shouldn't have been something to be proud of but they went on. It was an unseeingly wrong way of looking at it, but he inserted the amionatic fluids through their sides, connecting all of them.

First it melted their insides, which immediately hardened together, creating their whole body into a piece. Then, it was a simple jerk which pushed onward and tried leaping on itself as soon as they might be able to make an attempt for escape.

'Let go, you need to let go, do you understand? We cannot have you try ruining these inhibitors.'

The tube jerked as the giant lance-like injector reeled to the side. In a self-atrophying attempt to seal their own wound, they pushed and dragged the two open sides together, making it so they couldn't even hope for any return to the living.

In a momentary break they were dead again. From their chest there burst an opening from which one, one of the four bodies came a man who stood there unscathed. He was frictionless and emotionless, pale, dead in the head. This paranoia he had couldn't force him to do anything ever since he had entered into contact with them.

Such an obscure emotion was counteracted only by the need to pull away and hide. In his bed of many uncouneted materials and chemicals, he waited. What would happen if I were to draw his attention to me?

Lothius couldn't help but wander at the man. Not only had he been deranged but that peeling pile of bodies which he left behind acted like a hatching device. Don't move, let it act on its own.

The servants which by now were mere machines themselves went forward and tried interacting with this pale man. He ignored their simple existence and walked away towards the door. Despite being exposed to the nakedness he showed, the professor managed to look down at the lack of genitals which had been replaced with an umbilical cord that had dragged behind and buried itself if not grew inside of his other opening.

This creature didn't appear to have the capability to fully open its mouth or nose, but what it possessed, for the offspring of a few bodies, was the intelligence needed to open the door. It moved like a strange corpse on the swinging streets which lay deformed, either twisted to the side or moving up and down. It wasn't a certainty any longer. He rushed towards the door and closed himself in, vowing never to let anything of the kind happen again.

‘Servants, prepare the underside furnace, we need to get rid of the bodies as soon as possible.’

It was settled in that moment, to be fair about it, there wasn’t any need to draw away any longer. His tone had that monotone sting which wanted to leap about, out of his throat. The bodies postulated again and it had been time to get rid of them before they showed any kind of sign of coming back to life. This state of living they were in had not only been disturbing but it would be completely useless to him. In a short amount of time they had dragged them away.

‘It is done then. We’re in desperate need of better, fresher feed for our experiments. Sentience is far from being achieved now.’

It had been directed at the work in progress which spanned in the middle of the room. Quaint but unnervingly acknowledged, he took into consideration what he had released on the streets.

A man who looked like he was made out of clay, that’s what, happened to him. He stumbled and fell into the dirt, which nastily gave him the appearance of being jerkily succumbed into the muck. But he knew where to walk and how to avoid being seen then.

‘That’s about for, dear, or at least nearing five. Don’t get trapped now into what they said in the newspaper, the weather and the rowing boat, hah. If I didn’t know any better, there’d be a storm right now, inside our huts.’

‘Well, that’s about fine and dandy, say, is that one of...’

Repugnant to the touch, he left his mark there. Over prolonged periods of touching walls, he had developed a mark which sacrificed a single layer of his skin against the crop of the shingles he touched. It moved and appeared to live a life of its own. No longer disturbed by the likes of what that meant for him, he took the initiative and charged with his face against a corner of one of the nearest buildings he could lay eyes upon.

Not so much as it was right, he looked ready. It was in the moment of this perplexity that he had found himself bashed and beaten, his face and the insides of it crushed to smithereens, resting inside the walls as they moved. He was being absorbed now, by the wall. It wasn’t likely that he was going to be seen like a moving human figure, as everything which had made him entirely went through the cracks between the many bricks.

The process paused and he was left without a head, his throat, and a convex entry into his chest. As disturbingly aware of it as he had been, there was something almost instinctively left in the body which made him pull back. Drawn to the liquids on the ground, he bent and started wriggling free of this condition. It was near the isolation inside the quarrel he had found inside the honey-posts he found underneath the metal grates which lead to the sewers that he found refuge.

A few of them remained, now laying in some kind of abandonment. He wanted to feel as if there was some desire to throw him forward and cut through them. It was the noises which alerted him mostly, which couldn't have been ignored at all.

From about the core of the insides of his body, pulled a large set of crawling livers. Every organ which had lain in that hatchery which had been given to him was there. And they grew tiny wings, taking from the honey-post they were in, as well as their large hybridization of mouth-incisors which had granted them that vile sight. Either one eye or multiple eyes remained strapped on them, but regardless of their appearance, they had been loyal to their master.

It wasn't fair that they would seek a way out, but that had been it. They ate through the few bodies they had gone into contact with. Of course they weren't human but some weak and frail creatures which had been left for them. No mistake could've been made or set about it.

Neither act would've been right, if seen by someone who was to judge them for their acts of clergy. As soon as they had been done with it, they brought some fire and light and made way for the rotten-honey candles, which turned the sewers in a glowing tunnel of a yellowish-orange hole.

Most of them stopped, after noticing not the liquids which had been pushed through the system, but the one engineer who had been present there. He waited and appeared to be set for the strike. He had gotten way too defensive over their intrusion.

'He is dangerous, don't go near him.'

It was the first of the livers who spoke. Pieces of brain had been applied to them in a manner which warned of the fact that the Damaged Man could breed, even though he hadn't the required organs for it. Or had he? After all, there was a woman inside that pile, and he had inherited a pseudo-uterus amongst other inner workings which turned him into a strange living thing.

'And if we do? Don't you think the four of us could take him? I've seen enough, I've eaten enough and rested. Who shall take me if not a worthy opponent?

We have fire. Why would he hide in the dark if he isn't afraid of the light?'

The engineer's eyes activated then, no longer trying to mask his aggression. They were almost burning in those sockets while trying to push away as much force as they could. In the position he stood, three of the front legs had come to be extended as it turned into a defensive position. All of them aimed for the front, though there wasn't a single question about the amount of damage they could do.

Without a way of knowing about its agility or the way through which it wanted to go forward and have at them, they could only gather this.

‘It’s protective of its territory, isn’t it? I do not think we should approach it, nor the tunnel it stands a guard for.’

‘We are still dependant on that one who gave birth to us. What if it desires to draw closer and drive our maker away?’

‘Then we shall retaliate in that case, but do not push our luck now. Look around you, this wall built by them. Look, there are various raised blocks of stone for it to grab on.’

So many of them had been left about everywhere one could see. It was an infestation of stone there which made every touch much worse than it should’ve been since they filled them like tiny fountains which bore the same substance which had been used to clean their blades.

‘Retreat before we succumb to them.’

With the tone in play, they started drawing forward and as they had, they went missing from that underground stage. It was a missed chance which couldn’t be brushed away. But they had retreated in time that they could stay out of sight. As more engineers appeared and flooded the place in their presence. It was obvious that they didn’t like intruders.

And their stored bio-mass had been taken and put to great use. Various wall climbers and long bowed bodies had been made. Large legs pushed and climbed on both of the opposite walls while carrying giant webs which had been outstretched to resemble hardened ropes. On both sides the two pair of legs moved ever so slowly as to avoid revealing themselves and the way through which they moved.

Four feet lay as suckers, producing out of their leg joints a living green clutch which sent signals to all four of them. in case that anything could’ve gone wrong, the engineers made three more of them and placed them like sentries.

These would stand there and expand as quickly as one of the intruders appeared. It was, for the time being their only task. Neither would they be allowed to advance, nor would they be allowed to fight back if one were to gnaw as them. It was a mere effort through which they stood there, with the purpose of elevating themselves as far away from them as they could.

‘I need to see what’s wrong with it.’

‘What would that be?’

Gourney stared at her. For no reason she wanted to go back to the archives as fast as possible, with no consideration over their day off. They haven’t even been gone that long off though their schedule had been clear, appointments would have to be worked out somehow and this.

‘You’ve seen something you didn’t like, is that it? Come on Catherine, you’ve been treating me with silence ever since that thing popped inside your head and I know you well enough, you know?’

I know that when it pops in your head, you won’t stop at it.’

‘Here, I want you to look at something, I know it’s supposed to be our day off but I can’t help it. This file, every time I keep staring at it, there’s a change. Either the people in it, or the location, the details, the images, everything.

Even now, look, this building wasn’t supposed to be here. And this statue had been chipped around its nose and ears.’

‘All right, I suppose someone’s in for us. You don’t think someone at the higher offices are playing tricks on you, do you?’

‘No, I would’ve noticed, I would know, trust me. I’ve got my intuition here and it’s telling me this, there’s something wrong with this case. It’s not likely that I’ll find myself saying this that often, but I need you Gourney.

I only wanted to return because of this, because I noticed a street amongst our way to the dock and saw the same building, which made me think of it.’

‘That’s a sharp memory you have there, but, are you sure it wasn’t a coincidence? It’s not highly unlikely that the architecture got a bit too repetitive, so why not scrawl away?’

I don’t think this may be able to lead to any place, so why bother?’

‘Because, even the witnesses and the sights inside of it change, either for the worst or for the best, people either completely died or got replaced with something inside of it.

I think we should check it out.’

‘No, that’s completely out of question. If you have a suspicion of a place that’s even remotely as dangerous as the cases we’re supposed to be archiving, then we’ll have no option but to avoid it at all costs. Can’t you see that we can’t go through it?’

It’s likely that we may never return to our lives if we go there, perhaps we’ll simply die. You know what happens with most people we’ve interacted with, every single time, either it’s the broken survivors or the families of the deceased.

This never ends well.’

He turned. Again, that man out there. This wasn't the time for him to be distracted by it. But he was preparing to take a piece of the old copters'. around him lay a strapped belt of tools he carried around for some reason. It couldn't be ignored.

Before turning he had looked at the door past her. Both of them had defaulted to his office with the file, so of course he'd have his door stuck in the hinge. It was a tiny bit open, enough that he could see a creature which had been so thin that it looked like it lived between the space between the closed door and the relapse which went forth.

Only a line could be made out of him but he had a head and eyes, a long tongue, perhaps the presence of multiple arms and legs as well. They had not only overlapped but went through its body several times.

'I can't think well inside the office, I feel as if I'm suffocating.'

'Gourney, please, you know I cannot do this by myself. It's too dangerous for one person.'

'Now, that's an understatement.'

What exactly was going on there?

Common sense dictated that neither of them was properly suited for such a journey, yet common sense need not apply. She wasn't going to listen to him, that much was obvious by now, but why did she have the need to tell him?

'I want you to come with me there, the two of us inspecting that place.'

'Do you still not realize how dangerous it is? If something goes off like it always does with those cases, then there'll be no office to return to.'

As a matter of fact, there'll be nothing to come back for at all. Neither of us will be able to return unscathed.'

'Gourney, I know the risks well enough, you don't have to keep telling me about them. But I have a feeling that I need to be there. I can't necessarily explain why but it's something in my guts.'

'Why?'

'Follow me if you want to know why, or stay here and get buried in your desk. Either way, it will be fine with me.'

She blew me off as soon as the door closed. I couldn't let her go like that. No one with half a mind could.

'Twenty of them, I see.'

They were counted off the walls, those promiscuous yellow thrice headed mollusk-arms. They carried a bunch of heads which had grown on the backs of their muscle shades, pushing some vein pumps through the back of their heads. In so far they grew up to fantastic sizes until it was obvious that they no longer needed sustenance.

‘Is it safe to draw near them? Won’t they retaliate?’

‘Stop right there, I think I see something drooping from the backs of theirs heads. It doesn’t look safe enough. We should draw back.’

‘No, not until I had the pleasure of cataloging them. I have to see all of them there. Look at how many pores are popping off from the back of their heads.’

What one of the two inspectors pointed at was the yellow acidic substance which shot from the back of one of its head. It was yellow and it managed to penetrate the skull, pushing through the back joint of the forearm contraption. It had a tiny amount of rolled pinchers which had formed circles in their numbers. As if that alone hadn’t been enough for them, they bore them on every side, which grasped and pushed onward.

It had to be dangerous. Over the fact that some of the pinchers actually extended and started forming the yellow mustard-looking acid into a long string, until it had become rope-like in appearance. Not only had it a means of defending itself, but it had been threatened, driven to a corner, while it had been forced to attack.

‘Listen to me, Uljberk, we are already out of our area of expertise, we cannot stand here any longer.’

They turned, finally content with the information Uljberk had gotten for him. It wasn’t fair that they would get through it so soon, but they were both met with an unquestionable image which resembled that of a trap. It was the end of the road for either of them, who had their escape being trapped and sealed off.

‘I told you to get away, haven’t I? Look at what you’ve done now. Neither of us will live.’

No one appeared to be paying too much attention to them. Since both of them went on an unquestionable turn, they had undertaken a distance which couldn’t be anything but unquestionable insane. A few people passed, but only one of them noticed something about them.

From the side, they have had their eyes pushed a few millimeters out of their sockets. In that way, it couldn’t be questioned at all by any other means. They were partially blinded and forced into that strange miasma the town carried, to each their own damning hole.

‘We need to flee as fast as possible, now!’

‘Don’t look behind you, no matter what, do not look behind!’

The shout arose with little consequences in mind, both of them being caught by their own politics in the matter. It was something so important for him, because he had taken so many pictures of them. He could actually see them there, their weird shapes, peculiar forms and the things in which they evolved.

From a quick comprehension of their bodies, he could see a pink carapace popping out.

‘Have you seen it as I have? I swear, I saw it there, in its full magnificence. They were trying to abandon their bodies and grow into them.’

‘I saw in, I swear, I saw it, but that will be the last thing I’ll ever see in my entire life I give in.’

One word and both of them could fall prey for what was going on there.’

‘Listen, I need something out of you. This isn’t going to be anything else but an attempt to get as far away as possible. But I cannot help it. They’re trying to get me, look, check my skin. I think I’ve been infested by something, yellow, no, green.’

It was by the intersection of a house they entered that they had the chance to hide and speak. Past the door, they crushed the lock closed and waited. Sooner or later they would find out where both of them went. This wasn’t a matter of if but when?

‘We have enough time to stay and hide out research.’

‘Are you mad? I’m not going to leave the pictures and the notes I’ve had the chance to pack in here at the hands of some, some...

Look at this mess, this isn’t the house of a normal person. This is the ram shack of a dumb iggit who must be addicted to some stimuli of some sort.’

‘Uljberk, my body is giving in, look.’

His companion revealed how far that yellow liquid went. By now his body and clothes had been encompassed and ruined. The sight of his long-time companion was harrowing, but there was nothing else he could ever think about, other than that evolving creature. It pushed forward as if from some diseased pucker, leaving the muscle and the heads behind.

In a way, it appeared rather hard and rubbery, big headed, kind of like a fossil, multiple headed and winged like an insect. But every piece of that body had that pink, audacious structure which couldn’t be identified as anything on their planet.

‘Very well, I shall leave you. But you already know this’

He packed up everything they had and left his vicinity, knowing they would be after him. Close to it, it was already an easy pick whether or not he'd have to pick a route to make contact with the outside world.

'I will do what I must to survive this.'

With a perfidious look, he made it through the house, snicking next to the sleeping couple. It would be mightily delightful if he was to wake them up, but that would be better asked for another day. So far he knew it more than useful that they were there. In the exact location he wanted them to be, at the precise moment when they entered the house.

It wouldn't be believable otherwise, but as they entered in their strange pairs, they completely disregarded his partner, moving through him as he simply split in front of them. It took him a long time to die now but at least he was unnervingly bent on that moment.

He would escape no matter what, with as little consideration for everyone as he could. Into the building now he went as there was little incentive to stop him. No one locked their doors. No one believed the neighborhood to be dangerous enough to warrant it. They were in for a surprise. Could I do it?

Could I flee unseen?

'You're not from around here, sir. What are you doing?'

That was late, far too late for him to give any kind of explanation. He was at the peak awareness, without being able to look away, he ran past him without looking back.

'Are you in a hurry fellow? It's mightily rude to appear out of nowhere and stroll like that.'

But the man spoke and far away, the bloke went into the servants' approach. He looked through the long way ahead and questioned what happened there. Above him he could feel the steps clocking in, each a hit of its own, strong enough for a tiny bull to have emerged. The doctor had been paying a lot of attention now.

He build a small wooden frame on which he connected some iron half-chubs of iron bolts which acted like some long-distanced movement detectors. Each time someone either put a lot of strength in his steps or a lot of people gave chase around an area of the town, one of the many bolts would tingle as it was attached to a long metallic string which stretched for miles at long rests.

'I see, oh I see. This is worthy of my notice. That's one of areas where they breed, I need to get one of them.

Make a note, will you?'

From inside the dark, this short-wheel legged stopper began pushing forth a small clicking-set of message battery. His tiny claps clicked in the words as he spoke them with an immediate and unquestionable clarity.'

'Need to plan extraction of specimen.'

He paused and looked around. The furnace had done a great job to turning that remaining pile to a shrubbery of ashes. But they were still hard to touch and he could still feel a structure underneath them. It was a small chance, one in a billion, that something would come out of it, but he concurred.

There were a few more bobs of the bolts but neither of them had been as strong as that one. Whoever was there was sure to anger them.

'More so, I shall rectify the mistake I have created and find a good replacement for my lost experiments. Perhaps we'll stumble upon a living one this time, and proceed from there.

End of note.'

Good, that should do it. The yellow light was fading, it mean that there was need for a replacement. He went through one of his undergarment of a chamber and went it. He sniffed. The smell of contamination wasn't there. Every time he opened the replacement canteen storage deposit, he risked it.

But it was a self-made deposit, so he couldn't bear it for long.

'On second thought, I need another note. In desperate need of getting a few more glowing body parts. Extraction from the non-glowing bodies of citizens needs some rethinking to be done.'

He kept various limbs inside canteens, which would be used as power sources. People weren't aware of these strange phenomena, but once these specific limbs were taken off and cut from the rest of their bodies, they would start emanating and producing energy. It took him a lot of trouble to acquire so many of them but he managed well.

'I see that there a shortage of supply which needs to be reinforced and exchanged.

Personal theory bound, they may be glowing for some reason, perhaps an infection which turned their bodies into living generators of electricity. I have noticed some marks left on the limbs I've cut. I suspect them as being mosquito mark.

But so far no glowing or electric mosquito has been ever near my findings. Even less so, I think they may only be the carriers.

And I have taken the opportunity to observe the change which occurs inside the limbs during a long period of time. Something isn't right with them. They appear to be slowly disappearing, leaving only their outflow line before leaving reality completely.

It is in my theory that they are taken from us, from my reach, transferred to theirs.

Second note ends here.'

He had left out the fact that they hadn't looked human any longer either. The fingers of a hand, for example would be stubbier, fatter, slithering as they freely moved without bones or joints. Had they always been that long?

What about the insides of the hand itself? Why was it that there wasn't any bulk of meat and bone? On top of it, that hand sealed itself completely, on the contrary, it had been growing slowly, trying to evade its canteen. No escapee so far had been observed. The replacement procedure had gone underway. A handful of experiments could reveal a good deal of much needed information about it, if only he had the means to conduct them. But now he was busy with it. He looked at the other canteens, noticing the source of contamination. In a few secluded cases, the limbs produced a fluid in which they swam for prolonged durations of time. While doing so, they exhausted themselves until the point where they couldn't sustain the fluid any longer, forcing them to evaporate from their vicinity.

He closed the deposit as soon as he was done with it. Now, he changed exactly what was needed of him to change. It'd be a quick swipe with not apparent result in which the connectors had been pulled from one canteen only to be placed in the other. In any other case, this would've been considered a case of foul play of the most instructive manner, but he hadn't the exact mind for it now.

Something was on his mind. The ones who had been released, he had to be somewhere out there, risking bringing too much attention. His mind was severely deteriorating and it wasn't helping. No, not in a single way, especially since sooner or later, they would find a way to invade each other's territories.

It was cold now, nonetheless. As it would be normally be after switching one source of power for another. Without a way to actually know whether the experiments would act up in the dark, he closed the door then so he'd be safe. For as wide of a worship of meat as this had been, going down a few feet inside the ground, there was always that chance that they may all come to life all of the sudden in search for the man responsible for their existence.

Seriously in doubt of them being truly dead, he kept them around various parts of his "deposits". They had been made for the sole reason of storing them, so he would either learn from his mistakes, or that he may be able to return to them one day to finish what he started. Sounds of crawling feet and dangling wheels came to his ears. Either those would have to be his servants or someone else. It was down at the midst of him being spotted by those creations that he tempted himself with opening and closing the door. Locking and unlocking it as if it were some kind of play.

Without any light, he could only see them vaguely but they were there.

‘Servant, I don’t remember having told you to follow me. You’re not allowed to be here. This is a restricted area, do you hear?’

The doctor wasn’t up to any of their games. They weren’t supposed to be acting up, not even in the midst of the absence of light. But he had also managed to see a whole new level on top of its head. An animal which was still attached to the electronic parts, that hadn’t supposed to happen. Not a single one of them had managed to maintain the stability needed for their continuation of living.

But this one, who looked like the combination of multiple creatures, not animals, seemed to have a will of its own. In the way it moved, the freedom expressed in twirls of shades in the obscure were heavy enough for him to abandon everything and go back into hiding. He wasn’t one of his own, more or less he had wagered that this one was perhaps an experiment belonging to someone else who has stumbled here by accident.

First signs of the approach came. It had been too dangerous. Another lock on the door followed by a waiting instilled in him by the desire to know. Nothing more than a guilty pleasure had occupied his mind then, to the wonder, would I look, or will I dare?

How dangerous a mess this had been, that he would try creeping even closer to opening it. Then, the light came on, dimly. This was worthy of him looking through the keyhole at least. And there, his confirmation had arrived. Standing on the other side was the texture of some eely-skin which drooped and pushed itself over as if something was trying to escape from inside of it. Its partial transparency only revealed some kind of darkly-hued membrane which pushed itself through in an attempt to make an escape.

‘Leave me be then, I can see that you are there, I order you to leave. Leave, leave, and don’t trap me in here. I will not allow myself to remain here for too long, do you understand? I’ve got needs to be taken care off.’

He paced through the room. The way it had been designed, it had been simply squared, on a large surface, with the canteens being stored inside a locker which stretched on the entirety of one of the walls facing the door and a partial half of its bulk which stared it. If one were to look from their side now, they’d see the hinges of the door being pushed forward a few meters through the block of rock.

On the left side, he’d see the generator as some traditional furnace-shaped stove which had been made out of metal, but which had all the wires and contraptions leading through this entire workshop be drawn from up there. The canteen would usually be placed on a metallic spike which inserted itself through the limb so it could begin the process of power extraction.

One light bulb remained on top of the ceiling, dangling back and forth at a solemn interval. Even the checkers-pattern on the floor appeared to be ancient by the looks of it, but that hadn't been as important. He had one of his abandoned laboratories next to the generator, covered by a green blanket which got him thinking.

If only I could fashion myself some acid, then I could get rid of it.

The dust had settled on it but that hadn't removed an inch out of its functionality, not even the visible cracks or the various in-smoked spots which spread like moving rims of quarrels. It was obvious that those weren't supposed be inside the glass corkscrews, but the fire should more pleasantly get rid of any kind of impurity, if one were to remain.

It wasn't going to be hard now, not since looking around drew his eyes to one of the desks below. He stored a well-kept car engine there. Carefully set on it, he started the process of removing the battery with the tools he had in store. He used a pair of dirt-ochre-blue-spackle gloves to avoid any unwanted contact while the procedure went on its way.

For the storage it was simple enough, he would use of the waste canteens, since there was no chance that those limbs may even rematerialize under no circumstance whatsoever, which had been followed by the boiling and the wait. It shouldn't have been well. But it was discerned that he would still be taken by surprise as the battering began.

Something truly wanted to get past that door and get it. Had it been lamentable in any kind of sense, he would've allowed it to come in but otherwise, there wasn't any interest into allowing it to come. The mood was set, the canteen now lay foul.

'I will give you a fair warning, so you may retreat. Do not come upon me or I shall inflict upon you a malady which may never be dealt with. Know that you shall suffer greatly from this intrusion.'

In the midst of the moment, everything had been stuck against him. As soon as the door opened, that one rube came, bearing the remorseless look of a damned lamb which had been groaning out of its sudden attachment to the half-faces of a few pigs, rodents and stacked mushrooms which had grown on it. This melt hadn't grown but appeared to have been poured like some kind of fluid metal on top of the rest of its elaborated devices.

He released the canteen, hearing its sound fade from the bottom of its voice box, as it charged into the lockers, turning itself down on its back. A scene of dread had been inquired, to the very doubt that it would live past the damage it had sustained. The two wheels failed to stay together and as the light came back in full force, he looked upon this creature, realizing that it hadn't been alone.

'You're not the same one I had seen before the keyhole. Where is the other one?'

As the deceased fiend ceased its struggle, the doctor went by door in furious remorse, looking for some way to see if there had been a sign of the escapee. Empty on both sides. It was unforgivable, seeing the struggle of the mushrooms of all the living parts which had been attached together. Only they struggled to get off and away. The rest of them simply died off.

‘What have I released now?’

He wondered after looking at the glimmer of a shade which came out of that body. For a moment, he thought he saw a spirit come out in the same exact shape as the creature which had fallen to his feet, with the vague missing bottom half. It floated through the same trajectory before going on ahead to disappear.

It was a miss which wouldn’t be given in. The world wasn’t prepared for them yet, he hadn’t been prepared for this acquired prosthesis of meat. And if it were fair, then, alas, I shall confess to my failure and bring an end to them.

Curiously observed, the lock hadn’t been broken despite the best attempts at it. There was some curve to it, but he hadn’t found a thing gone wrong.

‘Servants, come here immediately.’

They slowly accompanied one another and appeared to have a remissness of the closest kind. He had noticed the most important detail then. In their short fraud of blows, he saw the one thing which made him look at it like some deranged outlandish cretin. The walking metal box was missing, and the wheels as well, leaving the sight of the animal putrefaction as well as the mushrooms ahead.

He entered the vicinity and looked around, realizing that it was nowhere to be seen.

‘Clean that up, and drag the remains to the furnace.’

Obedience came without a second thought or a command. It was hard to be around them, especially after getting out of the way. He hadn’t thought about it then, but they were indistinguishable from one another without the add-ins of the animals. Without their upper bodies in store, this could happen again if he didn’t pay enough attention.

They’ll all need to be checked as soon as possible. Not a single one should be given the chance of a second retaliation if it can be avoided. He was aware of the effectiveness of the acid now. It would be more than useful for him to keep it in mind.

Back to the studies for now, as the crisis had been averted.

‘Jack, William, Mark, I’ll be honest with you. I am in great debt. You see, I need to clean my slate clean and reveal to you what I’ve done.

There are many houses which are under consideration.'

'Under what consideration?'

'They're in need for closure, as we say around here, Jack. This is a matter which bequest not urgency but complete silence and secrecy. I choose to believe that despite your appearances, no offence to your associates, William, that I can trust you.

But I'm taking a leap here. You, I'm considering simply giving them to the folk who are interesting into coming to live here.'

'Preposterous, this is the worst possible outcome you could come up with.'

'What of the profits? You can't seriously skip on everything that way, you know better than that.'

'Those are of little interest to me in the long run, I'm only looking for a way to save this city from ruination. And if that means sacrificing a few houses which would've dropped in value, might I add.'

'Miserable greedy sod!' The mayor muttered under the brush of his moustache.

'Well I would consider this a fair trade, as fair as one could make in order to draw as many people in as I can. Consider this thing, say, you bring me a dozen workers from mainland and I reward you with a little something for your trouble.'

Both Jacquo and Marques looked at the man as if he had been mad. Not only would he offer them houses for absolute nothing but he would pay them to get them on.

'In that case, I would like a house for myself.'

'My goodness, but you are welcome, both of you are. How about you William?'

William had been distant, too much that he would inquire of himself and the others.

'I think I'll abstain, for the time being that is. I'd like to see the surroundings myself in order to get a better idea. Don't take it too personal, but I believe you're making a grave mistake, you give people homes like that and they might think there's something wrong with them.'

'Nonsense William, you know who I am, a philanthropist.'

A philistine more so, that this mayor had something more underneath his brow than he wanted to show. It was incredible, the level of abstinence he had revealed under his breath without giving in the desire to show too much. Well endowed in the nature of bargain he began laying the terms.

‘I’ll deal with as many as eighty-five lots, for the time being.’

‘That’s ridiculous, how deserted is this city? I saw the docks, they were filled, and the streets.’

Jack almost burst a vein there. He isn’t pleased by it, by these appearances, he may think he’s being deceived for some reason.

‘It’s nothing, those are families, and they spread and they taken the bigger houses, and keep breeding until they senselessly fill them up. But those aren’t the plots which are empty, as I like call them, it’s the poor folk, it’s those who left because they couldn’t afford the stay which left.

For that reason, I cannot afford to seal those houses, knowing that I’m simply going to end up placing the new-comers in the same spot as those who had been taken before them.’

‘Certainly you must know that either way, this is a horrendous idea.’

Marques stitched a tooth as he got up from his chair. This man looked as if he was made out of two pieces, one of which being strewn forward at a ninety degree angle. It was monotonous, the way in which he came to some sense after sitting so much there.

‘I won’t permit this farce to continue. What are you intending to do with them?’

It was a startling stand, which drew the attention of both of his associate and that of his brother. Despite the cold and the sea-sickness, he showed some menace which couldn’t be brushed away. He wasn’t standing properly but his gaze was that of the deceased, though he smelled like gin.

‘Well, do you have a better alternative then? Because from where I’m standing we’re drifting on a Dead Sea. In only a few decades, this place will be either abandoned or barely inhabited by the deaths.

The rates at which children are made are either vague or barely going.’

‘But you said there are plenty of families that do breed for more than a few of the recurrent ones. So what’s the problem exactly?’

‘Problem is that, they’re not reliable, they’re outliers, and they could stop and end their lines at any time. And what of the workers, if I can’t afford to keep the economy going, how will they be able to fill my city?’

Exactly this is what I’m trying to save. I’m desperate, the city is dying and there’s no other chance but to give it all away.’

‘Be reasonable at least, even if there’s a chance, would you not consider taking the city apart for profit? I’m sure there could be some way to deal with the repercussions.’

The slithery Jack said, with a tongue up his led.

‘No, that wouldn’t be right. I think, no, if I recall correctly, the island if owned by one of the great families out there. They live remotely farther away from the city, on a patch of nature which lies separately from where we do.’

‘Have you spoken with them about this?’

‘Unfortunately, I have and the answer I have received is that it’s neither of their problems. I can’t help it. Not a single man of the family would be indisposed for the problem.

Since their family alone owns the entire island, I don’t suppose they would be interested about the people living here, not since they own such an immeasurable wealth themselves.’

‘Dear Mayor, in which direction would their dwelling, be? I seem to have found myself joyful in touch, looking for a way to get ahead and watch.’

‘Jack, Mark, don’t get mixed with them, this is a fair warning. They own several chateaus and a monument constructed in the body of their founder.’

‘What do you in the body?’

‘They smashed his head, arms and legs and began twisting the various forms of two-legged horses and horned crowns a means to glorify him I suppose. It’s kept as a secret, but I think the lack of joviality and of human contact drove them to the edge.’

And there was the darker part he refused to acknowledge out of the courtesy of being in William’s presence. But there was the marriage between their brothers and sister, or cousins which disturbed him the most. People like them were at that point considered to be out of reach as far as humanity had been concerned. It wasn’t their choice to be here at all. In any case, there had been something incredibly wrong in the way they had carried themselves around the venture, with the exploration receding into some kind of self-imbued interest they both shared.

‘We’re going then.’

‘If I can’t stop you, then I’ll do my best to keep you out of trouble, that’s the only way I could possibly make sure you won’t end up missing.’

‘I knew I could count on you, Gourney.’

‘Wait, Catherine, before we go, I need to tell you something, it’s about one thing I can’t get my mind off. There are some people out there I’ve seen before.’

She took a moment to turn and look at him. It wasn't even that obvious yet, but even there, he had a suspicion that something might be planned inside his office. Especially at the entryway and the other planar spaces, hearing probes, tiny, as they'd be attached to the insects coming in and going out of it.

'Follow me for a moment.'

Gourney whispered, much to his distress, she followed through the door and went straight to the bathroom. He gave only a few signals for her to follow before making it through.

'The thing I'm about to reveal to you might not sound right but I need you to trust me. A man keeps appearing around the area in front of the square where the old abandoned plane hangar is located.

I think he knows I'm watching him.'

'Gourney, stop, I understand if you don't want to come with me but you don't need to make some elaborate excuse for it, I'll understand. You may not think it but I'm more than capable to handle myself.'

'That's not what I mean, I'm not trying to prevent you from going there, I'm trying to warn you woman. He's out there, I think he has it in for me. Look, the man who came into my office before.'

'Stop already, you're not going to do this on me.'

'Listen, he had something in his case file, the one he had on himself, something sticky inside of it. I think he was hiding something in it as well.'

'This is getting ridiculous already, do you seriously believe all of this?'

Lying to her shouldn't have been that hard, but with each word he tried putting in, this felt twice as hard as it should've been. You've got her best intention at stakes, remember that. If she goes there, she won't come out.

One moment lead to another in which he couldn't help it but betray some of his most farcical facial expressions.

'Not that great of a liar after all, am I?'

'Why can't you trust me? We've been together more than I could remember.'

'And for that reason I'm doing this for your own sake.'

Within a reach he went out and snapped the door shut, with a jolt of the key he had on him. It didn't even have to be too much of a consideration that he found himself on the other side.

'This isn't illegal you now? Let me out this instant Gourney!'

‘It’s for your own good, look, I’m going to send someone in to pick you off in an hour.

In the meantime I’ll..’

Again, he was rightfully afraid he would be caught in there and that he’d lose his chance to escape in one piece. No more afraid that he had been before, he was way more stubborn to prove a point than to jeopardize her life in an instant.

‘Catherine, If I’m not back in an hour before the man I sent for you arrives, then know that I will have been gone for good. If this is the only way you’ll get it, then so be it.’

‘You damn idiot, don’t do this, spare yourself the trouble and let me go. This isn’t you, you don’t need to prove anything to me.’

‘I have to this for both of our sakes. I’ll be back within the hour. Forgive me Catherine and please wait for me.’

She was already busy trying to batter down the door with her palms. It was pointless. The key was left inside so she couldn’t even try picking up the lock. Waiting lay supreme now. Nothing else seemed around.

He was on the run now, making his best attempts to make up an excuse to call someone on the bathrooms down the office. It should’ve been somewhat surprising to him, that he got that quick of a response but it was settled.

‘Exactly at the end of the hour, I’ll be there. Pay in advance, I presume?’

‘Pay in advance, as per usual.’

With that out of the way, only time could tell and the file which was still in his hand. He was ungodly, unprepared for it, but that wasn’t a reason to return. The clock was ticking and with each turn he couldn’t help but think of the worst. What was past those damned doors?

A man crossed him by the street, tall and blond, carrying some kind of pack behind him. It didn’t suit him but alas.

‘Careful where you’re walking pal, no need to cut me over.’

He gave only one look behind, that sweaty look on his face said it all. Another man on the run, it seemed. But he had dared not approach the passage from which he came. That way had been far too dangerous for his good.

What came to it was this, the sight, even from the distance that he’d know of it with an immediate stare. Standing in his way, the building looked mightily unnatural in its pure state of being, ever so strange as to make him feel unable to tell apart the distress he felt which caused the exaggeration in sight or the mere practice it had.

It wasn't a building, he knew. But a within body which took its form and hid in it, committing an act of prayer with its sixteen long arms and many beaded dark eyes which laminated through its insides. Its talons were widespread and covered a good deal of the build. He could hear it now, his mad carols being sung from the distance. For him alone they were split and tuned, for his ears alone were meant to keep the angry tunes he wore. This effect wore off as soon as it was clear to go.

It was undeniable that Gourney felt repulsed by the idea that he would have to enter it alone. Within the hour, I shall enter and master whatever you throw at me. Be aware that I feel no fear as I step inside.

The course of actions he'd taken was wild and riotous, being followed by the closing of the sluices. He had something taken from him as soon as he entered, but that had been well earned since he took it upon himself to take this challenge of woe.

'Where are you?'

As soon as the premises had entered his line of sight, he stared at a lobby made out of four hands. Its texture was immediately obvious to him, the placard of nails laying there like coffins along side an entry which had been made out of two separated fingers.

Two shadowy figures who had been basked in the Aegean shades pushed forward at an unfathomable speed, revealing how somber they had began after beginning to darken with each step.

Below them lay the skeleton feet, wore as trophies, taken from different beings. Each step left a brand on the skin, in the form of some spyh green. The precursor to the vaporous filters which came from below reveal the inner skin of the creature which had become the building. It wasn't worth it being there.

This had been out of ordinary, intrinsically paranoid, he attempted to leave. Locked, he was met by them, face to face but he could only see the vague shapes of the chaps which appeared to him. It wasn't to be called yet, but a foreword with himself made him realize that this was in no way reassuring that he would return unscathed.

'Who are you? Why have you come here? Archiver, you are known among us, you must leave now.'

'But the door is closed.'

After the first mumble, I had been at a loss of words, as the Aegean sight turned into carmine, shade after shade dropping into sight. They knew how to appear fierce as the bands below them began stacking, bringing some level of discomfort to the being surrounding them.

'Whatever you must do, if you have to eat your way out, know that it will be much more pleasurable than the terrors you may encounter inside.'

This is not meant to be, not for you, not for now.'

Gourney's eyes turned to a filthy azure which pushed onward, his lodes covering his sight, seeking for a way to be. Flocks of flesh began gathering around weird angles around the place. They were trying to make him as uncomfortable as possible, without risking any kind of immediate damage.

His mind was affected the most as he knelt down and started shaking his head. Something around those ghastly apparitions made this entire room feel as if there was a strong windmill which was blasting every single spot around them while avoiding them completely.

A tangle of liquorish-coated beams shot around him, trying to wrap him up like a bunch of cobwebs being shot by twisted spirderlings which hid behind one of the exits there. It was hard, for as long as he would kneel, he would be in a grave danger.

'I can't do this, I can't do this.'

Before he got up, he looked past the exit, before he even realized that his confusion made him take a few steps towards the other side.

'Do not be confused now, that is not the way out, that is only one way in. No one would give you such an easy way to go, Gourney.'

They knew my name, the despots, the vile ones, and filth of uncorrupt. A legless spider's breast stood there, levitating with one stern lash which held the rectangular silk thrower in check. It bore three great eyes and a coloration which appeared to be patterned to resemble a dropping point for a bomb.

From that patterned side, it pulsed a few inches above its rim, revealing swollen glands which tried pushing out. Before long they did, revealing not a single drop of any of its vital fluids but of some caustic juice which threatened him the closer he approached.

One eye receded in, as if one of the limits of steps had been achieved. He would come into the range, sooner or later.

'Return, I said, don't take it unto you to give in. We'll help you on your way.

My brother has even taken onto himself to force the door open for you. But you need to take this initiative on your own. We cannot force you to return from the filth of life.'

'But I can't. I need to know, I need to be through with it.'

The hour was up, the clock had ticked in his mind. Before he could take another step, he felt mercury in his mouth and stopped. It dripped on his clothes and moved as a strange lack of hope.

The man turned and stepped away, looked behind as if by a shadow. He could feel the chest being inches away from him, breathing though it had no lungs, trying to be a part of him despite being clothed and not having relapsed into that dangerous commotion.

Much to their mad dance, he had felt for a moment what it felt like being part of it. So much so that he felt his insides producing the same silk in an erotic and disgusting manner. He looked away but he felt it, that predatory, almost breach, assault, pillage which couldn't be forgotten. It left him with a bitter taste as he left the building and never came back to his senses.

‘Within the hour, wasn't it?’

This confusing event hadn't helped him get a hold of reality any longer. It felt strange now, finally having come to understand that everything he had read from inside the storage had actually been true. In a sense, this had been more than enough to swallow, up to the point of choking. It had to be untrue. Not a second passed without him wandering what he had seen and who was following him.

Every turn of the shoulder he saw him there, but on a quick full turn, he saw no one.

‘Are you fine? You seem struck by someone, did something happen?’

‘Nothing, I thought I saw something there.’

Of course this was no mere stranger from around the town.

‘My name is Pontius, greetings.’

‘Pleased to be acquainted.’

‘Shouldn't you be on your way then? I supposed the only reason for you to be in such a hurry would be a mighty appointment you may be running late of.’

‘A dear, a friend of mind is waiting for me I believe. And I may have mistreated her kind of lately, Pontius.’

‘Well, you should do your best and try making up to her.’

‘I will, thank you, Pontius. I think I'll do.’

There wasn't a second he didn't think of her, what she might say or do as soon as they met. If only one could try getting.

‘Wait, I haven't told you my name yet.’

But the man was indisposed, he simply waved me off. Something about him made me think of myself not as some stranger, or some deranged fanatic, but what were these thoughts? What have I become there? I could finally look around and see, some way, some paths everyone else had missed. A travesty of a town, that's what this, was and I knew if for what it was, I saw right through it.

My intuition told me I should not return to my office, for she would not be there.

'I've lied to you, Pontius, but it's irrelevant now since we're never going to meet again. I suppose it was for the better that you didn't know my name, otherwise, you would've fallen to the same curse as I am now.'

Cursed with the sight, cursed with walking, where was she? Could it be that it had been more than an hour?

Damned be my clock, as it had been struck by what appears to be one fourth of too many hours forward. The reflection had been blurred by the heat of a breath. I was to go and search for her, wherever she went.

'But I swear, I can hear him, Crane.'

'Where would that be?'

Crane looked at Baster for a few moments. Both of them had been confused about what was going on. Neither of them could pinpoint the exact location where the wall was making the movement. It wasn't a sound, but one of the walls moved. There was someone on the other side and they knew it couldn't have been Call, or any other of the smaller fellows.

'They have no power here. What about the janitor? He could be the one making noise from behind some cracked wall in order to scare us.'

'No, that's not it either. We would've been able to detect him. To smell him, you know but I don't actually mean smell him, feel him there, right? He's not subtle.'

'Another problem for another time. We shouldn't have up here any longer, this doesn't feel right without him.'

'But it does feel wrong, listen, can't you hear? I think it's his voice calling.'

'You keep planting your ear against that hole as if it means something. He's never going to return now and you know it. This is wishful thinking, this is never going to happen.'

Move on, Baster. Why even show the interest now?'

'Because I care about him, more than you could imagine.'

And the fact that he had been infected with the mind malady carried by the abandoned building. Something had scourged him and he could see a squared hole inside his finger releasing that he was being emptied from his insides. That had been half an hour ago, now a good piece of it was missing. No red inside, but the lacquer of floor.

He was right, he questioned it. But Crane was right; too much time spent here wasn't going to do him any good.

'Why are you staring at your hand? For the past few minutes, you've been doing that constantly.'

'I don't know, reasons I suppose.'

'It's always reasons.'

They left, finally. Damned hobos walking where they're not welcome, they should be lucky they had missed it.

The janitor was sweating, after he had seen a few things which weren't meant to be. After going back to the floor, he had finally seen what they were constructing, and he wasn't pleased by it.

He looked, vaguely like him. A riposte had come as he had thought of burning it, but it would be impossible to burn the entire floor. The body was being rolled over by the scarabs at an unfashionable speed which couldn't be curtsied by any watch.

'I need to get away from here.'

Yet he was the only one stopped, who wasn't allowed to get out.

For every eight quarter of the boards, the cluster of planks which reigned around the area appeared to be entities of their own. At least, it appeared that there was one inopportune moment to look onward. As four of them raised and made way for him to rise from the depths. It was called him but in reality it was them, of they, eight, smaller, humbly embracing slumbering breeds.

They were called so because they looked vaguely animalistic in nature, and of the same kind, yet they showed the presence of chimera-like scales and tailed and blue-topped eyes which distracted from the smaller heads nesting in the holes they bore in their guts and well as in two sides of their skulls. For a moment he believed them to be overgrown bot-flies but he was wrong.

This chair of theirs showed no acknowledgement to him. It completely ignored him for the time being, being focused on itself for as long as it could. As a few moments came to him, he could only focus on where he could go in order to be alone. To decide whether or not staying here was up his worth.

But the door was locked, unintentionally so. And those eyes looked at him, disturbingly even now. The hole beneath started reeking while it drew him to look closer beneath it in order to observe that they were still there, marching together, like good deciders of who owned the underbrush beneath him. It was tempting, very much so, that he would simply walk towards it and sit as if there wasn't any danger involved.

As for the trembling, it never began. After all, this was too inviting for him to offer a proper refusal. Though his steps weren't his, he came to take it as he pleased and stepped on it. His shoes were missing but the insects avoided them. Now he could have a greater look at what seemed to be happening between the walls. Him and him alone would make do of this reveal. He saw all of them and had decided that this was no longer a world inhabited by his kind.

But alas, he stood too much already and he had almost been pinned down.

'Release me at one.'

The janitor yelled and as soon as the spoke them, he was thrown out of this throne and forced on his knees. Before a few steps, the pressure on his knees, he turned to see it receded beneath its hole. The motion was precisely set to show him how much of the strength they still retained. Their arms did all the pushing and pulling beneath that gap. And after they had been done, another strike came there, bashing it closed but not leaving a mark there.

It wasn't likely to be collided with any kind of passer from below but he knew of the unfathomable levels which surrounded everything around him.

'I won't leave this place, spare me and I shall stay here, in the confines of the building. For as long as I am, I'll be tied to this place.'

The last part was more of a confession than a vow. It was cold there, but he would be fed. After walking for so long, the supper waited in his room, as it was placed every other night before. It was strange already, but he never knew when he had ever stepped outside and walked with the other men in the outside world. But that would be it, the doors closed behind him and he was gone.

'I need to perform, a few more plays.'

'We're out of songs to perform on, Belice, can't you see that there's no one going to come to see us play?'

'Perform, perform, my dear, it's always been that, the art of performance, the jest of it, the act, the role, if you cannot fathom that, then...

'Wake up, the two of you are supposed to wait behind the cut boards until act two.'

'But it's too long until then and it's getting hot in there. Will you not allow us to come sooner?'

‘This is not an open interpretation by any kind, this is the stage, here you live the role, you are one of my courtesans, you one of my servants, so why would you step whenever you please when this is my house and you underneath me?’

‘Beliee, I think this role of yours is getting your blood boiling a bit too much. Would not think this through for a moment?’

If the theater has a chance to get back on its feet, perhaps we ought to perform something which would appeal to people, not this, this stricken thing you’ve written here.’

‘And give in what made me want to become an artist in the first place? Never, this is my theater, this is my performance and on top of it all, it’s my play. Why should I lower my standards for some uneducated swine like them?’

‘Because otherwise, we’ll end up on the streets, with this place either closed or demolished.’

‘Who might dare do it? You can’t put it all on us.’

The voices beneath the theater spoke. Of course they were not heard then, as they rested, weakly, meekly, on top of their pillar of salt. It reigned beneath the great plethora of seats which curved against the stage. It was already decided by the pianist, Callegro Verdini, who was in Beliee’s employ that a new composition was needed for the play.

‘This will not do, no, no, we need something stronger, something to shake the seats which the applauses come. Yes, you, you and you will need to put more effort into drawing the attention to my song, no?’

‘The attention, Callegro, will be on the main act and on the principal actor of the show, I. I will be the one to save our work, and bring a new light to the show, do you understand?’

I will stop at nothing but this, to bring something grander and defiance to their...’

A corkscrew again, and this time he wasn’t the only one hearing him. Every time he paused like that, he raised both of his hands and crossed one finger to ask for some silence. It was then that they heard the sound of wood giving in.

‘Someone’s trying to come in, do you hear?’

‘Not this again, no, this is your mind messing with you again. It’s the stress of the show.’

Said Allegri, who was noting even to this point every kind of repair and note his self-proclaimed owner had in mind for the place. And the list was only getting higher, being in need of everything to be on check and onto the play. Everything for the show.

Someone was bound to arrive of the premises and snick inside the wardrobe room when no one was standing guard. And why would they? If any place had been unworthy of a thief, it had been that, without a shimmer of a doubt. The decorum had served as nothing other than a distraction. One which didn't work as it was intended.

Through the few holes made in the wall, which had been obscurely hidden behind the clothes rail, they started pushing through. Being only a few millimeters in size hadn't stopped him from entering through it, or at the very least to focus his body inside his fingers, so he could temper with the back of the mirror. It was there where the magic started, the mild cuts which opened the gap behind the wooden placement box and the glass itself.

From a previous extraction, there remained a few missing piece on the back which had been required for the further testing, curtsies' to the professor, for which research had served as the basis for all the schemes which had been acquired and misappropriated for the entire benefit of their race. Behind the frames, they hid in the prosthesis bodies, trying to build themselves over and over again, leaving too many blanks behind. Those grubby-fingers which came out looked fat and white themselves, growing now inside the mirror rack, so they could leave something behind.

They would watch over and feed off the sight of humans. That was the entire plan all along, now that they had proposed and planned this experimental prototype of a feeder, they carried a few extra tools which would make it a certainty that they couldn't get betrayed by their own incommensurable mind twists. It had to work that way. As long as there was a prolonged contact with any of the actors, their vigor would be taken.

'Shh, one of them is coming.'

By now they had absorbed a few mouths and ears which were beginning to river back to their amorphous forms. Neither of what they ever stole remained for more than a few days, or in a few cases, months if minutes at all. One of the rare cases had the ability of distinct speech, which served as a bridge for them to pass orders from one another.

'He's going down the stairs now, confirmation.'

Another one said, who had been caught by now in the conundrum of living. Within a few minutes they had placed themselves inside of pipes and beneath boxes and even some hair brushes, so they could absorb as much as they could from the primates. Otherwise, within a margin of an error, they risked dying out. Starvation was inevitable and they were infertile, which left the only manner of living taken through body proliferation with other species.

Dogs had been taken, which forced a few heads on top of a burst mannequin body which had been forced into the shape of a some shady vase which lay abandoned below. They grew tall and spread around the top of the framework, leaving nothing to be decided off. It wasn't even fair at all, how they looked upon one another with disgust and shame.

Not a single one was pure, even if it was temporary, neither one had managed to fully revert to their original states before drawing in the life-force of whichever living being came into their reach. Insects, rodents, arachnids, even dead skin flakes which happened to be in some place appeared to be of some use.

But the many headed dog-heads were there to stay. It served as a way to make them realize that there was danger in it. Danger into drawing too much than one could handle. It wasn't even from the theater, unless one could count the outside streets surrounding it, but the many heads had been acquired from there and they remained. They remained in a most agonizing manner, which pushed onward to keep growing in order to find a way out.

An outstretch of the wall was impossible then.

'It looks like he's still growing and the theater is getting higher as well. What kind of hope is there for someone like him?

He'll never be able to stop this. Perhaps it's mean to be this way.'

'Should we at least attempt to cut it down? There could be trouble sprouting from this.'

'Let him be, if there'll be trouble from the mere growth, they would not suspect some obscure hiding spot between the frames. As I say, they would not dare break through it at all.

For breaking through it would only hinder and stunt them until they will be pleased by the obscure.'

'So what of it, then?'

'As I said, don't disturb him and stay away from those mutts, we need to keep growing and keep spreading if we're to survive.'

Moving around proved to be of some difficulty which couldn't be measured by the amount of speed and distance, but of the amount of friction which was involved in the entire process, as dangerous as it had been, there was the risk of setting themselves on fire. A thing which immediately brought a doom to their skin, a plight which would slay them without doubt or wonder.

'Ah, I see, pleased to be of some service to you, look, look, my twin, oh how much I missed you. I won't waste your dearly time, as I'm more than set on trying to make your body as wet as possible with the panzer's fruit of colors, look at that suit.'

Maryanne came, and up a lump, she trunked to the suits and placed one on himself. He was satisfied by the new arrays of colors which had been brought, if there was anything he knew about Beliee, it was the fact that he always kept his promises. And the nail polish and colors, the new hair pullers and lash drawers, the lipsticks and the wigs, whatever the actors asked for, it was to be found in that room. She was expected to perform, even though she may not have been fully aware of it, for them. a few inches forward, for a cut. It couldn't be seen now. Those replicated hands, which were coated in glass, gave the illusion that she was still staring in the mirror. While arching forward, it could as easily have taken one single cut. It wasn't noticeable at first, but it pulled back at an order.

'Draw back, not this way, not now and not here. Too much to clean afterwards, it will be too much of a mess.'

They communicated with the established grain which lay segmented as one tube between the base and the wall. It was subtle now as it had to turn inwardly and become as thin as possible without giving itself away. Zoning out while being out there would mostly be incomprehensible, even for them, this wasn't the right choice.

It tried jolting out and reaching out for her, it was that desire to draw her in to join them. A naive thing which didn't have its place there, as soon as it was safe for her to leave she had. And neither of the filled objects interfered with her sudden leave.

'You're call on the stage Mary. Come on now, we're all looking for you.'

'In a moment now, I need to change my face now.'

'Make it quick, we're doing the rehearsals, not a full on-stage act.'

'But I thought that's what we were supposed to do.'

' come on, here, I'll wait for you.'

Clarette waited in the doorstep, looking at the obstruction in which the mirror angled itself. There was an imperfection to it which almost gave it the appearance of being something which didn't belong there. As much as she had focused on it, there weren't any cracks or any other obvious deranged changes. No cuts and no pushed in notes, which would be usually left by actors.

Farther than that, looking for too long at it made her feel uncomfortable. The entire room felt like it had been an extension of the mirror. They moved the bars and the drawers, even the tiny locks appeared to be drawing in to it. As the first body of mirror walked, she appeared to be rubbing her eyes.

It walked through her as if it was made out of some transparent gelatin which held no account for anything which had been solid. After phasing through the chair, she had to admit it that she was out of place. Her mind was spread in unconceivable placed.

She had to convince herself that this was only some hallucination. But its eyes had sunken through its chest and they were very much real. Blinking even. And its trajectory had been stopped as soon as the white solid mass inside of it started spreading.

‘Why are you here?’

Her whisper hadn’t been heard, but her shoulders would give in eventually from holding the door. This had been too far for comfort.

On the first hint against the mirror, she closed the door and ran towards the stage. Mary wasn’t going to see it happen. Not any longer, not with two eyes made out of glass.

She raised herself momentarily, whilst being met by that thing.

‘Too soon, you’ve done it too soon and in front of someone. We’re going to be remembered now.’

‘Perhaps it’s time to leave then, I see no reason for us to spend time here any longer. Perhaps we should switch towards the other wing and try pulling the guests from beneath their seats.’

‘Grand idea, I’d say this is a plan, if one I could convey.’

‘What’s wrong now? Where is my supporting role? Where is Mary?’

‘Problem, there’s a problem, I can’t draw my eyes from it, that’s not what I mean. It’s about her, she’s.’

‘Here, I came in time.’

Painted eyes, pupils, the whiteness inside of them being so clear as to close in the resemblance of the doll, while making it less than obvious than it should’ve been. As one would have to draw to another, one couldn’t help but look around at the other corners inside the theater, where its path had been, set, this deranged glass creature, holder of stunt growth had been cursed with roaming below it.

It was the perfect place to hide, the crypt underneath the floor was easily accessed by them. That’s how they got inside the walls in the first place.

But the sudden growth had reached unfathomable levels, even from the outside view. It had looked like a citadel, than a theater, a building standing near the others, a place which threatened to grow as high and as pointed at the tower of...

‘Wait, you are, the same as I.’

He was greeted there by an unquestionable amount of mirror-fiends. They were enacting their own play down there, performing for their very selves. As they had each other for company, this couldn’t have been any grander, any greater, much more than it could’ve been admissible, or believed in, they performed something which would bring them more joy than that of the play.

The sabotage of the world as they created their glass pyramids below. Afterwards, they made their giant cubes and strange idols, as a result of being given a whole new entity bred out of their own unions. Such unions would form as soon as they charged one another, breaking their outer shells, only to be contorted upon one another and become beings full of glass, or at least mostly so.

Some static of their white-skin atoms still remained and sunk deeper in the air bubbles which had been absorbed inside of them, but those would serve as their wicked idols, the shape of hands and arms and arches coming along from their backs.

And the others fathered their own glass-like trinkets and pleaded with their strange glass gods which always rewarded them with the returned sight. In accordance to their customs, they began poking holes in their crystal statues, connecting them with the rest of the structure underneath a very clear side of the Theater. Underneath it, a good part of the cave had been mistakenly approached by the band of Neolithic-Nyorlimphs. Savagely broad-shoulder, they came in as a bunch of huddled serpent-rocks, stacked together on top of their barely visible crested pointers.

From beneath them, they carried what appeared to be the most dangerous of artifacts one could lay eyes upon. A cut, across the chest, which had a bag filled with glowing dust, carried beneath the racket which lay inside their bones. The glowth of the dust dissipated after a while, but the sudden reveal had been enough to draw their attention to them.

Both had as easily become contenders to this spot, to which they could attest against each other a desire to overpower the rest. If there was one who'd be fair enough to be as deranged, bringer of fertility, he had arrived.

He who looked not like the slave, not like a deranged crook, but a penetrator and defiler, the Unclean as he would be looked upon, had drawn their sights towards him in an attempt to reconcile both sides. With open arms, he had arrived, holding all for of them in some kind of symbolic gesture, to which they could only bow at the magnificence of his side rings and malevolent creeks, projected in the form of its quadruple legs, all of which lay tied. Defied, to the reeking aspect of the glowing core which split his stomach, yet kept it cold and still alive.

For a moment, it had started pumping, revealing an almost geometrical form inside of him, which forced his arms to extend and face a few meters, signaling his reach. He encompassed all, but refused to touch even one of them. It was still the short period of waiting, in which the core would activate every single part of his body. His four eyes, noseless, almost groping expression only brought some mistrusts. They were yet aware that he would strike, at last. I looked like the savages lowered their guards, realizing that this one had been too strong to face.

This dead-looking walking corpse, which carried himself in a suit of white, perched with dark designs of black roses and vines. This interloper whose savage presence had force them to abandon their stones and come forth in their mourning phases, much more to him, as it came, not a single word would be said. Yet, they approached and risked a plead.

Crystalline fighters, sharp at the legs, appearing before him, unable to confess the like.

‘Are you another contender who came here to lay claim to this cavern beneath the Theater? Know that It is ours now, we came here not to argue but for conquest. We are more than capable of fight, if you need be concerned.’

‘Strange, because I have dwelled here far before either of your kinds emerged from whatever blasted kind of way you may have been made from.

And I shall dwell upon the stalactite kingdom for as long as I desire.’

To be fair, he did look like he would prove to be more than a challenge for either of them. At once, he clapped with his free hands, if they were even hidden behind his rings, and corded lumps in the back. It only seemed to be more obvious that the deranged spirits that accompanied him were servants of death. Gravediggers with no legs, floating with their shovels in their hands.

‘Matthias and Cervantes, these are the two first comers who had tried digging too deep far past the expansion of the crypts. What they had discovered beneath the rifts of earth had been too much to bear, ever so clear that neither of them could stomach nor take it to heart.’

They were still there, both of their hearts, chained against two stalactites. In some way, they kept to themselves and beat, beat after beat, which carried on for an unfathomable amount of time. It wasn’t to be called into the heat below.

Those who produced it were far more dangerous as they showed their thin, long, strong, almost statuesque contortions, their almost metallic limbs, and the strength to which they used to fight. And each blow produced heat and some kind of mad purification of the wings and their antennae, as their fists colliding and they release the pain they felt. Most of not all were kept there as a reminder to stay as meekly at a distance, from which neither of them could even spare the like. In some way they were almost graceful, if no retreat meant the pulling of their guts, which followed.

From inside they would release more heat on the floor as the red magmatic pillory which came out of them starved off the lower-comers. Blind, eerily morbid bodies which had been placed all over the place, over the span of time, after the crypt had been penetrated, they were lost in their entirety. No defiance would be less benign. But they were there, dreadfully aware of going lesser, showing fewer moves as the vibration of the fights which occurred above them scared them off.

Coffins had been exaggeratedly forced into a grown, which forced their forms to worm their way deeper, while carrying their precious cargo. Deep down there, citizens were highly needed and requested. Louhn could’ve been one of them, but he had been forced to break apart instead, as his coffin entered the levels where the dirt pressure forced him to resign the entirety of his being.

It wasn't like he had been accounted for, most of them weren't. Most of the remnants of the crypt lay almost to the point of being extinct. But those could grow and either come to become shades, like Cervantes, or others who might be ill in the head, barely animated, like Matthias. To whom, as they presented themselves, would look out for their own instead of trying to get a word in our shout out of their broken legs. Both were vaguely closer to one another than they had been to their master, both in the range in which they approached each other, less of a sight as well. Constantly, they'd check to see if the other was well. If he had fallen even more this day, whether or not they would be broken and brought to some fruitful end was the main concern which brought them to their nerves.

'Would you please take a few steps ahead and crush one of the mirrors?'

At the sound of it they got defensive, yet neither of them retaliated in the least. It would be dangerous, judging by the sheer size of his pronounced arms, but at the same time they wanted it. They wanted to see one of their own broken and slain. It would be a pleasure only they could share with one another, or so they thought.

But the quick rush had faded as Cervantes appeared with the spade. As they saw him come, and as their sudden barely lived fantasy ended, they drew in and pulled him out, right before it had been planted into the ground. A blow like this was enough. It was felt, as the ground pumped the soil outwardly, gushing and throwing itself as far away from sight as it might.

'You've done well now, Cervantes, you may return.'

'Are you not going to crush us then?'

'Not yet, now that I know that there's at least some resistance left inside your empty souls. But I'm still going to give you the benefit of the doubt and let you know by that, you're not welcome here.'

At any moment it could happen, as Matthias grew sojourn. He stepped ahead and imitated his friend, only to be met by the same reaction. Standing still, then jumping out of the way as soon as he was pulled by the others. It was a system of disgust. He could see through them behind those particles of white, there were small pops of red and purple, being another layer covering for the blue.

That was the liquid which made them alive. That ultramarine fluid which not only gave life but which appeared to be compressed to almost nanoscopic sizes and still maintain the same potency as one of grander sizes. And the white shell which encompassed it was sluggish, slowish, pushing the envelope for as much as it needed to grow. It was all fat, serving as a layer for the muscle beneath it which served as the last shield protecting the fluid.

If the fluid were to escape, it would most likely give birth to wretches of the earth.

The Unclean remained erect, strapped upon a chair of dirt, he watched them as they retreated, pulling back the statues, still thinking of themselves as undefeated. What else could there be if not an act of mercy to fly above them, crushing the wooden and the stone platform and spraying them with an acidic fire? It would spread and grown against any surface while giving birth to others like him out of the survivors.

He contemplated upon it, for far too long. It was clear that the idea that he might give life to a legion of glass-like soldiers of the Unclean, would fancy him to the extreme. Yet it was enough play to which the gravediggers appeared to last. It would be interesting to wait and see how long they'd last.

Until they would approach him, or send a convoy, an emissary, someone to talk to him, he would wait there. Eyes griming with the flames, he started recollecting all the times he had used his blades, which implanted themselves in his arms, those side things, which formed red-seething orb-like forms of their own as they pushed from every side of his bone.

In the meantime, he took it to himself to feed his narcissistic desire of admiring his body.

'Grand, as it may seem, these are my weapons of choice. Are they not magnificent? Do they not look pure? I could destroy wood and crush ash as I dry in your cold remains.'

He didn't know of it then, but he suspected, as he rubbed his chin with the other free arm. Where had the intruders come from? Out there, they moved as freely as if there wasn't anything holding them back. In receding lanes and panes of thin walls, they only spread themselves, to the point of being mighty carpets of spreading legs which pulled one another and drew again. With some amount of force, they could do it, push through as they expanded the Theater to another extreme.

'Do not do it.'

A fatherly figure appeared to be as exposed to the extremity of the extended voice cords. They would leap and heap at one another, during he morose sound, the blind would be alive, and their minds could finally start reverting back to the creatures which weren't akin to the actors. In so far, they were close to being primitive, until they found a spot beneath the stage to last.

A good number of their ranks came in there and waited, having finally found a place to stay and ruminate upon the future of this plan.

'Keep silent now, we're underneath a scene. They could hear us, and make us turn ourselves in. '

'Oh, Claire, oh, Claire, why aren't you there? I am your lover and I can't stand you to be there. Oh, Claire, oh Claire, my hope lays in your bosoms, why must I despair for your lonely kin?'

Pain came from within, as Beliee suddenly realized how empty the seats looked. No one had come for him, no one wanted to listen to him talk, to see him act. And the actors looked like those chairs, forced to be theirs. They would unknowingly perform for them, for those unpleasant and those who were lost, for the empty seats and those who hid beneath the cracks. It was settled. One way remained, for him to return back to where he ought to be. Past the main street, back into the office, Gourney settled that he'd run past the midst of the elevated floors, he came to find out that he wasn't alone. But it was not the company of Catherine he had been met with, only the most dreadful of sights remained that of the man. He was drenched in blood, still barely able to walk, to say the least if that had been the case in the past, this had worsened to be seven times worse, several inches missing out of the whole, through and through.

‘What happened to you?’

‘An encounter I did not expect to see, Mr. Gourney. Would you mind if I stepped inside the office?’

His voice was low, and he couldn't actually put the accent where it had to be. But she was out of her prison and he couldn't even think where he might be able to find her. It was his desperation, what brought him here and regardless of what time it was. To which, contently he looked, it hadn't been the hour, but two more in a row. He had been missing for so long, which meant he would never get to see her whole. And the spire of senses trembled as he helped the man in. I've never asked what happened myself, for I had a feeling he would go ahead to tell me what he found.

‘I don't think I can make it through, Gourney, I came out of the ambulance and ran straight to your office, with everything I got. I know this may not be understandable yet, but I seriously think you got something on your hands here, it's...’

He was falling on himself every waking moment. It would be hard to point out which side of his chest beat the hardest but I could only guess. Intentionally bent between the chair and himself, he only came to see what was left of his life into the world. That was enough to make him pass the backpack with everything collected and cut the conversation short.

‘Wait here, for a few minutes, Gourney, I've got something to take care off.’

Steps followed as soon as he was out of sight. I would dare go through the files without questioning where he had been gone to. At least, he appeared to have lost the limp, the last he saw him. By the time he got to the stairs he fell on them, rolling through, crushing his ankles, crawling back to his two feet. Vigor went into his barely working leg-muscles which had managed to carry him on so far. While the office worker was at his desk, this would be a fine stop, in the emergency access passage. It should be far enough for him not to hear, not to notice, not to care about this very tired man. Cruelly folded, the files he had gathered for his research or his hunt were crude.

Perhaps it was the need he had to question where he had gone, where she had gone and whether or not he went out there to do what he intended to do. He suspected something but hadn't said a thing. This was a man who confessed to carrying a firearm on him for whatever reason might come onto him. And an escape from the medics wasn't going to fall on any hindrance or stay on any of their two legs.

‘Where do I even start?’

It was the foremost thought, now that he had left the files down. Both of them agreed they wouldn’t see each other any longer, even from their sudden glances before he had even left. His poor condition had given in, which only left him with her, his secretary, much forbidden to the fact she left. It was illogical to think about it any longer, the way in which she took the risk and left with nothing in her root.

She must’ve stormed through the front and took another way in, otherwise I would’ve known, or at least I would’ve seen her through the storm. Still, he could not leave that woman alone, knowing her intention, after telling her he’d be there in an hour. The return would have to garter him closer to her end. It was despair, despair, they gathered there. Another desolate island remained and in it the ritual began again. They would give their bodies as tribalistic filthy savages which craved only that the dye would be given birth again.

‘We shall go on with the ritual until we’re given what we want.’

‘Retreat to the Oratory and hide.’

‘But what of our ritual?’

‘Not this night, not this night.’

They came to run and hide from the salvation of the moving octopi from the nearest watery horizon. As they approached, they began pouring their souls around the edges of the island, pushing through a carpet of ink which spread, like the dead of angst and the worst of woes, to which they could only be safe at the highest peaks the island provided. In their sight of the moons, they eyes glittered with a bitter yellowy-green, which shone as the light within them faded.

Every time this happened, the green of the island faded, it was a drowning of the land that would last for hours after hours until it couldn’t be deflowered any longer. In it there came the breed of small ink-octopi which push onward and splashed the likes of men who had once fallen in their pools, now blasted aware that they were caught forever in disgust. As their struggles faded, they continued fighting for any kind of chance they might have to escape. Otherwise they would never be seen again. A bitter old thing came.

Their efforts were long due to be abandoned, in as much of an effort to be placed into the ripping of the stone below them, they would sink deeper, pushing through the various calcareous stacks of metal bars which kept the stone floor from collapsing below. They were desperately trying to amass around the Observatory but that attempt was thwarted by a mere curiosity of the benign.

‘We need to send another sacrifice to them, another convoy so they might be pleased by our good intentions.’

‘May we strike peace with those who want to devour us completely now? What’s going on your mind? Perhaps we may as well create a bridge and let them in, bearing our arms below the rafts and letting them simply devour us, if it so pleases you the thought of giving up.’

‘I’m not doing this on purpose, know that I’m trying to think of the good of the Observatory itself. If it falls, this island will be theirs forever. Notice how most of the other buildings in the ruins have been claimed by them. If it weren’t for this place, they might’ve given up a long time ago.’

‘What’s stopping them then? Because I know it’s not the given reigns, the lives we could’ve spared.’

‘Should you have asked me in a calmer hour, I might’ve answered you differently than now. But I do not know what the reason for it is. I only know that they will stop as soon as we gave one in.’

‘Give him up to what? A life in that black basin? Where he may jerk and sink until he’d never draw air, where his aspirations die, where there’s nothing to him.’

‘But that’s our only hope for survival. There’s no place in here for aspiration, other the gathering of the dye. You know that, I know that, everyone knows that, and we’ve made a pact upon.’

To which he came, at last, the weaker one of their pack, a straddles, sickly-looking young man. He had lost his hair, his nails, a piece of his heart, now stumbling to get a word in before he was simply pushed out of one of the glass panes. Each one of them had the ability to open completely, leaving this the perfect place for an execution to be achieved. And he tried jerking himself away from the malignant waves which formed on top of him, drawing him nearer to the octopi, from which an escape couldn’t be denied. It was a firth of an entry, the dread of a cowl, as they pushed away, the greatest of them scowled. That grand octopus, eight which bore an entire system of rooted tentacles below him appeared to be the grand patriarch of their ranks. He had been the tip of the iceberg, where the shadowy ice only drew deeper in, deeper through the trenches, where he and his many offsprings would hide over a few generations. And they shared in fear, making their way through back onto the island.

‘Start the rituals, see what they left us.’

One of the grand Turmonts brought the aggrandizing worthless lung blowers, which resembled the same system which it had in mind. Chained by a few hooks which held it into some tetrahedron to which there lay attached the lower half of a rifle. In it, a set of concise movements were taken at intervals, so they could shake the lung, pushing it to some extreme. It was an experimental device which had resulted not into what they had expected, but the realization which would stop their rituals forever. Even the grand Marshalls in their Oratory stopped and looked how the stone floor turned into some epicanthic doorless entry into the ground. This weirdly texture part of the island, its insides, as they were given the name shared a resemblance to their darkest dreams, to pain and torture, the hidden flying corpus which had infested everything making it appear less of a torture chamber and more of an underground embodiment of suffrage.

‘We will never escape our fate otherwise, unless we take this route and see where it leads. ‘

‘But if the octopi come again, we shall be drowned.’

‘No we won’t, look, how it begins to real itself.’

The device had been activated again, the worthless lung blowers had not only managed to unwrap the slit in the ground but they revealed perforated stalagmites which only came to be seen as concealed but unfelt. Now they wretched desire for the forging of the dye faded, as they watched this place unfold. A sudden aspiration came, as they sang.

‘Bring the other worthless lungs, we shall claim this place as our own and see whether or not it leads to a better home.’

In words of refuge, one could only think of the brave as those who spiked their bodies with the knives, those who suffered long enough for this discovery to come.

‘I can feel it, it’s here, it’s right here. This isn’t an illusion.’

Clerhogn perched his upper lip before the revulsion came in. At least some menacing amount of the drooping fluid parchment came to fall onto his hand. Though there were no words recognizable on the stalagmite, they appeared on his hand. The glyphs were vaguely recognizable, but that alone hadn’t been enough for him to decipher anything written there. But they veiled themselves and changed. The dialect, the shapes and even the words appeared to be less symbolic and closer to what he used. A Latin letter followed another, but before he could even attempt to decipher them, with his vague understanding of the language, he was called and abashed, looked at the others, how they’d turn everything inside out.

‘There’s a new threat coming now, don’t you suppose it’s time to interfere with them? We can barely deal with a bunch of the sea-cretins, but this, this appears to be a whole new problem all together which may overwhelm us.’

‘Let them do as they please, it’s going to be over with in only a matter of hours now, before they’ll realize the waves cannot be stopped.’

‘And if they don’t, we’ll risk having them leave a gap in our population size, which may not be easily remedied. May I remind you that filling those gaps would be night-impossible with the lack of some members of our society which are the only ones capable of bearing children?’

‘I know that, but they won’t undertake that journey, Karakas, you know what they are like. If something dangerous enough, they’ll stay put.’

But if they didn't they risked a greater catastrophe of a magnitude they couldn't ever hope to deal with on their own. It was by their own admission that the land was in an irreparable state, to which they could only pass one command there.

'Bar the gates, do you hear? We must preserve the Oratory for as long as we can. They shall be given a good deal of hours until we'll take them back, that, if they ever want to return.'

To which, the words of Karakas were met by doubt. A few people assembled and discussed what was to happen to their island, the fate of which could be anything but dreadful in its state.

'They started separating it from what used to be a city, or the remnants of our home into that icky stuff that grows.'

'It grows? How can you tell? I can only see it from this side and it looks as if there was at least a good deal of it which spreads. I cannot tell you exactly how much or what the reach might be, but I know very well that I want to do something to undertake the task.'

Bitter to no remark, they could not focus on a single popping pair, piles which were there one moment when they ought to move away from sight. It happened fast enough for them to be caught off guard, but they knew they were messed with.

'An agonizing thing, I'd say, I cannot convey what I feel about it now. I wish it might've been easier for me to stray, but for the like of me to be down there, I shall make it my responsibility to be the first of them. And If I'm the last to dwell inside the gap, if those white and perky tiny teeth shall grab me in the end, so be it. I'll do as I please.'

'But you cannot do that. We need you in the Observatory, without you, who might do the repairs? Who might fix the freezing points and stand watch over our children and the likes of them?

Irdi, you're one of the pillars of humanity, come on now, you cannot abandon us. Without you, this place might fall apart under its own weight. Come now, perhaps we ought to speak in private.'

'The time to speak is over. We've been doing this for decades and we have achieved nothing. Can't you see that living here is pointless? Our animals might eventually die. Our population might never be sustained entirely, for the growth to be stumped and all of us to be caught into some mad affairs, I cannot help it for the likes of me and yours.

Living here is pointless if it means we're going to be caged. I wish to traverse the area beneath that gaping mouth and see for myself if there's a better world out there.'

To which he looked and out of the eight of them present there, Irdi understood that there wasn't any return in either case. Whether they would accept it or not, he looked at last at what they would continue doing at the edges of the canyon followed by the sea. It was something which immediately silenced everyone in a most deceitful fashion. But they raised walls, actual walls with the worthless blowers, which served as a means to block the octopi, leading to the ink drought which was so highly waited for.

‘It comes at a price, I see; don’t be deceived so quickly by it.’

Despite the leader’s attempted warning, it was obvious at best, that there was the symbol of unrest which still begged for its own case. It spread and shoved in them the seed of paranoia, of fear of what might be. Those who touched their stalagmites woke up bearing marks and words, evil chants in Latin or worse. As the time progress the Latin changed into some other language, never into one, never consistent, sometimes in numerals, other times Arabic, Asiatic or the likes. Combinations soon were to be maintained, somehow one had to look again at everywhere in places. They were trickling with the pouring of the veil. It was to be bound again to any surface it could lay on, in an utmost show of phlegm spread by the people who gave up then.

‘What are they doing now?’

‘They seem to help in whatever way they can. I think it needs moisture to grow, if this may be the case, then there’s a reason for them being there. They’re not acting accordingly to our codes, I think they started being afflicted by the will of the land.’

It was the first hint to which he alluded, in which a pair of dull-headed workers, flayers, ground conveyers went inside. For the people to have walked as unstuck by fear as they had, there was something close to a surprising look left on them by everyone there. No longer were they brothers, but nomads who had abandoned life and entered the gap. And only they saw what lay there, a dreadful burrow infested by stalactites, stalagmites and many conical stone-like moving formations. It was entirely occupied in a way only a deranged rock could fathom bearing itself forth. A way to look and one to gather, one could lose himself below the crater.

They had to improvise for the mere chance of not getting lost in the various raising molders between the varnished grounds there. It had to be more inconsequential, their laugh and their indescribably walk through the excruciating paragram of insipid humanry. Neither of them had been prepared, hands on their worthless blowers, to be there amongst the most deranged of agitators. It was an arrival which had little precedence, to be recalled from various dreams as well as from the writing they had found across their bodies.

Something was documented there, and one in a few tens of people they found entire outlines of the creatures transferred on them. For that short duration, those obsessed masts which amputated their ever-growing sailing legs across the insides of their passages were responsible from those teeth around the floor and in the ceiling. More likely, to their kind, was the fact that they were fractured and only grew in twisted specific shell-like nests they made for themselves above the tip of their heads.

‘Are they dangerous?’

‘I do not know, perhaps it would be better if we kept our distance entirely, wouldn’t you agree?’

‘Whatever keeps us safe, right?’

‘Whatever keeps us safe.’

Returned the Angor, who appeared lost. He had activated the blower and started revealing much more than the musk inside the air. Pristine large dandelion-like beings appeared out of nowhere floating, observing, then suddenly getting away. As soon as they were spotted by the masts, they twisted until they had been completely wrapped at their heads and began slowly devouring them without the reveal of any heads or mouths, only that texture of fat and the wide body below them. Inside their succor, their organs twisted and missed each other in fights and flights, as they threw bolts at one another, ready to destroy at command. The resulting acid-production only spread, they weren’t dead but in a state of constant conflict and a desire to produce. And produce and produce that filthy spew, that perfume-like in odor, that hard lotion which crawled on the walls and threw itself against the nearest moisture it could find.

On it, they observed the grown of several root and base-like plant-like forms in the eventuality of which they might get destroyed, they would split in halves leaving the cut marks from which actual intestinal fluids remained. They dripped and almost melted through one of them.

‘Careful now, I told you to keep your distance. Otherwise, who knows what might happen to us. They could take precedence and kill us down here and if that happens, you know they won’t allow entry any longer beneath slit.’

‘And would that be that bad a thing? I cannot fathom dwelling such a dangerous place. Not after what’s been doing to me, or us. Look around you, can’t you see what happened already?’

They adapted so quickly to the dark that slowly, there seemed to be no closure there, as soon as it would happen, they could actually see the sky again. Or what appeared to be it. Certainly it was much closer to an aurora which now came to stay. In its play of ionization, they could only stare like dumb flies, being drawn even closer to them at that.

Such a cruel thing to play with the moths, as soon as they approached, those thin masts drew everything they stored below the ground, becoming much wider, less mobile, bearing what appeared to be their weird nervous system above their cylindrical crates, which had been dragged from the drag, immeasurable legs which spread like arachnids but lay flaccidly on the bottom of the barely visible deluge.

‘Wait for them to stop, we can’t do something rash and risk angering them further. For now, let us try to establish some kind of connection to them.’

‘They’re cleaning the impurities, look. I see a bunch of fleas and other insects which found their way into their invisible deluge before us.’

Hastings pointed with his one good finger, in time to signal to the others. It was a fascinating look at how they stretched their legs and planted each of them slowly a few millimeters above, specifically chosen from their piles. From inside of them there came a set of tinier legs which began the surgery in order to take the fleas apart. Though they may not have been able to see it in detail, for the great part of it they understood the importance they had. As soon as they found what they were looking for, they started tearing everything else apart, while sucking the tiniest of valuable marks from inside of them. Red spots of canine blood. Feline and bats, whatever else they found themselves picking on. It was a massacre which only made one Jonathan approach.

‘Perhaps this should settle on how dangerous they are. I personally do not think they’ll approach the edge at all. Look, the masts are too high and they get defensive as soon as they approach. And I think those crates.’

As they were called, though that may have been as well a carapace which hide their true selves from those in, those who’d have to be spared from what was wrong there, that they shook from within. Large bodies met inside and as they had, neither of them could make it through alive unless they were fed. In this hidden co-dependency they found the joy, to mess with the lookers as soon as they began being paranoid.

More of the crate-hiders arrived. In the spare moments, to which they found the many joys of hiding away, they started imitating them, to the manner of attempting to stack. But a failure came at that, since their legs were so thin and weak.

But that Jonathan, the man of little sense, had a dead cat on him.

‘Why would you bring that with you?’

‘I’ve stored it ever since the Quintessential-Chief told us we need to cut off their supplies in order to save more lives. If this hasn’t been a sign that I’ve made a grand choice, I don’t know what it is.’

The Chief would not approve of this, but that wasn’t his choice any longer. What remained out of the plain view of an almost peaceful sight turned into the slaughter of the murk, as they made their way towards the ripple which began? No intention of sparing any piece of meat had been there. As they progressed into the pacing of their teeth being freed from beneath them, they saw them spread from beneath their crate, like tiny waves of meat which were only held higher by than their feet.

‘One of the bigger ones is drawing towards us.’

From distance they noticed a great amount of rocks which gathered from distance. After acquiring greater shells for themselves, it was only a matter of time until they could be greeted again by the likes of them. Walking like morbidly sick pigeons, they flew away from sight as danger approached, only to be met with the outside. And what had the others done?

The Observatory was no more in its current state, but in its living, strangled manner, wrapped by a few long tentacles which had grown on it. By their likes, the fat mass which had accumulated on it only managed to spare enough space for the emergence of the survivors.

It was a sad day indeed.

Whoever came out of there was no longer what they used to be. The sheer size, the change in them, which brought the likes of some remotely lost decency, gave them out. First they were one being, barely able to walk without the melting hands of the creature behind him who had to act upon its spine to do something to begin with. In a cruel show of how deep he's got, the other party looked at them as if they were some kind of diseased atrocities, victims of the worthless blowers.

'Who created the worthless blower? I cannot fathom any man who'd have betrayed us in such a way. And where had the organs been taken from?'

'I think we should return before they make their way for us.'

And it would be quaint to notice that the colorful island had turned bleak in an attempt to hide. The matter of that fact was that some eight of the new-rulers went out of their way in a pack of eight and formed an inter-connected circle. In the distance they could hear their chant. In the bleak patch upon which they stood, they were brilliantly vibrant. On their corpse-like texture stood entire bodies of texts. It had begun, once again, the ritual to which they'd invoke the dye.

From their newly enchanted bodies, only the greatest pacts could be made, with the exemplars of the most atrocious race. Illianthrops, the ones who never found themselves at home, opened a single piece from one one's chest, and the circle had almost been gone. From his chest came only a finger, long and strong, ready to burst something into a mound. But on its tip carried a piece of the unknown, a shade which could have been theirs, if only they knew what it took for them to be alone.

As soon as the ritual had been gone, the circle being broke at last forced everyone else on their way, other than the one who had been possessed.

'I think I recognize him, that used to be Andrei!'

He was not allowed to go near this Andrei, who used to once be a grunt, who worked on his machinations and devices, words to which he stood by, ready to die for the others found it oh so hard to return. To the old ways in which he painted, the bleakness of the world lay tainted.

‘Shall we turn back then? I cannot see a future here.’

‘And will you see a future down there where none may pay any attention to us? Where we may risk our lives to face a few crates? And what lies beyond them? I can barely suffer what my home had become, I cannot fathom living down there, lost and alone. I know I’m bound to get lost and to get caught.’

By whom, only he knew, for he feared something else there. Much worse than a few parasites, who crabbed each other the first chance they got. He saw them there, the first inhibitors of the islands, the words of the plates, those he tried, those he waited for, those he spoke with. It wasn’t what he saw, but down there, his experience had been much worse than what the others had experienced. The howls of the wind awakened him and only gave way to a disturbing manner of hearing.

When the voice came, he almost winced at the fact that it was obvious to him and to others by the look on his widened clot that something touched him. A startling voice he himself admit lay only in his imagination. And no words had to be used, only the vague awareness that he was there, breathing on the back of his throat. Inside of him but not deep enough that he would choke. His eyes had faded there, on the whim and the mistake he had to endure, over the fact that he had been forced to be obscured by the others.

This Carathriat stood behind the group. Unknowingly, even to them, they had started gravitating towards them, like a brood protecting a child, from the world which only appeared to have become more and more corrupt. With each age there, they began addressing the abandonment of the disciples, who had made those tools but never came forth.

‘Who were they? We ought to find them immediately. If this amount of damage was made by a few simple tools, think of what they might do if they’re allowed to live.’

‘Drop it, we’re responsible for this, not them. And I think it shouldn’t matter after all. I’m changing as well, not physically, but psychically, I think.’

They were doing things to him, to all of them which regurgitated what was going on there, their language, their symbols and faith, everything which made them who they were. Prior to the likens of the cruelty instilled into them, there was an inter-weave of limbs. So many of them were headed into a process of limb malformation which would return them to the days prior to the advent of society. A primeval air came there, the sky would never be haunted by the ultramarine for as long as they remained on the island. Unlike the colors that did spare a little for one to get lost in the likes of the sea, the change in shades turned into the obscure hideouts where they gazed into. The well above them, as it turned into a hue of greenish vermillion bore too many spots in which they rested. Far more dangerous than their own kind, they peered from the tiny replication of starlight infested space which they had brought out of their own race’ spoil.

‘I see we are cursed now. I think I understand. I may never be able to return to a place in my youth. All is gone now, the buildings in which I hid.’

‘as the squids and octopi, my dearly Clearmont’due, I can’t stress it enough that this saved us from a much greater destruction we couldn’t have hoped to suffer in any case. think about it, if we remained here prior to the change, we could’ve ended up dead. A point of high decease, I see no point into living. I see no point to fighting, or in hiding. That’s hope, that’s my version of it, I’ve always dreamed of a future where I could avoid the conflict and see another way.

Eighteen generations prior, I and my ancestors remained on the Island, hopeless of the fact that the attacks would stop. That they could somehow realize that their cruelty is not worth it and that we cannot be held accountable for them being here.’

‘What have your ancestors done? Tell me, now, before I grow up to be cruel and decide that it might be worth it to draw the information directly from you.’

‘Clermont, my dear, innocent Clermont, you do not realize what I’ve done. like my father and his father and his father for his child, they had scarified a piece of themselves instead of facing the truth. We are the reason for which they came here to begin with. It was an act through which they begged discourse and malignity.

One of my great ancestors had eaten a piece of it, I can already see it, far away in the Octopi cave, down the shores of Hygg, where they dared him to come.’

As an understanding to what was going on, there was that deranged activity proclaimed by those nasty eel-skinned, body peelers from the port, who had brought him to the sea point where the crest of the sea mountain arose. There Elias Cropstrack, walked in shame, to something that would haunt him yet. There would be uncertainty for his desire to submerge into the deep-diving suit, a dangerous thing, a winged helmet and the star-body of a mermaid embed on his chest.

His bucket-like helmet only gave a hint of the turpentine and it could not be denied that he felt a bit of fear near his own men. As they packed what he had given them in exchanged, there was always that hint that they could have him to be pleasant and be sprayed with as least of a deciding factor, the fact that his air container was limited for an hour.

‘This should last you for as long as you need to go in there. Do not try to overdo-it, or else you’ll drown. If anything goes wrong, if there’s even a hit that there might be sharks of any other dangerous sea-creature, pull this string of metal and we’ll draw you back. If we see something we do not like, we’ll pull you out.

If there’s a hint that the suit will malfunction, out. If there’s a hint that...

‘I got the idea. Thank you. I mean.’

‘Nervous, for a first timer it’s highly understandable. I would be doing the same if I were in your position, especially for this kind of research, doc. So I’ll ask you again, are you completely certain of what you’re doing? Because if you’re not, I could take you back and pay you in half.’

‘That would be all right, I haven’t come out here to chicken out. I’ll see to it that I won’t take any risks now.’

Of course none of them men put too much thought on it. He hadn’t exactly met any of the requirements for a diver, ever a half-decent one who couldn’t see past himself as he arose. But the suit should take care of most of the other risks.

‘And Cropstrack, in case, as a reminder, we have another suit and two more tanks. If you get stuck down there and we can’t pull you out, one of us should have enough experience to drag you out. in case. Ain’t that right boys?’

The laughs were, reassuring. Not for me, but for them, half of the time I thought they even considered abandoning me there, but I had to continue my research of the sea. It was by the first dive that I have gotten to truly appreciate the sea in all its might. There was something about it I could never hope to fathom on my own.

Something about it spoke for itself and I could only see past the led and the underwater light come from my helmet and the second one from the chest. There were tall choral growths which rivaled even the sea-mountains which homes the stars. Without ever considering the risk, he tried approaching, looking only evenly at the wooden mark which barely floated above him.

He remembers stumbling on something he shouldn’t have. In his marine engulfance, he found himself filled with some kind of mild terror as soon as he had entered the fray of the underground cave. The various porii he had come into contact with him only appeared to reinforce that dread he felt in his mind. The thing upon which I fell in contact with had its morose body stricken inside the wall. I found myself approaching, daringly at my own peril, to my own desire, which made want to know whether or not what I was seeing had been right. It seemed, ever so closer, with my approach that the moldering form beneath is broke the stone beneath it. Underneath the black murky oil in which it stood, there was the canopy and the filth which cruelly went beyond anything I could’ve thought off.

There was something about the cave which left its mark on me, the shades and the texture that bore of it was almost unsanitary to look at. For me, at least, there was that ever-present uncertainty whether or not I would give in and draw to the find that rest there.

This giant almost mushroom-looking creature filled its room with the likes of fungi-spreading itself around the various growths that entered and defiled every moving rim, every hair and every tentacle which prolapsed out of the ground area around it.

What fascinated me the most had been the fact that his creature oozed, almost lividly in a state which only brought something to my mind. Its many tubes that came out of its mouth moved and made sounds, those almost pipe like formations came to distract me from the human head planted in its lap. As this oratory of fungi called, I could see one solid form beneath him, almost like a kind of peculiar claw, which grasped around its own raw body.

At the top of its head, there lay a single hole which bore three mighty greenish eggs, adjacent to two circles with surrounded one another inwardly and outwardly. I could feel the surrounding stalks of black pucker rising around it. And one form that almost resembled the torso of a man had been project through the mass this thing bore.

No sooner than I could've anticipated it, I saw its body enter a state of changing, as if some inner blow created pink spreads inside its inner skin underneath its desaturated skin. Those tentacles within its head started flailing ahead, only to be brought within an inch of its admissal skin. My arms had been numb and I could almost see myself trying to grasp my helmet off in order to have a better view.

Only now, within an inch of my visor did I see its face. That almost enveloping dome at the top, seemed to be cloud-like not only in its appearance but in the way it had attempted to soften itself. Its lumps were starting to rise at the top, and I could see its many hairs jolting, almost like static from the mere pressure I felt it had.

And then, before I could make another step, I saw its servant. That of which I thought it may had been a mere patch of lumped stone, the enemy of fungi, the old crested, horned fiend. Of which arms were numb, the green could be seen but the same desatured texture appeared to be witnessed from within. On blank eye, almost pitch black game in to some contorted eye, like that of a slug, which distracted me from the other transparent one which seemed to almost share its appearance with the body. A few more spikes emerged and I could see its peculiar body try to purge itself out. A green malignance now came from a body which was almost made from one shape. It invited the others to sprout and I could feel the vile desire to shout. I saw the face of a man and the face of a giant mosquito in it, this fallen soldier, this contorted creature, wide eared, touched by the same black marked which rested around both of them.

like some lullaby, I had been greeted by this one, as he showed me the way in which I felt as if I could not convey a single thing which it tried communicating with me.

Would I end up in the same manner as they would? The one tentacle adjacent to the other one seemed to be largely active, into its process of flailing. I know it would retract into the ground as soon as I would approach. What gave it away was the sudden emergence of the one raising a few feet away from it. Without a way of knowing what I've done, there was this utmost lack of certainty whether or not I could be caught off guard. Either by them or by myself, as my actions couldn't even be accounted for.

I approached in fear, drawn towards it, ever so near that I could almost see myself being caught in the murk. But suddenly released by it, I felt as if I could step freely and feel no shame, no pain and no uncertainty that I should walk away from it. No, I felt almost repelled by my own senses as soon as I met that head within the range of my vision.

It started drawing in, but not entirely. I could see the likens of the bone drawing in, the holes in its empty sockets, the nostrils and the rest of it being left behind. Many missing patches, holes, slashes revealed themselves as quickly as it drew in. Most dangerously in awe, this thing couldn't force itself entirely, leaving only most of its body mass in there and what it had almost dare to devour completely.

'I must admit, my dear man that I have taken something from it. This is my one true sin from which I may never be able to atone.'

The event shook him ever since. Even the mere recollection of the event had the same nauseating effect on him. Thinking on it again brought not only some bad memories but, the vivid imagery which came to his mind. He couldn't force himself to forget despite how many times it had entered his mind. As a man, he should've taken the responsibility and return, but to be caught in such a state was far beyond anything he might've ever concerned himself with.

While getting close to them he could hear the sound of the pipes, those long flaccid open ended things which started prodding into him. It felt like this was an altar, dedicated to the fluid and the morbid which wanted to have a grasp at him. The sooner it would start moving its mandible and shaking the skull, the sooner he realized that there was a real chance he may have had at retaliation. His thoughts were sinking in it, regardless of what could be said or thought of it. More and more, morose, he could feel his skin be pale and flatten. Standing in the murk below him wasn't doing him any favor, over the fact that it could suddenly draw him in.

He sank a few feet but was still able to pull himself away.

'I've tried fighting it, but this desire which encompassed me was far too strong to resist. I've seen it, the likes which dwelled in this giant edifice. I believe it opened itself for me to take something from it. An offering, for me to bring back into the city.'

But he was threatened by that constant growth, which pushed completely as soon as he turned. The moisture coming from the sea helped them more than he could've ever imagined. He had not only been frightened by it, though again, tempted to remove his helmet as soon as possible. And he would end, like the one before him, in an utmost perfidious state. In the back he noticed that there were a few mosquitoes which had gathered, the delight of which he hadn't a clue how they got there. If it was meant to happen, the uncontrollable urges would take over. If the cave was to be broken completely by this thing's mere presence, what chance had he to fight back?

In a mere approach, which tempted him even further than he could admit to himself, he started unscrewing the pins of his helmet, by hands alone and with no other help. The strength permeated not from inside of him but from that thing, all to one point, where it had failed to achieve something, leaving him in a state of disillusion. A state of false manifestation which only wanted him to give in. His eyes felt like that one a shrunken head, smaller for the view which had been forced on him. As soon as he had realized the damage, it had been done.

The intention it had wasn't to completely remove the helmet off, but take an inch from it, so they would make him raw something of the air that came from it.

'I saw it, or he showed me. Now, I cannot say what were my actions, which were his, but I believe he made me want to see it.'

As soon as the inexcusable happened, I saw that all that corruption, all of those malign fungi came from inside of him. Now I saw him less of a creature and more of an organic living mushroom which had its kind be inside of him. A brooding mother, per kin, who only gave way for those octopi to come. I could see them even then, during our first interaction. They came out of the sea, as if called during the intention of never wanting to be intruded upon again. Other than my air-tube and the cord which was supposed to be pulled in case of an emergency, the entire way out had been blocked by them. And the thing was that they never bothered to even produce ink of their own, if ink that be.

'I suppose that it doesn't matter any longer, don't you see? I think that wasn't ink that had been brought on the island it was the secretion it produced. And I cannot help it but recognize some things in it that had almost made me want to sink deeper and not come back.'

I was watched thoroughly, not only by them, but by those taller versions of ourselves which carried their own weight and desires to act upon us. They wanted to deal with us in some way which was unpremissable, inadmissible, or on me. For finding out this detail I would've kept to my grave was to be my testimony of defeat. At my feet rested some kind of blessing that I couldn't walk. Weaker than before, I refused to run or to give in to what was being forced upon me. I had been pressed to continue despite my dismay, judged and been peered by a jury which had no intention on sparing me.

'Do not take this personally, but I admit that I have been a foolish thing. I've done something I can't help but regret any further, even to this point. To say that they forced my hand to take what I had already been inclined to take is an understatement which I cannot even bother to take away from.'

As desperate as it seemed, I swear, they amassed for that sole reason, which I couldn't fathom to get through. Being so near to him made me more attentive, it forced me to look at it, to feel its hardness, as not that of the previously mentioned thing, but that of a harder coconut, which only made the gaps it bore, the holes which tore its shallow insides seem like the bars of a cage. My armored gauntlet made contact and I felt something harder than iron. It shouldn't have felt that way but it had. He wanted me to push it through and drag a piece of it out.

The black plants rounded and mainly rooted at their very heads shook themselves as if a breeze had come from known surroundings. No longer had I felt as if I was there, but instead I was closed inside the world, the outside, my own house, anywhere but there.

‘Before I could even decide what I out to do with it, the strength returned. This living artifact pulsed inside my hand with a good reason. One which may not be denied by myself or anyone else who ought to me in my shoes then. I had no power to resist and no place there, but I gathered enough muster to pull the rest of the pins out and reveal it to myself.’

My expressions had been somewhat dimmed by the very fact that I saw a grin. On that creature, alas, the pink mass of skin which had been its face, which looked like a small mass at that, grown over the various areas above its top curled its eye even further, until it no longer looked an eye but the rolling tail of a pig, which bore the same texture, as I have noticed. The teeth were so long and appeared to be made of the same ever-prodding material as it had been made in its entirety. Curved and thick, I could’ve sworn that they were its tiny sea-dwelling feet.

But this creature hadn’t been aquatic and this was no cave.

‘I know what I said, but this lair was too wrong for anyone to dwell upon. For someone such as I to lay foot on, I couldn’t even decide whether or not I had been cursed upon a nightmare which came to life, of some daemonic verdure which entered my head and haunted the deepest ingrain seeds of eyes.’

It entered me, almost like it had been intended to. Knowingly, it came into my orifices and left no other mark, as it turned inside itself and left not a single thing on the outside. Only the moronic would’ve fathomed such a thing out of his ignorance, but I knew better, that I had been cursed then. With each second I stood unprotected, I could see their tiny hairs growing on the tip of my nose and on my cheeks. Something of their own was growing one, afflicting me with the undesirable menace I could not fathom on my own.’

And the effects were not even blocked to the realm of the physical, but rather, they started manifesting around me, even as I lay my helmet back in. There hadn’t been any air inside of that place, but it had kept me alive enough so I could experience it for myself.

That dreadful tentacle receded no longer, as its closest of kin followed; I’ve realized that they had taken me for one of their own. I had been confused for so long, especially after seeing that the way back wasn’t even in a need to return.

I must accept the fact that I could never even face myself any longer. For I’ve done there, this act of evil, this theft has been, so far, unforgivable. More so, it allowed me to leave. It allowed me, not I, for I had no strength to return, not a single touch, not more than I could see the fallen man start raising itself farther above, even closer to getting to my line of sight. A cast of his body appeared to be floating a few feet above himself, like a shell, or one layer of transparent skin, a phantom which momentarily left its body for a moment so it could leave its imprint on me.

‘Perhaps I should’ve abandoned the suit and remained there, so I could spare you of the trouble. But I was wicked minded and I had no care for anyone else other than myself. Do not bother trying to understand what my reasons are. This is neither your fault, nor.’

Mine? I could also say it, that once, I could almost take away everything I've done and absolve myself of the guilt. A culprit had to be taken away, but I could not spare myself from it any longer, for I had every recollection of the event and I remember each thought which went through and over my head. I was responsible for it. For I, had been the cruel thing which caused it.

'In the eternal gratitude I shall lay upon them, I must admit that they had allowed me to escape and join the crew on the boat. A rough landing, with enough taken from them was enough for me to return to my old ways.'

But it hadn't been as easily forgotten now, no longer could they see me as one of their own, but the insignificant creature which had not only betrayed them, who had also brought which scourge upon them. My people gathered around me and forced me down. Traitors were not allowed any gratitude, as this hadn't been a mere act of treachery alone, but a means of trying to crush them before they could even be allowed to rise again. Lost and afraid, I had been stomped by one of these greater ones, with an immediate certainty that I would not survive, it had left me.

Though it wasn't here, that I would end, I could feel it squirming from my chest with each pump and each stomp and each ridicule they threw about me. It shouldn't have been hard-felt, but I felt like I had been dead for a longer time than this. My ownness had been taken with it, as it submerged through the ground, making its way through the living stalactites, unable to be seen as our escape had already commenced.

Unknown to them, for they had attempted too soon, had been the fact that it was I who had given them the worthless blowers, the help of which, they had doomed themselves with.

That deceiver had escaped and in his vileness he had managed to thwart them from the descent into the Viler lands, where he would seethe and live with his work being uninterrupted. Now that he had achieved, what he had looked for in the vile decrees, he had been met, in the farthest of holes, far below the rims of stone and living throngs, by the things which inhabited the bodies of the octopi. In their strangest of dreams, these nightmares emerged, leaving nothing to be believed at first glance or second row. As these primeval creatures emerged, he had been greeted by the servants of Yyork, the Masamut of the supreme perfidy which came out of their tiny bodies defied even most mirific of broods, for eight such growing bodies inhabited one of the tiniest of sea-creatures they had crawled it.

One could only sense and feel their magnificence which had been concealed by the various growing hormones which had been kept at bay. From inside their ornamental glands, in which they had stored the gases, these giant red plackets of self-sealing cysts started growing back their tiny appendages, making sure they each had produced the tinier heads which had been thoroughly attached to their overlord, who had been long dead. Awaiting in his cave of fungi, he had desired that he would return, now as a supreme ruler of the depths, he suffered no disturbance from the islands, and would see to it than once his life had been recovered, he would govern everything again.

But that had little to do with him alone, as it was already known that there was an interdiction to his reaches, for even as ancient as it was, he still abided to the unspoken jists, the chrysalis of words which be unlike the lack of decrepit lords, put under the pressure of destruction. How they knew those wicked white-hooded crowned gods, that he, this creature of Yyork, that he had adapted a crown on top of his head. As vile as it was, he was put under a lock and forbidden entry into the otherworld.

It was a cruel act which came, as they had been made aware of his plan.

‘To you, Yyork, know that we shall not allow you in any case, to rule over the plains. If we grant you entry, we shall find our kingdoms ruled, by animosity of those who would not see you or your kind as one to be held high amongst the peers.’

‘For that, you shall dwell below, only in the accursed land of Hyeliyimaas.’

To which he had jolted, confronted by them, at the time of his supreme act of death, self-sacrificed, he please to the other gods of the underworld which came. The tame and the dreadfully insane, which couldn’t help it but be theirs, for all of their minds and bodies connected as the tribunal emerged. By the time he had been met in their neutral ground, in a self-creating cave, like that of his own, though it was widened as if to house a colossal giant, wide enough, hard headed, with eighteen hundreds of decaying bottle-necks and large claws and stings which should’ve made it so he would be met again by him. This Horzumat, who had house inside of him smaller giants, only to add to his bulk had progressed into deceiving them to adhere to the process of self-infantilisation which forced them to submit.

And each time he had done it, he would absorb them until they had become fetuses, at the time of which he pulled them from inside his chest, abandoning them to death. That was one of the previous creatures which be judged, found guilty, alas. Already had the cave been expanded, that it was time for only one to stay there. Thi’ Yyork, who had come and prayed that his fungi would start spreading again. For, at the end of the other side of the cave, the fiends who veiled themselves were symbols of the umbrae. Within their grasps, bodies cast no shadow. He could see how unwell they mistreated everyone, over their jealousy and misscreadance. They feared themselves and stood apart, for each bore a mark in their vile verdant, crimson, turquoise, magenta, green robes. And each of them bore a symbol at their necks, which symbolized the various credence, of life, of death, of malignity, fright, despair, everything unfair. Even if they had decided to take their hoods of they would reveal peculiar appearances which changed for each span of time.

One such revealed seemed to have garnered even a stranger look from Yyork, who couldn’t help it but try to face this confusion which took over him. It looked like a giant helmet, wide, almost like that of a vulture, but only the shape of it. No beak inherited by it lay, only a long protruding inwardly-pushing squared hole which lead almost in terms of the architectural form of an inverted pyramid inwards, to a bobbling point where the eyes were. But the thing was that he knew that was the mere skeleton, no mask and no mechanical part lay there. Only an ever-pulsating bobbling pay of levers which would make the rows of the inverted pyramid levels suddenly burst like tiny growths or bloody spots. And for his jittering smile, he showed teeth belonging to the likes of canine on one side, drawing inward to a tongue which projected and swam through most of the gums.

A constant appearance of a duplicate head such as his seemed to draw and push away underneath his neck. That one had been connected to the one on the top by a few filaments which penetrated from the back and from below his throat. Those filaments penetrated his head and kept the second head erect. There was enough space for both of them, as the two heads didn't appear like they were connected to a neck, but to a larger air-shaft like system which came out of his chest and shot into the same trajectory. It had merely resembled a neck, for it had no recollection of anything else.

Its mere contact with the human provided a frame of reference to him, on a whim, they decided to all pull away their cowls. This council of decay, from which another pulled a second spade-like appearance, of the deformed brain he wore, outside two crystal-face shapes, which clicked immediately as the realization came. That one had taken the form of the same man who had entered his cave. And below him, the bodily reproduction of the crystal could do nothing but reflect. The mad living fires which were not entirely burning but revealed that they were made out of red fingers that couldn't stop waving.

Beneath him, a circle of sand had delighted his appearance. The fire hadn't been inside of him, but had been underneath the cave, on a platform, as they were the ones who kept him there. In as strange as a ritual as that may be, there was only one dreadful thing which made them feel the wretch. As damned as it sounded, those fingers had belonged to lords, who had sacrificed themselves and their likes by committing acts of thefts for their lord Krysaleum. He, who belonged to the council spared no second time, he would not give away his empire, for none.

He had approached them in their dreams, from countless realms from within, they had agreed.

'Lord, we shall give you fingers, we'll sacrifice as much as we have. Give us only the freedom to do as we please. We'll trade them for your form.'

'so you may come into our world.'

As they had agreed, and started being sloppy as they stole from the King Theorpeus, he himself had taken them, brought to their knees, to a table of their own choosing, so he might be served.

'Lay onto me that which makes me unnerved. For this betrayal I shall take your fingers for each crime.'

To which they confessed more than one could deny them a fair treatment. A trail of their own rings fell off and as they a servant collect what was his, they had put in a pile of sand-hiss only to watch them change. Somehow they started heating themselves, growing all-so warm that they would almost be burning, leaving the marks of the walls, on skin and on ice. Wherever they may be, this effigy they had created of him kept him there.

And on his living, almost white-purplish sepia spade, the marks of fingers governed amongst the veins, to serve as a reminder that they were the only reason for which he was there.

Another dreadful one had come, the terror of numbing pain, which had nothing but a fearful look of defeat, almost melancholically-looking, seething with a few teeth in his mouth, his head projected backwards, and ending in a sort of infantile lambs which dragged away. Most of his arms were taken and bashed, as they had lashed at one another, poking a few holes which revealed the constant spread of a gaseous-acid which couldn't have escaped. It wasn't hurtful but within contact with any kind of nostril, it would take the likes of a miasma, a way to proceed into him spreading their long sheets of malignant paper-trailed skin.

Between his arms, those floating in the back, harrowing in the dark, their ritual began. As they unwrapped like crackling parchments, they had started writing down his every sin. And in itself, he had done more than one could be pleased. But these creatures here, who were trying to judge him were no rulers, they were petty thieves, infiltrators, deceivers and liars.

'We shall abstain from raveling who we are, what we are, out of the need of privacy.'

The verdant cowed creature spoke. And his follower, the turquoise had only done the same. They knew they must've been the nastiest deformed beings that ever wore, but what they hid between one another was an irrational desire to communicate with themselves, like filling necrophiles, those who were trying to get closer to the fungi which flew in their direction.

'Enough of that, you were not permitted to produce any kind of fungi, do you hear? By my command as the vileness of chaos, I forbid you entirely to produce it by any means.'

And those spore disappeared, now this cruelty hadn't even allowed him to swim in his own muck or to dare. Of course he couldn't speak but merely be interpreted as it produced a few sounds as it was.

'How are we to judge him here if he cannot defend itself?'

'It is by our kin that we shall take him from within, allow him to produce the symbiotic fluid that had been in his cavern. We shall interpret the ripples he produces.'

To which he had managed to have his own way. Permitted to do so they had not realized their mistake. In mere seconds, the entirety of the cavern filled with the muck, even underneath them, left their bodies undefended.

Their past and powers mattered little. Even is his undying form, his deathless gaze and his worn husk, he would still manage to despoil them in the vilest manner. That is how it had managed to avoid their punishment. For each second they stood in it, a piece of their very beings would be drawn and infested. Even if it were unknown, even with the lack of fungi and attention, the bodies of men appeared. And the creatures which had defied him in the past, soon there would be none to get him, as everyone got infested in their entirety.

Even the crystal armor fell asunder, as the dark coil of one of the oily liquors managed to come into contact with it after a self-satisfactory splash caused by a member of the council who fell from his side.

‘What is the meaning of this?’

But he had been blurred out. He couldn’t speak, nor was he approachable any longer. This seeping torment had given him enough power to start crushing his head against the nearest stone tablet he could find. It would be generous to give him a head start. But he heeded a touch, he needed to feel it one last time before he would give in.

His stained muscle-mass could only merely attenuate the fall. He had been shattered. And in their end, for the lack of better words, he had lashed one final time at him.

In the wake of Pyerothrat, the loathsome cephalopod appeared out of the ether of the dark. He had brought the unlawful thinking and the dread of the invasion which came and threatened everything in sight. As the others manifested inside the room, sometimes floating, other times simply peering through the walls and from within one another, their like, they brought the reef. They had made it feel at home, from within the likens of the dreadful pillory dark snow which entered the cave.

York would wait there until his revival could begin.

The process would be long enough for him to waste no time in song and no more crassing. They would pay him their minds and leave him be once he was done. In the meantime one could deny the fewer, mightier of needs.

For somewhere out there, there was the call, of an unexpected man who couldn’t help himself but find himself lost, at war against himself, unlikely that he would’ve spare another worse, he turned. He saw something of the man standing in front of him and remembered that there was something else waiting for him.

‘Barnabee, if you don’t mind, could I rain check this thing? If feel like there’s something wrong going in my head. And I can’t help it, but please don’t take this as something personal, but I need to be alone for some time.’

‘Are you sure about it Malt? You seem worse, worse than you had been a few moments ago when I’ve taken you inside.’

‘I’m certain, I think I’ve got something to look into now. There’s nothing I want more. I think I’m showing sings or going back.’

‘Where would this back be now?’

He could only smile and hide his chin, as if it hadn’t mattered at all. But he knew that he would get them back, now that enough time had passed. He could hear them, even vaguely, in the form of laughter. But their voices were so calm, that he could not help it but want to run and hide inside his room and dance and madly glance at about everything.

Malt had been animated, he was living, he pushed through the door as a new man.

‘Up already? Shouldn’t you be resting in the bed now?’

‘Not any longer, I think I’ve caught a glimpse of something and I cannot help it but..I don’t want to spoil it. But I think I’ll see you in a bunch, ma’am.’

Clarisse, she was a neighbor who owned cats, now I saw it, so many of them now pierced through her floor and went through that piercing bowl of an insurmountable celerity. I wanted to see for myself what was going on.

‘Clarisse, would you mind it if I entered your room? As a guest?’

Barnabee was trying to look at the entire ruffling, but he couldn’t help but stare out of a blind eye. He was missing something in his room, I, I was supposed to be there. I have not realized how rude it had seemed now, but it didn’t matter. For as much as I would endure that, I have received a new gift, with which I might peer into one of the rooms to see. She was hiding the hole, she down there, I was allowed to take as much as I wanted.

‘As long as it takes Malt, don’t take it personal now, but I wish you would visit more often.’

More than that, he saw the pipes, for the first time, making up the entirety of the buildings inside the block. So that was the skeleton which kept it all alive, or had it been that it had grown so much that it penetrated the unknown layers, and the bunch.

From them, as he lowered himself so he could place an eye on their metal carcass, heard the liquid going through them.

‘Are there water pipes? Here goes another cat.’

In front of him, as casually as one of them could make of it, a black cat leaped inside that dark hole, disappearing in its entirety as if that had been its very home.

‘They’re always coming back, you now? Every single time, without any exception, I can’t seem to stress that. Barnabee, dear, is that for me?’

‘You may as well since the fellow abandoned our session and the tea-drinking confession. Perhaps it would be too much to ask of it now, but why is there a hole inside of your apartment?’

‘It’s always been there.’

Clarisse said, though to admit it would be infuriating, at least that so, it would mean, that going father away within sight, one could find the culprit, or one of them, the likes of which lead, after millions of miles away, to the gateway of their desolate world, where the home of the mountains was already being occupied by the most perilous and malicious of things. The proto-living pipes enable the rise of a great inverted bastion which held the likes of some heads above, no longer in the chain of command. Under them, their bodies had been enslaved and had counted on themselves to rip out the anchors so they might join the higher altitudes and carry themselves near the peaks.

For in the farther, higher reaches, where snow hadn't been pale, there were highly jointed monstrosities which came to be alive again. Reanimated by the chaos which had erupted in the universe, they had taken their solemn positions of pain, and took their highly plastic bodies in the air. Flying was only a matter of spreading their fat bodies away from the main nervous system and spreading them evenly through their long arms. They would fly, armored as they were, chained and lastly, bearing the dark flames which ranged the coming of corruption.

None knew anything of the affliction and the derangement they presented. Of their long fight and their stolid might which had been lost of them. For they had been silent for too long and something in the past brought the unstoppable back to life.

Even the Earl, who had been in reality, only the architect of this dirt infused abomination could ever bring some hope back. As the production slowed, he hadn't cared for it anymore. There was something else he had missed, he wanted to get out of the barrel and return to the place he missed the most.

'I shall abandon both of you here and make my way further in.'

'Wait, it's dangerous.'

'Mightily dangerous, you may be overwhelmed. There's too much chaos going on for any of us to have a hope that we may survive. Are you certain you can handle it?'

'I was prepared to face everything I so desired. But now, I've been abandoned by some of my allies and I believe my fate lays elsewhere. I cannot slowly wait for this barrel to go endlessly in circles.'

'But it's required, this method of mixing everything, our chemicals within them, they cannot fathom going anywhere else. If we wait too much, we might risk exposing the materials to some dreadful disease, from which we may not be able to remove from it.

It's a highly-chemical abomination, that's their secret. I've heard it from one of the other workers. They implanted it inside of it, that's how they're mixing it. I know what you're planning, stranger, you want to stop it, but know that it will only result in us losing everything.

If that thing grows, the entire realm of Hypernychl will be in peril.'

‘Must I care for it?’

Answered the Duke? As he had done it, he had slowly pushed through, for he was no child but he had been stricken by a relinquished poison of muscle which had nothing more to spare. He would rise again and hold them over, not like servants but two insects which had dared pushed themselves past their quota. Past what had been acceptable, this was to be the oratory point to break, the way in which they could never hope to get away. Sweat ran down their foreheads and it only seemed, to better feel that this is where they stopped breathing.

‘Your services are no longer welcome. I refuse to do their bidding now.’

For each level through each barrel, he had looked at them, and seemed to be aware that neither of the servants in the other compartments cared much about him. He was like a foolish fiend, who found it unable to get through to them. But so afflicted had he been by the malady, which showed itself in terms of agony.

The two other passengers, slaves, whatever they were went away. He could see himself be forced to stay there a little longer. Nothing was certain past the point, yet he had heard it spoke in little more than a tone.

‘You cannot interfere with them, Duke, this core needs to be properly fed and clothed so the plans could progress. Do our bidding now unless you wish to be thrown into the Realm of high distress.’

From which he could only get enough himself, of the likes which wanted to get him throat down. He would no longer be the humanoid thing he had praised himself with, and yet. He rose up as one of them. Touched by a thing which had been un-physical repelled his armor and revealed a growth of fingers and of toes, amongst the limbs which pushed onward. This change drew on and on, until he could encompass a barrel with his entire body.

His head had changed, to better himself of the age, and eight more head, eighteen more which followed spread in the general area where they remained. And in them lay some kind of valor, the strangulation of disembowelment. From it, there appeared no break, as each looked young and older, but each of them was dead.

‘Those are the one you have abandoned. Need you be reminded that you have given a piece of your treasury and their lives to escape the aristocracy? For what?’

‘I would not be a servant any longer.’

He said, and the voices of the dead rummaged through his head. And this change echoed through time and escape, and through the barriers of the universe which called him back into the fray. Where the being named as the Courtesan had been drawn back to awareness, as, for the little moment spent in doubt, he couldn’t help it but shout.

‘What had he done?’

The Elegant and the Queen in her lair, looked as him disturbed by the fact that no beast and no fiend, no close deity would have power over him. For now he waited, looking benign.

‘You would not dare abandon me.’

Said the Elegant, surprised by the fact that he would not only do so, but he would doom them both as his long and thick appendages would begin sinking their sharp ends in the ceiling above them, releasing the dreadful acidic sea and giving it free reign for them to be submerged in it and never have a chance to come. In their own terms, as soon as it would be spoken, they were disturbed. Left there as he went through untouched, unaffiliated by the misery and by the factors which broke skin and bone apart.

He could feel below him, the sound of two beings shouting, realizing that there would be no hidden bridge, no lair between universes any more. And after trying to go through the deluge, he found himself drawn to reality, breaking through a wretched piece, only to find himself surrounded by mutations, recalcitrant creations which looked like the recognizable people in his kingdom and beings which didn’t belong anywhere else. Within the fumes of his appearance, they tried sinking in their teeth and spraying their shallow perfumes on him in hopes he would attract the inflated protozoan parasites so they might start the infestation. But as soon as he whipped himself away, he drew and pushed and brought in the scum back through the masses.

Within his reach, there was no need to use force. A mere decider in their extermination had been the clear storm of agonies he had brought in from home. as a reminder of his kingdom and what they’d face, he brought form it a cloud of pus which infested them instead. Their actions backfired, their sprays misfired and soon they would be eaten by millions of life forms themselves.

Gourney had been lost in thought. It’s been two days already since she had been lost. He was still in his office, back to square one, unable to reconcile with the fact that she wasn’t there. Even the small man who was usually going back at the same spot, to the same engines wasn’t there at all. It wasn’t like he wanted him to be there. Only time could tell whether or not he might return, and that alone might wager the fealty he felt.

‘I wish I could tell you I’m sorry Catherine, but I cannot do that anymore. You’re nowhere near to me and I can’t even gracefully express how wrong I had been.’

There was that sense of distress with haunted him for no less than a few moments. Every now and then he got out of his chair and made it for the door. No one visited. It was the light from outside, the constant beating sun shades that made him realize he couldn’t escape. Not now, once they would get him, he could at least protests at the images. He could see them, freshly out of the camera, the remains of her being spread, or her being dragged from a puddle of blood.

Unadvisable, to say the least, I could not even dare to think about it. I wanted to change but I could not. She pushed me away, but at the same time it wasn’t her, but I. And the was the constant droning, always coming from the files. I had to check them again, even though I couldn't help it but stare. And stare, time to act, and be aware of it. My numbness came, another picked up thing and I could see her now. The mere cardboard in which it had been placed started seething.

A dull pain in the chest and the noise of the most inconspicuous drones came to me. But that wasn't a drone, it was one of the engines being started. I wish I could there to see, but I wouldn't have been prepared anyway. For the sight inside the gluttonous engine was that which would resemble many gas encroached pupils. They moved. It was them who gave the flying machine life to begin with. As I amassed enough guts to come forward, I understood that this intention got me out of my cage.

'If this is a sign, then I shall go ahead and see what's calling me there.'

He spoke, with a gully in his throat. Unable to even continue dreaming any longer, he dropped the file before he could even see her face. It might've been too disturbing for him to look into it in any case. Worse than that, he started painting the walls on the way out. Remnants of the men who had been called earlier that way, out of the bucket of white he picked up the brush and started throwing it about everywhere. No side could be left undone. He couldn't help it nor had been wanted to be spared of any interesting click. And another one, he followed a pair of grasshoppers into their small bush thicket.

That's when he saw one of the case-files, within his sight, they merely moved across one entire jump across one building, disregarding him completely, as if he mattered even little than he had do. But enough of the insolence, he spared no glance, and made his way about two thirds of the street which was about him. In the reach of his hand, there was always that grab which picked it up. No cigar, he looked back, desperately trying to light it up, white stroke brush still in one of his hands. At least he could spare a few bites of it to think whether or not they would act again or if he was seeing things.

'It's daylight, it's still daylight, there's no mention of you being out here during the day. Why can't go away and leave me be?'

Gourney closed his eyes and looked through. They had been gone, more so, now, more importantly, they went through the bricks and entered the same building he had come from. If that was a case for concern, he hadn't paid any word on it. Only a few blunders of his cigar went away, as he would try to get as far away as possible. To the engine.

It drew him, like a smoke-making pair of wings. It and he were alike. He thought about how near it would be if he could close in and leave him mark on it. A deep blue paint lay on top of it, why not give it a stripe?

'Hey you, what are you doing with that brush?'

'I was trying to get it somewhere, I'm working with them.'

‘Who are them? You better not be a hooligan on his way to vandalize that plane, I see that you’re a decent fellow by the way you’re dressed but I don’t know.’

He was watched, thoroughly, instantly smelled. A perfume of sweat dictated the fact that he had been profusely set on trying to get as much from him as possible. He would be unable to take from him anything. Not now, not here. I chose to run away, from sight. The way he looked, as if he would bash me if he were to catch me wasn’t reassuring. My sudden turn lead me to that place again, where she was supposed to be going.

‘I don’t know if you’re in there Catherine.’

‘Who are you talking to?’

Small girl, head like wooden flick, a red balloon of leather in her hand. Inscriptions gave it away, by the fact that they seemed to speak about something which happened inside. I could not dare pay a second look. But I smelled it. I felt it, I saw it through the brick again.

That fiend was laughing. It bore its crested half-a-shell through its arms. With each push, it could only wage some kind of ground-encompassing appliance, a defiance which made it draw onward as it started pushing its hands below. Even there, its hands started furthering deeper below, then took a ninety degree turn below, slowly becoming something close to a few tails which wrapped themselves as soon as they could against the rocks.

It wanted me to see them, to feel them, the inscribed woman which had been trapped inside of it. He had taken her there. I wish I could join her, so we may be trapped together. Perhaps that’s what it wanted me to see. Perhaps it was that which made want to draw in and join inside the other rock. The more thought I spared for it, the more had I been tempted to go in to that endeavor from which I may never come back. And who would take care of the archive.

‘Bad things inside that building.’

‘What was that kid?’

‘There are nasty things inside that building over there!’

‘I know what you feel, I’ve had to deal with them myself. They’re not that inviting. If I had to choose, I wouldn’t go towards them willingly.’

‘Don’t go, mister, stay here, it’s not worth it.’

‘Unfortunately, I’ve made a mistake that I need to correct. If not I believe I may never be able to forgive myself for doing it.’

She didn't understand, of course she wouldn't. It was already hard as it was. So many times, I thought I had the right idea, that I could take it as I could and go in, then never look back. And perhaps I could simply turn and let her go, but I wasn't that kind of man any longer.

I left the girl and made it to the door. The brush was left at the entry. I made sure to leave a single straight line so I could mark my place. Regardless of how I felt, I didn't go with rage any longer, I simply went in. As the lines of white and hose of reality were blurred in, this had been simple enough. The sight of the creature residing inside the building was gone.

'You know, I was surprised that you waited in this spot for so long. Judging from the reports, I swear I could've put my finger onto something which read, not always in the same location. And not to be too crude now but I think you made an exception for me, haven't you?'

No answer came. Obviously, I wasn't expecting a parade, but the least I might've been offered was the greeting part.

'Right on time I see, why, have you come for me now?'

They were brightly dressed, almost a priestly coven which bore their precious regalia marked with some pieces of gold wrapped around each of them, around five to seven locks of times. It might've been a thing, I can't stress enough how desperate I was to get one of them attention. But I was simply not there for them. Not only had they ignored me but I appear to be baffled at the mere fact that they were so many there. They carried a carpet for him, whoever he was.

Some of the high fronts brought candles, as if they were supposed to be numbered that way, in any other word or tatter.

'I can barely even believe all of you are here. After all, I seem to have wandered here by chance. You wouldn't happen to be illusions, would you? I would not be shocked if that were the way.'

The hooded figures could only jerk in restraint. Their hoods were practically chained to their skin, pushing through their bodies and leading to the very ribs of the floor. Going through it, to say the least, was the least compromising way through which these poor sops had been trapped with him. Most, if not all had that strange look, as if they were constantly being strangled by something here and there.

Surrounding their bodies were a few other chains which were so tightly wrapped that one could feel them being suckled apart with each constant rub. Yet their faces showed no expressions, despite him having seen a hint that underneath them there were faces, bowed down to a pulp, but actual faces nonetheless. And if they were that, I could draw in closer and touch them. It was a peculiar experience, getting in ever so near as to shake one of them off. Their lathy smooth silky grasp could not force me off one of them.

Despite his best attempts, I could not be overpowered. As I spoke to him he understood in what position he was.

‘The last man who tried that ended up being knocked down. I must give you a fair chance to know that if you dare do it again, I shall knock you down and you won’t be able to greet the lord of whatever abomination you may want to invite in this room.’

I was not expecting to be yielded that easily, to my confession, I would rather not commit a second sin. But I wanted to open his robe as soon as I felt the missing top above his nose. Right in the area where the nose was at the wisest, the rest of it curved behind. And it had not been that, as a sole decider that I have stumbled into something I shouldn’t have, but I felt my hand being drawn in. It was trying to eat me, clasping my hand as I felt it become a spray of dust which had been pulled inside of him. Even though I held my ground, I could see myself being drawn more and more until I almost got to the point of losing myself in there.

The aroma or the scent I’ve given gave it away. I was fading from reality even momentarily, before I could even have a reach for him temporal lobe which had been surrounded by his cajoling armored teeth. As I drew on to stay a bit more in there, I could feel a pair of his own molars growing on my knuckles, pushing in both sides. My fingertips had become a part of his cortex and for a moment, in that strange aphrodisiac lack of knowledge, I felt as if I had become him. Only momentarily had this thought disturbed me before I even decided it was time to pull back and look at my hand.

‘You fiend, I thought I was a goner.’

But I had been betrayed myself. As one of my hands dug up through his chest. I felt the chains and pulled one dead end thoroughly enough to see him for what he was. Not only had he looked benign but he had tried to get me. It may be that I was lucky enough to avoid the assault of concentration of the others, of whose minds I could feel leaping and glancing at mine. I was being spied upon, mesmerized, or forced in an attempt to submit to them, so I would stop distracting them and bring a stop to their peculiar ritual of self-metamorphosing.

I saw the ends of the chains and winces. Despite us being ever-presently pushed on the lap of that great creature which held us all at bay, I looked at what they had brought it. That fiend of ages, which brought with it only the utmost repelling pair of snouts which washed themselves away as its body, could not enter through the door. It had been magnificently colossal, into his wake of a graver thing, the walls were gone, and I had arrived in their world.

The acolytes, or strange divine figures which had wrapped themselves around each age-like rune which stood on the ground, appeared to be controlling the very age of the being stranded with us.

And the waters falling from the top of their strange hills had taken forms of crushed materials, which exposed themselves as looking oily. From them, I could see the various trapped ships they had prepared, the tools of another race which had inhabited this place. Of them I knew little, as I could not stare away from a maliciously-looking hold in the distance in which they stored their larger folded youths. Despite my ever-growing presence, my eyes turned back to it.

The chains pulled everyone down, other than I, they bowed and prepared themselves to look at this almost Deformed-looking fiend, though it had only resembled the fierce sea-shallow in part, as it split into multiple shell-like growths which accommodated for each trunk which lay in there. From inside there also came one long head which twisted like a cork-screw, releasing its many widened arms, each of them holding that piece around their claws, strings, of green, which looked almost electrical in nature.

I saw them open themselves up, pushing through an ambivalent form through those electrical cords, figures, or shapes, outlines, of grave things which never had the chance to drawn into the daylight, before I turned and saw the giant creature, with its spread arms, which still looked down upon us. I could not make its face but I knew that this tiny formation of hills, the tiny splashes of mild-water surrounding us only lead back to it. The malevolence which held us in its lap, who smirked and looked out of his bedraggled chest, which bore the marks of a long enforced servitude. He had been forced to endure something which was much worse, and I could fathom something else from him.

Whatever I had seen before started fading away, as my mind would no longer be forced to conjure images concerning what had encapsulated it inside the house. I felt unable to comprehend what it had become, or what my lack of sense, and the disturbing confession I could only protests to. I saw it release those long arms, to which it bore only the wreathing belts that never left its body. What I had believed to be the end of a head was nothing more than a giant bud which opened now, for me alone to see the various appendages it had bore inside of it, each of them being leashed over as it lashed, as it pushed itself aside and started flying away in the air.

Every piece which had ever been remotely connected to it left it, and I was left with the impression that I had been clueless to whom was I progressing to. To whom was I even daring to spout, to shout, to declare the inadmissible knowledge of which one was the creature who was holding me in here. Trapped, inside this strange plane, I looked at myself no longer as a man, but as one of those bulging, small eyed, pink-fleshed slave. And I could not fight it as it turned to me, starting the incarceration process which forced me to kneel and face the full blunder of its imprisonment.

I had been given a robe ever since and appeared to be lost for as long a period of time as I could writhe in pain and struggle as to face the god I seemed to serve. But I could not look upon him any longer, as I had the vague impression that the piece of him twisted below itself left me as well. In this confusing wonder, I could not dare to even think of the plains in which I would be brought, or why was I to be trapped for the rest of my life, as I had come here to find her. Now I stayed, never to be found again.

Through the writhing floor, there had been a hint that he would be no more. In his least deceitful manner, he had found himself unable to discover anything of the place he had been in. They would look, the people trapped in the rooms of the hotel, unable to figure them, what had went wrong. The least they could even decipher for themselves was why the carpets had all been strung. Picking all of them up to piece they all together would result in the making of a perfect replica of one of those necks, those throats belonging to a bigger headless gaze.

A quicker notice brought to the mark underneath them brought one of three results, the mark of three harpies, sisters which missed a piece, one lacked a quarter of her jaw, one her teeth and one her youth. Smaller harpies were pressed even in the form of smaller eggs. It was a craftsmanship which could not be easily dismissed. If it were for one to dig deep enough, he would find himself never stopping, never reaching until he had dug out a hole through the carpet and through the rim of the wooden doors. Moreover, after dark, the night would come to set them apart.

Room thritranon'n, which bore a more obscure set of gowns, the lady in it was name Clara, who shaped her youth into a most disturbing twist of matters, her face was missing, but the latter ends only pushed through her face. It was through her that the emerging, horned saliva of Mlorxix came. Through its eyes and fleshless dyes, he body had begun oozing, vibrating and falling on itself. Her hands were mere joints for it to play with, she had been dogged, forced to move as on a leash as it would spill from inside of it.

And of her, for the matter of a few generations, she'd feel, the wretch taking over her body as soon as her skin would peel off. Not a few of them had been affected by it, but she could look at herself, younger, old, decayed, bold. All of them were there, sisters of her, not replicates. They had been brought from somewhere as a gift.

Though they appeared to have retained somewhat of a normal look, one could not stake the feeling of the dripping plethora of amniotic nerves that emerged from inside of her. They grew on them and began chewing. It was undecided whether that had been her human side or the result of the saliva growing in size. And it had grown, or spread, or pushed her limbs until she had been fattened and repelled by her sisters, only for the nerves to act up again.

They would spread like a stunning gas, forcing them to spread on the walls, as their would mold themselves in an utmost sickly manner, so the proceeding infestation could go so much smoother. Not to be as rude to point but she would start at it, to join.

'May I be allowed to leave now, sister?'

She pointed at her, heartless as she wore, her body being as nasty as that of a harpy, which in truth had been much more decent than what she was before. No more would she wonder, nor lust at the way through which they looked at her with the lust of roses, and the deformed poses of their ill-kind. Only a blind protruding parasite could look at them as anything but supper. And in a superb turn, the saliva started pushing onward so it might take pieces of them again.

The summers of My'shal had been long impoverished by the falling comets that entered it crude atmosphere, above its light-inducing rays, there hordes of Byih'thanos, had come and marched upon the edges of its last tormented moon-shade. A daring raising base stood somewhere in its march 'like formation of pine-fractee, to which they garnered the last approach of the coming Illiac, that bore their heads above the lost remnants of the broken shores, near which they rested.

By their stoicism stood the utmost peculiar pair of arms which stood upon one another, resting on each other's fierce bodies. Their mere replicant ability had given them the supreme advantage over stacking on top of similar forms until they had circled the universe by the mere mighty alone. In them there was a skin-eating disease, carried from one to the other, pleased by the most awful of barely-dug trenches inside their arms and inside their planet. It could not be helped any longer as they started applying those immobile chests which stored their heads. Above their golden bodies, by a single spine-like pole there rested the glass in which an utmost lost head came.

And from their lips they almost gave the impression of big and unscrupulous worm-like big, and ever-protruding membranous descending curved needles that pushed on and onward, crushing each other's masses in a battle to over-encompass everything within them. To say that there was at least the look they would share, could not ever bother one to be unfair.

Battles had started, their wars uncouth over the rise of the great member of their enclave, the Iddod, an overtopped cancerous Lomax which had started growing into one of their arms, taking over and crushing asteroids in the universe under his own mark. He had looked upon the others, realizing how helpless they were. And in an immediate crush, none of them would be spared. After a few leashes, the encumbering forced had crushed the chest between them and the Lomax would completely take over, unrestrained any longer by no possible force which may rule upon in. The torment had begun, dread would not be gone, as they would begin their wars there.

Their peculiar planet, which felt like the stepping on a sea of encumbered milk held them behind, being rather eternally-moving in jolting directions, upward and inward, to the point of breaking in which from inside of it the head spilled itself to the point of leaving. As the hiding had come to an end, he got out of it, a head with ended up in a dead end, looking almost starved for battle, battered, for the lack of a taste, his lips were fatter, his teeth curved as far as to encompass his entire body around every side, like a protecting veil of armor which would never fade. Soon enough, he would be dead from the assault they had.

As the many armed pincers started opening and closing, biting at him which each leash, which had only come from either side of the battle, he could not help it but recede as his evil cloche started sinking its teeth back. And as they would bite each other, drawing as much blood as to leave the entire universe bleeding, he would be called to his return. They would mourn him as soon as he was gone.

For he had abandoned his body as soon as he could do, trying to flee away in a swoon, remaining almost primalistic as it looked behind. From his eyes came a ray which disemboweled their arms as soon as they could fall in place. Unable to account for the various strings that came about their necks, penetrating the glass cases which hid their heads, they had been destroyed. As magnificent as it would be, one could not help himself but see how awful that creature be, in its writhing agony of blow, it had taken the cords which came out of its eyes and started drawing in as much of their essence as he might. In two thirds of the battle, he almost faded from existence to see what he had achieved by this plan of his. As the parasitical embrace had not only drawn away from them whatever had made them be, but it had also taken away their piety and minds.

He reconstructed the mold in his image, in another transparent slide of the world, in which he stood and wasted not a single second in which they might find a way to backstab him again. This fiend, who bored itself high up in the air was met, by eighteen dead men, mutes who looked peculiarly sod.

And they had been tall themselves but bred forth a lack of defined features, but each of them got afflicted by a crystal mark which entered them. Be it a crystal skull of crystal hands, a crystal chest or one crown. And that had been the desired mask which made him think of the curse of thrall.

‘I shall have you all enslaved in my thralldom. If you cannot force yourselves to serve me, then I shall bring ruin admits you all. I know of the creature to which you’ve given your souls before. That crystal skeleton of ruin, that malignant ruler for which you cannot help yourselves but spare.

Not a prayer, not a soul, for if you do, I shall crush you all and torment you to no end.’

For in the recollection of the past, what he had done was unacceptable. It was a mistake, a betrayal to no end, for which he couldn’t even draw himself back. What he wrought was the complete destruction of what had brought him back.

‘Listen here, dear ones, for I have to bring back to your minds, the thing which brought me back to life.’

And they sat down of chairs of sand, wood, and some replaced with skeleton feet of glass. Others might’ve melted, some lay undefended by the treachery which had been there. Underneath the floor below them, there had lain the ultimate sign of despair. Separated by thin molecules which lasted for only fractions of seconds, there had been the plentiful pieces of the one they were governed by, their emissary of glass, the king Glinti’arn. From bolts of glass which entered about two thirds of the way, they would walk away at times, unable to defile themselves.

No amount of pain would satisfy for as long as he would be aware that they were his and he was theirs.

‘I’ve made the flatness of this world twitch. My image is spread, sculpted for as far away as I could reach. And at any time, I may open one of my billions of jaws and eat any of you if I so desire to grow at all, harmfully deranged, throwing you into the hedge of my clenched openings. Know that you’re under my spell, and you shall do as I say.’

A nodding procedure could only symbolize the lack of any kind of desirability to proceed. They would be at each other’s feet, eating from the plates he had given them there. As they had admittedly come up from below, in drones of the earth's show of proceeding holes, they had been taken beyond the rims of their ends, and lowered down so they would meet their faces.

The metal claws which adorned them lay somewhat pushed onward. From them, they could feel the troubling beating which had come from inside. Each of them looked in confusion, waiting for him to tell them what the question had been about.

'Shall we hear of your story and how come you came to be dormant in our planet during our conception?'

'Eating these seems, suspicious.'

'And yet the two of you will do as I please and as I want.'

For this ghastly falling piece of shade which came out of his head could see that the king Glinti'arn, that dreadful creature was spying on me. Spotted for the least engrossing manner, he would disgustingly fetch himself from inside his hiding spot and stay aside, looking for and what he made.

'Is this the realm of Narcissism I see? Could there be nothing else but a dreadful agony from which I cannot raise myself from?'

You've outdone yourself again. This time you've destroyed their original bodies and weekend them to the point where most of them are armless, if one has one at all. Can you not see the fantastical dread you have produced here?

I see a face on the ground, it has no eyes, but multiple openings which cry, and their laughter can be vaguely heard through my addition of glass nerves. I cannot help it but see that flaw which reeks inside of them.'

'And what might that flaw be?'

'In all of your mouths you've started regurgitating life, in a most atrocious manner of agony. This cannot be a thing of your own doing.

I've come to suspect you of taking some outside influence. It's almost as if you had been spoken to, during your dreams.'

'How long have I been listened to? May I not even be allowed a voice to get through? I appear to have been betrayed, time and time, after again. You, Glinti'arn, were supposed to be an ally of mine.'

'And yet, it was you who had betrayed me, who had adopted another name, which isn't yours, who had shaped himself like them, even now I can see how your real face is fading.'

He had been so jealous of them so capricious that he taken their appearance, stolen from them, copied and decided that it would be worthless for him to wait. There were many things wrong in his head, one being the shattering remark and the lack of fault which had haunted the mindless head of his.

‘You’ve started going at it too bluntly, now the life which may come out will come out as stillborn. That’s what you’ve achieved so far.’

‘Blasphemy, you cannot think that I will be tricked this easily. I’ve got full control over them and I shall breed them over and over again.’

Only for so long could he do it, until he found out that he had been right. This Glinti’arn looked at a world filled with stillborn, which had been filled with the laughter of lifeless faces, imitations. Recklessly unnerved, he couldn’t face it but be brought to shame. Now he could not look at him again.

For in his arrogance he had repeated the same mistake which resulted in him killing those things to no blunder.

He had his misery held there, as his ongoing construction had been brought to a stop. He could barely fashion his own ends out of what he saw, as the hornet-like dens emerged, and from them he could see like emerging again.

‘You’ve succeeded where I failed, but I’ve got no doubt that you’ve used some trickery instead.’

‘No such thing.’

It was highly inadmissible that he could count on his own desire to break through the mold and fold himself to no end at all. He could be uncouth over the fact that he had broken all of them for as long as they might be able to feasibly be. His recklessness only brought him to feel as his he lost a piece of him for as long as he started into their eyes.

Every single time a fiend of crystal and of glass would come out, he would wager some kind of word of dread, he would be unfed and uncloaked by whatever he had brought back, the many plucks which had appeared on him started pushing forward out of his eyes. Despite the lack of that blubbing areola-looking extrusion of irises, they began growing of bubbling tendons which had snapped out of him.

‘You’re boiling like a mad being, this needs to stop.’

‘I shall never give you the satisfaction which had been taken away from me. I shall destroy you if I have to, heed my words and return to the place of blunder from which you came.’

And in his crystal home, he returned out of a crystal almost triangular elongated portal he had made from himself, in which he stepped and went out. No longer contained by his own wretch, he passed into the world and never came back. Those tents of his followed as they would appear to be benignly drawn inwardly to no end. He would suffer the confession of dread and the clarity of having strayed for too long at faults. He would be shattered, he swore.

‘For this insult, I swear, in the name of those who had enabled me, I shall bring you forth to ice.’

Less than a dozen times, the changes failed, as the room had been shaken too much for their own good. More so, they were often incompatible with one another, over the fact that they would see each other on their various ways out. It hadn’t been the intended process, judged by notes saved from the inception, but alas, one could not fathom what else went through them, as if giving them a pass would go ahead.

A pair of bottle mouths spread from inside his shattered mouth-breathing verticals they had abandoned as soon as they could clasp for any kind of lever to hold on. The mercenaries had been affected by the hazardous material which had atrophied their brains so thoroughly that they had been dumped down to mere mules for milk factors to be extracted from. In their strange, yet ever-growing, still humane-look, they managed to expand their lost vestigial tails as a retort, of slight shift of their combining arms and legs, which had been their only action taken now. Somehow they would flap around and give pause to the most congruous feelers which had come onto them as an effect of the petioles which entered their bodies.

‘Observe.’

Heidmark, the head scientist was the only one who could fathom the change, for as few as a few minutes in which they took from them to change. This would result in a lot of factors being given to them, for the harvest would soon be enacted upon them. A second pair of janitors was present there, amongst the soldiers and the extra amount of staff that looked for a way to insert them in case it would become violent.

‘I can see now, you don’t trust me.’

‘It’s nothing personal, but you don’t inspire me even the least of honesty. You’ve done some horrendous things which left a lot of blood on your hands. I’m afraid that from this point on there won’t be anyway for any one of to possibly trust you. Not after what you’ve done to him.’

An electrical razor opened the mercenary, this Stet, was rolled over, enough that he bumped against one of the walls, pushing through a few inches through it. The mere force of merely being turned around had been greeted. It had been vaguely distant now, the sound it his prolapsed ear drums, which had such an inward growth that they almost gave an appearance of it having a pair of giant eyes instead. Nimble sounds were being produced by it. Which was a bad sign in itself?

‘He had retained a vocal cord, I think he’s still retained a part of its intelligence.’

‘Carry on with the procedure, we have wasted one specimen already, we cannot spare another one again.’

This was no mutation per say, but a mere form of interdimensional change. They connected one of the specimens with a few satellite-anchors, through which they could communicate the creature's body inside the man. While the change happened, a piece of it would be brought into their world, with not it, but a piece of the land underneath it. For that everyone had been required to bear a suit of their own. It would not be excusable if they got contaminated even further.

It was a classified secret which had to be kept under a supreme guard for as long as they could do it. If word got out.

'If word actually got even close to getting out, we would be terminated, instantly, without questions asked. As in we would no longer be here.'

'Another dud, sir.'

They opened him, only to see that a few parasitical cliche's inhabited what should've been a few stores of fat for them to draw from. But they had been beaten to them again.

'Drag them to the furnace and start again. We shall find a means to beat them yet.'

Twenty eight hours wasn't enough for the moving of the satellites. Firstly, they would have to find one of the livid things separated from the pack. It was the key of getting them in. Whilst in the pack, they would gather around one another, drawing as much comfort from their own kind as they could. Inside their own spacious bodies, there appeared to be storages, not only of fat, which was the second danger, not the parasites but the being called as Nylorak.

Not a being, but a pair, two of them had been trapped in another chambers a thousand miles away, which had to be locked, restrained and left to sink into the ground. This apparition of a ghastly man, the ghoulish thing named Nylorak appeared in one of the big mules one day.

It had shocked not only the scientists but everyone else, because they would not ever dare pay a second look to it. The danger in itself was the fact that he knew them. He looked so familiar to everyone, like some acquaintance which found itself lost in another dimension.

'It could be one of the first men who had tried establishing contact within that side.'

'How did he survive then? And why do we keep finding him here?'

They looked at the result of the second appliance of the hazardous liquid. As he stepped in, as casually strolling like a thin creature, he exhausted the fat pockets and needed more. Anything would do, and for that reason the brought the soldier who pinned him down. In the midst of irradiated bullets and spikes of energy imbued with portions of fire, he had fallen to the ground, jerking, taller this time.

‘Measure him again, I need to check something, quickly now.’

Heidmark took too many cuts from over to the top now. He could never get it right, but he noted the fact that every time it came here, he grew taller, wider, fatter than, even as thin as he was, he seemed bulkier than usual. Dragged and burned, like the usual manner in which he would be used again. On his neck there was the mark, about twenty inches after that.

‘Now I understand, it’s trying to become one of them.’

‘Don’t you mean, him, sir?’

‘I don’t mean that. There’s something else here. I may not have been entirely honest with the rest of the scientists. But the liquid we’re pouring into him isn’t the cause. That’s a mere painkiller to ease the change.’

‘If it’s not the liquid, sir, then how is it happening?’

‘It’s the room itself. The radiations are enough to weaken the barriers between us. And the weakest of beings, the ones they’re most similar to get exchanged. That’s why it’s always the mercenary who cannot even fathom living on his own because all the painkillers and meds we shoved in him.’

‘But doesn’t that affect everyone else in that room?’

‘Of course not, now what would you take me as? I’m not a butcher, nor a murderer, not scum, I’m the head scientist of this order. I would never dare lie to anyone.’

It didn’t matter now. He had done enough damage. Too many things didn’t add up now. Well, the Nytorak was simply a man, one of them, who went to the reverse of the change, and had entered their world instead. Time after time, he would find himself there, abandoned, in whatever form they could push him in. And he would be confused and abandoned, feeling wretched and unable to push through the amount of unsanitary touches the others mules gave him.

Most of the would be seen as part of their packs, even cuddled by the prolonged exposure.

It’s the soda-bottles we gave them. Those left the marks on their mouths; those are responsible for those features and their likes. As one of the easier ways of carrying the drug dosage had been easily ingested. The second part of the transmissions came. Often time, when the barrier jerked like that, the nights turned once out, a second in.

And from the top of their gigantic heads, wide openings formed, from which the peril of a small cotton-like green petulance spread, with a few of their mildly wretched plants being forced inside.

‘Contain it, I said. Let me be clear, we cannot even remotely hope for it to make a mess there. If we cannot even keep the area clean, the experiment will fail. Do we have an understanding?’

‘We have, but there’s something in there.’

Another problem, after another, from it came a dwarfed moving pastel, almost made out of dust, but it had hardened and softened itself far beyond any kind of reach. It was unappealing at least, to the point of touching it would turn a suit into a deep grey, a lay which pushed through his head.

A staff member already lost his head upon the interaction between them. Neither he nor they had actually cared for the exchange of looks as they all fled the scene.

‘Destroy it and let’s proceed again.’

Through the intercom came the voice, he would be spoken to as if he mattered at all. They had no interest in him. At best he would be seen as some kind of filth of malnutrition, a nasty experimental madman who put the livelihood of his success above the others.

‘I will do as I please now, we shall bring the fires onto it, and otherwise, we risk a chance of it spreading.’

‘Very well, I had no plans of preserving any of that. Not the staff member either, he may.’

He disappeared, Ryan Obolov, he simply vanished with a piece of the scum-shrubbery which grew in its head. It was a displeasing factor which made him almost want to breathe through another pair of lungs. He had been pained by the lost, as long as they were there anyway.

‘You’re a terrible person, you know that?’

‘In science, things like that are irrelevant.’

Though his eyes betrayed a sick demeanor, this sociopathic creature had enjoyed sacrificing humans. And he knew, as the others noted that Heidmark knew he was evil. He enjoyed showing a few teeth out of him, so they could feel warned. They could be there, if he wanted to.

He made sure to make them feel like it, to suffer no less of a compulsion to them. This dreadful being, the shattering of something close of them having a chance to retire safely and most importantly, to live through this.

‘I’ll make my leave then.’

‘You shall now, I’ll make sure to fill your lungs with them and keep you in the worst possible state. Seriously, you think those mercenaries have it the worst?’

No, you will.'

He hadn't been stopped, he took her and brought her to one of the antechambers, the place in which nothing could be spared and where she would meet her end. There, she was prepared, simply being bather, her clothes being lowered inside the fluid, where he had placed a strange request.

'I have always wanted to test this. Let her be pleased by the fact that I have decided it's time for us to set on a journey from which we may not be able to return.'

By that, he hadn't, of course, he hadn't planned on actually joining the room, had he? Even the soldiers were somewhat surprised, at his own orders, of the magnitude of guts this man produced. He hadn't even been lowered yet, and he already proved himself to be mad.

'Insert the liquids only in her respiratory system, two insertions, no bottles, no painkillers, something to slow them down, but not entirely, we wouldn't want her to suffocate after all.'

It wasn't her. She hadn't even a clue about what she might've told them then. But within her glance, she couldn't even take a stance against him. This man was too dangerous for her to take alone. And her shouts weren't heard past the sealed gates, behind those foolish grates.

The present set of chargers were high enough about the room they were about to be set in that they might as well collapse the entire facility upon itself. Fussing about every corner, they had been set to go in a few hours in case something turned out wrong and they might end up regretting it.

'Is she all set to come?'

'Gags are set in place, she won't struggle. We can witness her change in a few moments, right as you give the order.'

'Set her in, I want to watch this closer.'

'You're not wearing your protection suit.'

'I'm not intending to.'

It was past this point that they stopped caring altogether. They accepted the fact that there wasn't any protection there, unlike all the times they had been reassured, and this one had gone off past the point where they wondered whether or not it was possible to go back. It was tainted, by the way in which they started paying attention to themselves. Even through the visors, it was much easier to see that their bodies had been altered. Going by one another's backs, they hummed.

He wasn't too disturbed by it. If they wanted to go ahead and mess with themselves, so be it. Hall only want to see them grow, spanning through her, like two emerging twins which forced her body to release a good portion of her as she would be stricken out there. And he couldn't help himself either, looking how he was started to be filled, emerging from the other side, not closer to them, but in the pile where all the corpses went.

'Of course, there was another place after all. How could I have been so blind? I can't even shake off this feeling crossing me.'

But with each redundancy which went past him, he started looking at the green cotton pestilence which made its way towards him.

'I am of those who had disappeared.'

A grin emerged inside of him, not over the mouth but lower. Something had been seriously strangled below, if it felt so much pain that he would go on a rampage and strike the walls as much as thoroughly as it had.

'Too bad I shall not get to see you yet. But I have a feeling that I will not die before it's done with me.'

She was there with him, even though she hadn't survived the travel unlike him, the change had made sure that they were all connected, regardless if they were alive and well. Or the dead, who seemed to be spared the look of him being used, it could be over soon now, in a few spares. He felt them sagging as they would cross against the ceiling. It was agonizingly painful, to be forced to look upon those flamboyant things which wretched themselves above in a pitiful doubt.

'So that's where all the mass had gone. Imagine how many factors one could extract from there, I could only be delighted to find out that everything I've done ended up amounting to something.'

But it was uncertain whether or not they'd care. For everyone was lost in that base. They were the chauffeurs who drove it all into the ground, the soldiers who found out they couldn't run away, had been immediately been shot down at the announcement of their.

'Desertion, pin them down.'

Yet with every body which fell, from their many holes, it couldn't even be told in any separate form whether or not those were men or those thin creatures thrown to furnace.

'The fire expired.'

Another problem only made it so much worse. It was by their deletion of words that it couldn't even be thought off, the way in which they dealt with a way through which they might kill anything. After the threat had been disabled, they had established something.

‘Start all of them. I repeat, start all the rooms, let this entire complex be completely irradiates. Since there’s no way out, I’d rather see what this fuss is about. What do we have to lose if we make it to the other side?’

‘Our lives for starters, the risk that we may bring them to this world.’

‘So be it then, I would rather not have died for nothing.’

But it hadn’t gone as expected. They were directed over their heads to the fact that the explosives were gone and they had never even bothered to open their helmets at all.

‘Should we, would we dare?’

‘I have to admit that I would never have expected something like this to happen. If it’s possible, I may.’

Open the hatch, only to come to the realization that they had never been human at all. Their stations were made only for the sole purpose of bringing humans there, nothing more.

‘But this can’t be, I was a man before, I have my memories, it can’t happen this way, I, I.’

They had chosen silence instead. Over the fact that they had created the gravest of mistakes, for what they’ve done resulted in a fate utmost madly benign.

‘Screens, now, look at them. You need to look at the screens.’

‘ what have we been thrown at now?’

The various cameras could only record the giant body which had worn them.

‘We’re inside of him, I believe we’re residing in his guts, merely inviting in a way of sustenance so he may live untouched.’

A giant thing, long whiffs of arms stood by his side and mechanical structures lay inside of his chest and in his heart and most of it had been numbed.

‘What are we? I can barely even fathom being anything else but a scientist, or a man.’

No one could answer, nor could they look past this sudden realization. They were human, they had started the process of irradiation. And they were there by no chance. Inside an unscrupulous amount of immaterial uncertainty, they had started fading away.

Being useful no longer activated a protocol which shoved sharp metal poles through their heads, immediately crushing them from inside out. But they would be weak them and start to grow. As the mules would be summon in rows, this giant could finally eat as his entire body was filled against, from the top to his one tail on which he pushed on again.

He would later refill his insides with the last pesticides needed to kill the parasites in store, but he would not join the others anymore.

There was that one moment which defied the likes, of a universe which refused to die. Too many things lay against it. And without the touch of hope, not amount of ever-fighting could save it from the likes. As seas would start flooding the very margins of the floating dark, drawing near to the stars, turning them in their own effigies of symbols as that of a fallen system from which nothing could be done.

One Suppressor, number sixty-one, appeared to have gone through the same procedure, only to realize that there wasn't any stopping there.

'I cannot remove this plethora of the malign. I cannot even hope that I might make it go awry from within. There can be no stop to it.'

He spoke, seeing how they would all drown from the emergences of something they wouldn't touch. It was a must they haven't even a lack of interest any longer to preserve. And as it happened, this being of unity, started fading from existence, largely defeated by a depression which hit unlike any other. They've done this to me.

'I cannot be freed by any other means. They'll always com here to mock us yet.'

on time they appeared again. Their crude cackle only peered inside of him with a most turbulent essence.

'We've outdone you, haven't we?

You are defeated from the likes that might never come to see again. We'll trash you yet.'

'Don't lash at me, you infantile breeds, or I shall find a way to..to..'

His voice had gone and slowly, the wings that once appeared to beat strongly and valiantly stopped. One eye gave in and would be closed. It was his soul which vanished there, unable to holster it, crushed beneath the hopeless rim, the defeat had now sunk.

'We have won a universe for ourselves. What shall we do with it?'

They wondered as the Agamemnonpi started swimming in their own pox-filled sea, the complete accusatory glance haunting each and every single one of the as they would wonder less, not to confess that they showed signs of drawing back. It hadn't been as quaint, looking at a planet which would be brought to a small pulp of what it used to be. For theirs alone was a curse, indescribable from what it be.

With all the time left in that world, until everything would be filled with the flood, they could finally enjoy themselves, wondering at that.

‘Who came with this magnificent idea to start with, for it wasn’t I.’

‘Nor I.’

‘It was not me.’

‘Neither, could it be that.’

All mightily aware of the groups of voice which sank in despair, spread across eons of their choosing, skulking for a link obtuse, had brought them to an end. It was a likely set profanity which made their bodies float there. From their puddles emerged their ever-freezing guttural segments held together by the ice.

‘I feel like I could stay here forever until I will be met by the death of every star.’

‘But we will be frozen here, eventually trapped. Is that what we want now?’

‘That can never be decided, any longer. We can never reach a general consensus. Perhaps it’s better for us to wait here until our thoughts fade, until we will be found again. The others should deal with the Suppressors in their own way, but I shall convey no other turn any longer.’

And their panic could only serve to make them much weaker and less interested into heir own clarity.

‘At my mark, I shall go ahead and bring you back to life.’

The voice of a man called in the most obscure manner. He couldn’t even bother to father his own children, yet for loss of better days, he walked on peg-legs strapped to his neck, near one of the many apartments from the complex came, the need to go back again, to the pastures which lay outside the window. Despite the fact that he had been at the eighty fifth floors, he found himself discouraged, let alone encourage returning there.

‘But who are you strange, and why are you in my room?’

‘I have access to every room in the bloc, don’t you realize that? I can go and I can do whatever I please.’

Malt had the same. He almost got plainly set in the same clothes. A bit sad, he looked, too sad to be counted off. Always staring in an odd direction, still unable to figure out when too much was too much.

‘Can I. Would you mind it if I joined you? I haven’t seen you before here, and now all of the sudden you present yourself in a room without a number on its door and that thing outside.’

‘It will only wait for me, you know? It doesn’t like strangers.’

‘Even if that stranger might have something to share with it?’

‘Stranger, please, I don’t know who you are, and there’s something about you which startles me. It’s not the sad expression, you make me fear you. An awful person, that’s what you are. And I want to get away from you.’

‘May I not even be allowed to look at the window as you leave? How about accompanying you on your way out?’

‘I don’t know if I can trust you yet. And even if I had, I already told you.’

‘All right, I get it, I get it.’

His frown couldn’t even be that subtle. He paid no attention to the man’s needed, even to the point of being too intrusive on him.

There was the land of storms by the name of Illflirnh, somewhere on the vestige of the sea, back in the port, lost to the cord, where the ships had sailed and left their anchors at the cage, from within the range of whom, the lightning stroke a hue of gloom. Eighty bands of metal formed its grates, and from each of its flat surfaces there were a few inverted blades which pointed at the ones inside. This was the punishment of the tide, where the waves and the coming of the great storm would arise, they would be thrown and impaled, lost again to something worse than their complete defiance. Beneath the rim of the waves, under those blocks of diamond-squared sea-cradles, there lay hundreds of similar traps which had all been dragged down and left behind.

For this sea was thirsty for their kind and it would swallow anyone who would be left behind, as within reason they had been abandoned there, unable to distinguish the mild stasis and hypnosis of the gurgling struggle. Some of the first deaths had come from drowning, others from the current, or the strikes of power coming from the sky. As the color of the sea remained untainted, a yellow, red, diseased together, changed each time a lighting strike followed its last attainable reach towards the nearest dock. Another one lay destroyed out of the fiendish flying ship which distracted them from talk. Looker but no plumbers, would be driven to look away, unable to decide what would have to happen if one drew in too far away.

By the time their pure agony and distaste for livid faded, they had been met by the other ship, inside of which hid the writhing specter that did come. From his surroundings, he could only come bedraggled by the fact that he could no fathom being alive there. He had encompassed the entire outside layer of wood and grew like barnacles and sea prudes, unmerged now from what kept him behind. Greeted by them, he had revealed the only thing that they had an interest in. The key of the sea, lain in the mouth of a horned leviathan which wriggled between his fingers. This apparition dwindled as it could only writhe in greed, for he revealed that inside his ship there was the trove in which he hid the entire out cove of jewels and of gold. His eyes were putrefied with the likes of it, the more he had the more would he be pleased. And his sudden interest in them came over one golden ring which had escaped him.

One of the trapped souls, who had been as shallow, a heart of evil which would cower, that he recognized in himself. Not only would he be drawn to it, but he would not give in until he could take what was his. By his own word and dance, he would draw to it as far as he might. It would be his regardless of what had to be fair, of what waited of him and the hindrance of the dark lair, to which he pushed the ship a few feet away and let it be. As they watched thoroughly, wonderingly at what he did next, he pushed one finger on his lips and shushed before entering the sea like a great orangutan of salty water, revealing his lower body strength which broke through it as if it had mattered less what it had been.

To him, a scene like that would be cordial in the greater rims of the unearthly troves which dwelled in the deepest fathoms where nothing would be earned. He could steal but his nail-like sacking plunders would be met by devouring yonder from the father fathoms, he could reach for. In that bloody sea he only drank more, until he would be met by the mosquito-fish again. They reeked of putrescence and were in need for a new entertaining way of drinking. As soon as they tried, they had been denied by an utmost disgusting thing that reeked of the worse hindrance, of the lack of sin.

Which entered their veins and started blowing their small pockets until they couldn't help it but allow him entry. For their kingdom was inhabited by the queen-growth, a piece of which had completely overcome the leviathan and had made a husk for itself to stand in and wait. He felt so tiny compared to her, especially since most of those cages had been given to her as a gift of the malign. Though she hadn't been alone. It wasn't likely that it was her, though another fiend had materialized from the distant unquiet. And a great piece of her head had been taken away, looking partially melted as if by a giant flame, of which a guttural noise had only come close to destroy everything which grew, leaving him there, connected, with a jerking fat body. Attached to him, there lay a few breathing devices which had grown so wide and long that they looked like windpipes, giant being a mere thing compared to the sheer size.

And this bulbous shrimp-like blotter, guttural in the way it fluttered eight small tails which trailed in its back, opened a few eyes which closed each they were met by him. He started most electrifyingly, touching a bladed cage from time to time to reveal that he was there for it alone. And from the body of that mosquito fish, the quagmire inside its belly straddles over a city which had been submerged, a piece of the dock having destroyed a great piece of it during the fall, when no one was counting on it, to survive the thralldom it had come to prove. For this being saved and stored each of the people inside, allowing them to reside inside of her for as long as it would take them to work. And castles and other-men would be made. Out of its producing sap, inside its bubbling mass, which had been the queen's sack, strapped from inside her spreading abdomen, only a few had been given the chance to witness the production of the drones. Half-fish, mosquito-like and the comer's physical appearances had inflicted themselves upon the people.

Their long bodies started producing large inflammations of fins in the back which sprouted full bodies from within them. Not only had it been a matter of never-ending self-change, in which every time they would abandon a skin before them, their physical appearance and minds would alter. Higher heads, held higher by the fact that most kept their human bodies intact only until the point of the belly. From beneath them they receded into bigger blotches, which had grown the rest of those appendages, pushing onward as if to seethe. Pain had been felt as soon as they would begin muttering was again. Despite not being able to walk, from the fact that their lower bodies had become to fat from the constant devouring of their older skins and the sap, they stopped thinking as humans and more like the one above.

Its one saving factor had been its ability to mould its body into a protecting shell, which tried grinding itself again. No more excuses could lie. Too many times already, they had jerked against each other's bodies in various attempts to copulate. Unknown and almost impossible to determine, not a single one of them could tell whether or not they were fertile, or if their strange appendages could work. But in the likes of the fright seen about the tiny master at the head of a broken husk, he peered into the specter's dead eyes with wonder. Some of the giant limbs could be barely moved but not enough force had lain into them to even reach the secret's body through the massive rows of water.

What was much worse had been the fact that it had converged the muscle mass into more sap, being afraid that it could be the next one getting through, the mad hue of wonder taking a piece of it as soon as it would be found.

Maddeningly away, out there, from the depths, the chains began pulling the cages below. All of them would be wrought, except for one. Nearest to the ship, ignoring the sounds of the weeping and the whistling cries which might be heard, they stopped before they would be thrown by the pressure against the margins and the edges. They could feel the reflection of a far more malignant and dark trickster being residing in the reflections.

He would show himself as the most disrobing of the fiends, flask, mystically endowed with eighteen eyes and a few mouths that floated and circles around him. His arms were placed inside the legs, both of them overlapping and appearing for as long as he could gaze. From beneath him a cloud would spread about and from inside of it their chopped heads would laugh at them. No one dare mutter what went through all of their minds. But no one would dare either to take as much as a glimmer of a slip. If they did, they knew what would happen. Blood could not mix with water.

For their blood was gray and appeared to give birth to the repulsive Flight-lords, who resided above them, always growing their huge bodies behind them, near and near extensions which would provide enough meat to eat them and grow back with.

From within two magnificent doming shields which appeared to be the things forcing them to flight, they were constantly progressing into their long, stronger, slides into the atmosphere plunge. And each time they've done so, they would bring another storm, greater than the other, as they would keep slicing and protruding and their bobbling raving bodies would keep pumping through the top of clouds. From their hive-like sutures, they would punch while rummaging so sparkles of static would fall over them. In return they would also draw some of the water, eliminating some kind of encumbering field of invisible strings which cut through mere skin. It was safer for them to live in the cages than to be out there.

As those beings weren't human, nor would they like to be in content with them. Even if they were peaceful, they would be eaten again and regurgitated in the most postulated of forms.

The specter waited for it to realize, blowing a haze of water-fumes, which only presented his lack of interest that gathered about his stress less inquire. No more than a few strikes could have him there. He was filled with a sense of despair by the fact that this lump, this pinkish clasp, crested with the likes of lesser crude eye-formation in the back refused to give him what he wanted. His desperation to have his trove filled remained. And he saw the fact that inside his own stomach there was one golden chain, which had ruffled his most atrocious desires. It could not be helped by any means. His degenerating veil couldn't be helped for as much as he had wasted enough time there.

One bolder man from the top of the cage, who had it in his power to move through the stripes leaped about, abandoning the others. He could make it to the ship and sail away. It was worth the going, with the hopes that he wouldn't be seen by them as they constantly scouted for survivors. Long-heads had been largely obscure by the pinned pricks inside of their armless beds. They nested them amongst the clouds and stood in them during the most peculiar of times, their rest could not be complete until everyone had killed at least someone from the lower lands.

It was by the end of another era that they assimilated and mixed with the other head-hunting terrors of lightless decrepit cuts, from which most of their kind had been given life.

Closer to the largest pieces of lands, which was where most of the living had been forced into hiding, the houses had been clustered together for obvious reasons. They had made accolades, which straddles within one another's reaches for the kind of misery they would have to endure.

Before he even reached the side, he witnessed a flaw in it, which deeply disturbed him. This was no ship, but a giant chest he had carried, strapped on a high ledge which kept it from sinking in the abyss. He had only carried it so far, merely playing with them, giving them a false hope, making it seem like they could stand a chance to get away. But in his mind he only found himself resting, unable to even fathom the fact that there were others who had followed him, which had been met by the same image of loss. And they did lose a piece of themselves there, as they all refusals to return, their assumed reasonability towards one another forced them to go on and climb. Each step lead them to the very point, of every edge, the wrathful point where they would be seen by the flying torments who had it in for them.

And as soon as the scouts simply lowered themselves a few inches down the line, they threw the living bolts, like sinking harpoons, clawed, marching through their homes as the grip drop was to be attained. What they had scourged in their frail malignity was some desperate attempt at each other's throats. They shot at each other, with their impossible rays, tormenting their bodies as they began melting into space. Being so close to the outside forces strapped on the mighty essence which bred inside of them an insignificant malignity which threw forth the growing heads. It was there, finally, that their battle ended, as two great flying-lords observed what they had done. As soon as one of their winged cutter threw and beheaded a few of the men who had attempted to their needs.

They started appearing out of nowhere, not as skulled terrors but as mere masks on some swarms which looked like grass-strands flowing through the midst of bushes, pushing through the nostrils and the sockets as the charmed inside. And they would chase one another and push towards the flying-lords as their attempts to thwart one another could only get as far as they could be allowed to. From their giant inflated bodies they started pushing out their breathing disorders, magnificent gases which spread in lungs. Sooner one could be afflicted and find himself completely submerged. It couldn't be helped either. Wretchedness spoke for itself as they started throwing themselves at one another in their flights and for the lack of sparring.

It was unneeded, the fact that they could not be dragged beyond the margins and the edges, they leaped towards the edges of the cage and started slowly making through before they could even get to it. Despite the various cajoling methods they found themselves throwing at each other, without their outer vestiges, only to return to the taking and the slobbery of the humans inside. They had been eaten, disallowed to continue and forced to feel the fathomless approach of the growing sides of the other dimensions forced inside that of their own.

A cause couldn't be called. The specter suddenly came only, only to be met by the supreme act of theft. The flying lords, the growing heads, the faces, and the offspring of the sea-mosquitoes, the voiceless wonders and the other paranoid creations had all joined one another with the sole interest of getting what was his. He would be defied no longer, forced to spare the likes of revolting needles which flew, the bitter hurls of gold taken from his trove.

Left undefended, he could not even dare challenge to many of them, as they had been forced their undisputed alacrity upon him. Mockeries had been shown, treachery is known, but he descended and he ascended past the point of no return. Within his grasp, his own mutterings would stop, as he came to admit that this fate wasn't his. He had desired to have nothing more into this world, as of his own worth, his spoil was gone. Between his eyes, there pushed both palm of his hands, one which shot straight and the other one which cut right through it and directly into his head. Afterwards, his lack of clusters had lead to the supreme disaster after which he had been caught in the thin arms of that deprave sea-drinker below the farthest edges of what he sought. And in the embrace, they both drew in and lost themselves with all of the remaining cages, drinking in the disillusion that the storms would come again.

So much blood had been spilled and mixed at the rims of the cradles that they began forming again. In the birth, during the invasion, the seclusion resulted in the rise of the last demise, the bitter cries they would give, could not even remotely take in. As the bed of the sea opened at last, from around the basin came the dreadful servant of the necromancer, bulking in his arms, the serpents of the sea, the lord of leviathans, the bodies of the sea nocromon, the fiendish looker with starkly swollen heads which twisted around the moon constantly and revealed only a two-dimensional eye. And they sand together as he rose up, like a mighty box of strapping bones which showed nothing else but the sake of woe.

It cried as he saw, the clouds torn apart, made yellow and green with small empty shining lights of black, which could only have been some flying egg sacks from which other terrors might emerge. Undeniably called into question was the wretched desire, to wear the attire of fools and of the petty, for which he himself has worn. To which he wondered.

‘But where is the Necromancer and why must I worn?’

He had been weak, but couldn’t pay enough tribute to return where he had been. The things he had seen were unknown to him as anything but a few inflictions of some passing insects that found themselves looking near the patches of the land. Slowly, they were eating pieces of him despite not being supposed to, spreading some filthy and undesirable uncanny essences of scum which began inserting themselves inside the ground. As a few of the dirt strolls began twisting and yearning for any kind of approach or touch, that’s when they began the search for the Necromancer.

Once the freeloaders and thieves had taken away, the remaining band of unsanitary-looking creatures had come to look onward to the peculiar servant of the necromancer, longing to a sight of his master and a wonder, whether or not he’d be able to conjure up any kind of power to start reviving their kin in masses. And it could not have come any sooner that they would be met again, by images of fiends caught in their dens. They appeared in the air, almost in the same manner as the growing heads. And from the insight which had been held, one could only focus of the one giant den which fell in the water.

From it, only the most inconspicuous of tyrants could be.

It was undecided, whether it had been him, the creature who had claim to have come into contact with some obscure mechanical heathen who had shown him the secrets of living through the machines. And within his gear, in the den, they had recognized the right appliance which would allow him to breathe through water and not only so, but to slay as restlessly as he could. For if it turned out for him to be immortal after all, he couldn’t be anything but a disease, a way of slaying, of murder and of self satisfaction. No longer would they earn for the end, and they would calmly wait for themselves to be brought again.

‘A much better journey awaits us brothers, do not pay any attention to him. We’ll do each other well.’

To be ignored again, as the image of their sudden catatonic state faded, as soon as the disciple pointed a bony hand towards the general direction and said.

‘Follow the insects so you might find him. I cannot say what might lay for your future if it turns out that he wishes neither of you to disturb his presence. But know that I have only the utmost solemn wishes that you may live through it somehow.

Do not mind me now and go, I shall rest here until you return.’

From which he pointed at the dark with his restless fingers drawing back. He would eventually be worn down by all of them, who gave not a single pause, nor a cause for him to stay. In his bed of wonder he would lay and return only when it was necessary for him to gaze again.

As they descended, the face which had been silence, but had been known, the few flying-lords, the one fully grown head and a few mosquitoes which followed the scent of dread, they would come uncouth and follow through, unheeded.

Their dreadful search had carried on, with little chance at all for either of them to return to their deceptions. I could see them from my binoculars, being one of the few survivors who documented not only the flight but the quickest way to reaching them. In time, he would look at their spread of land and how much destruction lay ahead of them despite his demeanor, he could only look forth. It was evident by their own actions that they ought to amass the piety needed for them to be brought back.

As soon as the land had been barely scoured, they started peering through the green deposits and the mildly connected ruined castles and villages which had fallen prey. The clouds obviously obscured most of the dreadful appearance in which they started sinking in the ground. From the farthest reaches, once aware of the amount of pucker they were bringing down, I couldn't even rest assured that they were on their way any longer, and I couldn't bother to be present there.

That hardened blood, which hardened only at the touch of the atmospheric pressure, seemed to seep into the nearest choking points it could. Like grim tooth it came from the skin, spinning wind tunnels around it while drawing in as many of the lost people as it could. They were strangled and exposed to a kind of air which had been rather unforgiving. Despite their attempts to escape and to fall, even towards their own plunge of death into the sea, they had not even been given that. Instead it was obvious that they had been forced to manifest in the sky, inside their bodies, the entities which inhabited the distant plains appeared in their placed.

Like homing carcasses, enormously placed in rock formations, trapped and shoved to the wickedest of sides, from the shell of which came one single entry, from which they threw their spite into the world. It may not have been as easily seen, like a clod of an end of a fallen oak, but it could be felt. As these almost spiked to their fully encroaching hatred, whatever creature may have had any kind of human appearance changed to the most destitute, the vile, the red skin which appeared as nothing else but a trifle dark and spiked by the spite. Enraged by the unexplainable, hair grew on their mantles and on the objects around their homes, ending their pets and forcing them to open up.

For the smaller animals bore the single most important thing, their bodies could bear their metallic essence and bear anything they might've thrown at them. From their spines and little canine things, a diabolical looking mutated formation came. Rhombus only in part, for the back of it had still been infested by that wolfish heart which still tried biting and scratching and fighting for its desperate bark. From the back there also came a few coils which extended from its mouth, breaking through the jaw like overwrought serpentine tails of iron, searching desperately for water. But none was to be found and they defaulted to using their owners instead.

That relation bred out of desperation had given him only a momentary kind of satisfaction which was fading. They could only drink so much from them until the desire wrought only the most damnable thing which came. A deathless gaze which put the beast into command, but it wasn't that hound. It was that rage-induced commoner who fell prey to his own curl, standing now to be used until he would die of the exposure to his own turn.

Arkil, one of the other commoners who stumbled upon his friend's home could not help himself, even though he had been as afflicted as him. He brought a few bottles and broke through the window, bearing only his lighter now as he approached. The fire spread through the hair, but the hound had been unaffected. As a matter of fact, neither of them was touched by the fire as the layers present in their skin prevented it from spreading through them. Inside their arms now came to be a, tinier bascules which popped and took of them off.

Its long tongue started spreading, unattended, and with such a sucking motion that neither of them could stand against it. As the house started burning off, despite the weather and the storm, the rain and the winds adjourned, it kept spreading and crushing the last things which kept the house standing. Before another word, the house collapsed underneath them, leaving naught to be found. Only they knew what was down below the attic, where all the gravel and the roof now rested under the very last shout of the hound.

But alas, this had only been one of the first signs of destruction brought up the world. As the wind changed, to reflect the fact that the leaves had shown only the last yellow signs which faded? It was impossible to look away any longer, from the strongest and the least desirable creatures which came through the lairs of smoke and dust, hiding away as they were called to spy.

'Where is the mighty necromancer? We were given a chance that we would get to see him. And where would he be now? Where is he hiding?'

It was only an indecent question which couldn't have been improperly placed. No one even dared question themselves why was it that they tried so hard to push themselves past the line where no one died.

The mark of death had been placed on the ground, placed inside of it was the utmost dreadful of creatures which reigned, a long contender, made out of billions of bodies strapped upon one another, holding together by the various blades inserted in their own backs. This creature appeared to have wrapped itself against the entirety of the world, making sure that no one who might pass would be allowed to die. He appeared to be constantly writing. Every corpse which had been apart of him appeared to have another one on top of it. And the other was the one who had been conjoined, forced to constantly write on and write off the names of those who passed off.

To admit the feeling of wretch would be the only way they could get out. But neither of them could decide whether or not going past them was worth the abiding of filth. To the girth of the least forgotten woes, they would go ahead and start again, never giving in, never daring to forget that once they were past that line, they would not be allowed to look back.

‘We shall bring the necromancer back, in whichever form he shall be. Do not abandon him I saw, we need to reunite him with the disciple.’

Yet neither of them could realize why that was, what the reason for their desperate attempt to help him lay. As much as they’d spare the constant share, the least definable despair, one could not even dare breed through himself, the fact that he had tricked them all. He had planted his tiny bone-chronic mind-control infections as soon as they had entered his proximity. Ever since that malignant thing, they had been cursed.

As soon as they stepped over the mark, they looked behind, unable to control themselves. It was decided that they would still remain there, even as ghostly things as soon as they despaired. Around them, the realm was foul and every kind of creature lie, in this living grave, or place where death had not a single hen of touching.

They were giants there, floating, with their tiny parasitical looking bodies and giant heads which looked like sacks placed together, many eyed, many long legs which were too thin to hold the entirety of the weight being mostly superficially placed there only to hold the lower beings underneath it. And from around them there were armies of the most ferocious-lee connected mutts, whose bore their epicanthic bodies filled with as much muck. In their backs there lay as much fat obtained from the consumption obtained from their cannibalistic ways that no one would be spared the look.

From their backs erupted large bulbs, almost looking like dandelions, that emitted the signals needed to divert the flying lichens which grew in the realms of dead. They would spread through the entirety of the sky immediately, only to dissipate as soon as they might. No one would be allowed a touch of it, unless they wanted to be completely covered by it and dragged down.

In it lay the sanctity of all of their liver-eyes, which had been placed inside a truncheon coffin, all of them, spared not a single expense for that floating device, marked with the sign of a grave, turned and obscured by the lichens as they brought the dead back to life. And there were also the citizens and the various tribes, the primitives and those who had died during their birth, though all of them had been forced to lay together, in a circle which had been surrounded by the others.

As the most vicious contender would do, this large accosted fiend, who had formed an anarchomatic body of many tapeworm-bands which surrounded its body, only to serve as a distraction from the fact that its legs had started spreading in a wing which wouldn’t work for any kind of flying, but who’d spare not a single desire, to push ahead. It would draw and reveal eight marks of the chest, which had been opened for him to expel everything it had devoured, taken unsightly.

This mighty thing, to which, the head seemed to be constantly bowed, had given in to the oratory of sounds. From his tiny appearance, he looked mostly like a fly, trying its definite to push on ahead and leave the likes of sounding rifles. Strung by the nails, pushed in inwardly again, it had felt only the least of the disturbing delight haunt it for as much as it could draw from the others. The inadequate, orgiastic creature appeared to be bearing the first signs of sound-devices, gauntly submerged it its fat-lumped head.

It brought only the paranoia with it and the voices of obscure propaganda which promoted death against all living in a world of little feeling. As death would not even be likely to be set in place, no member of any race could be called into question now. Some knelt, mostly the humans and the primates which joined them. In less that a definitive thin, they were not humanoid any longer.

Only their strange defilements which lunged while standing still, by the mere fact that their arms and legs extended. Heads lay unprotected. It was lack of deposits which brought their carapaces to a trifle of growing. Various others started pushing on until their bodies resembled some prolonged matches which drew forward until their heads started pushing the blood out through the soles of their hair.

In a sudden realization that these things would circle themselves together, molding themselves into the birth of a greater find, the wrecks of defiance turned. With their unfolded bodies of long-livid tails of panted squared bodies, with their almost bean-like stalks which made their long heads, they opened mouths that shouldn't have been able to extend.

From inside of them, they opened some bifurcated eggs which gave birth to the kind which should've been born with unfathomable defects. These flying orators, whose lumps had caught off within themselves the traps of air which pushed them away now, gave in to slaughter. They would eat one another, be impaled by their own marks and their spindly torns. Sooner than it had come, they began growing together like plants, spreading their roots in the air, and growing up to the point where they had planted themselves in the lichens ahead.

And still no sight of the famed necromancers they were looking for.

The bee who reigns alas, a proper ruler, of no mass. He stood beyond the verdure, unable to look back at what he's done. A man who had been staring at his pocket, looking out the door, unable to confine his rather dull alacrity and bore, within his grasp, he didn't both anymore to look back and started drawing out. His verdure, to this stranger, as a must, came to him, alas. He went out the door and abandoned a stranger, now only set to look back.

'I will fix my daughter.'

Again he said, realising that he had some sort of malignancy in him again. With those new patrons, the evils which inherited his mind, he vanished yet again, away. Unable to find his wager, this stranger, of no better word, he had been met with a distant strangulation, the damnation which brought him back.

Thence it started, uncouth and stranded in his vision, they showed again. The faces of Agamemnon in all of their manifestations filled him with the dread of ages, as he looked upon them with all of their malign vision, only to be driven forth to the utmost glory of despair.

For he had witnessed everything only to fall under their spell, as he would walk the world under their name, as no free man but another servant for as long as he'd be theirs.

Chapter 6

The lost

On a tree there laid a man, looked upon as he wailed in pain, a pitiful display for those that came after, as they peered upon his macabre dance of flies with laughter. What had befallen on the poor man and why was he alone in his morbid den?

Something seemed to have devoured, most of him, at every hour.

He called on them but pushed them back, filled with dread and eyes as black. His mouth was full, the stench was foul, he couldn't even stretch enough to cower. There was nothing left for him in life, as he had become some putrid delight.

Men felt repulsed by the mere sights of what had become of him. Putrid lout!

'Wretched thing, ain't it?

I don't know how much longer I can stand looking at him without growing sick to my guts, but I know, oh, I know there's nothing human to him.

Even if it bears some resemblance to us, that wretch is anything but man. Bear my words, someone's bound to cut it down sooner or later, it's only a matter of time.'

'Then why don't we do it?

There's no one here after nightfall, especially after the midnight hour, we could burn it down and see it wreathe in agony before it dies.'

Neither of their words were heard as they spoke in whispers, but there was a dark grin on both of their faces, as they had considered this plot against the lack of a better sense. And yet, other men who were much bolder shouted and pointed at the disgusting creature which swarmed in its sickening abode. What followed it though was a short burst of silence, after which came an utmost dreadful display.

No man would dare say a word as it stretched beyond reach and regurgitated a swarm of flies in front of the crowd. For how long had he performed that ritual, he could only wonder in his cryptic set of thoughts. As soon as he opened his maw, he revealed that he still harboured tiny grubs inside his fillings, which were kept alive through some unnatural ways.

He could feel them squirming inside of him for every moment that passed, being unnerving at times. And quite a few people showed up this time. It had been a while since he had seen so many people gather in one place, which pleased him in a most primitive manner. But that disassociation from them allowed him to douse off into his distant memories, as he saw it fit.

'Tom, are you even trying to pay attention?

'I am, but I thought I saw something following me and the noise....'

'Tom, there's nothing behind you, let's get there before the store closes.'

'Come on Tom, don't slow us down, it's getting late.'

'We'll still have a few good hours left if only he could stop looking behind his back every few moments.'

The children were getting ready for their sweet little feast.

'Let's head down to St. John's road, we could get through the ramp or the boat, straight to the store!'

'But I'm afraid of the sea, you know that and I could never get near a boat or some handle.'

So they walked on the tattered streets, while other children joined them from around the fleets, staring at the strange child in the back, who walked on his own, alone on some morbid track. He cut around the blocks and spread around the darkest docks until he lost himself from his peers. That's when he was met by all his fears. Something vile and strange had happened, as he felt the smell of rotten, he was too young and unprepared, that's when he had fled as well.

As the rats scurried away, he didn't look nor had he found his way. Those friends were somewhere else, as he had been aware of it, but at the least he thought he could've tried looking for them. It was hazy and the rude awakening of men had come. Some had looked at him, up and down, merely dismissing the child, who had a flock of insects trailing him around.

Those adjacent to him on the street tended to avoid any contact with the boy. He was sick, disturbing and out of reach. He had the mere constitution of some leech.

He had been licking on a lolly he had found of the ground with a fly on it, the sight of which disgusted even the less sophisticated of his kind. Strangeness came to it once he realised that the creature wasn't harmed by his tongue but in fact enjoyed the motions he produced.

In a sick kind of way, he enjoyed being watched by the others. Despite being rejected, the morbidity he felt always crept at the back of his mind.

'Lollipop flyboy, pop-pop fly, he can't even help himself, he can't even try.'

'Sick, sick youngling,' said a woman on the streets as well, pointing at him while staring, unable to stop bearing resentment for that wretch of a child. It's been a harsh awakening over the fact that none bothered to approach the child, ever since he started acting up.

In one of the days, he had been abused enough to throw up what appeared to have been a hive. The flies which had been regurgitated by him had somehow remained alive and now swam in this disgusting pool. How was it that so many of them had appeared in his gut? He couldn't remember having swallowed as many as he had now been brought to knowledge then.

Shockingly, as he himself had noticed, something abhorrent inhabited the pool below him. It looked like an unspeakable kind of meat-malnourished insect which made its way amongst the others.

He had been tempted to go ahead and drag it back inside his mouth, but they were staring. It made him feel far too uncomfortable.

The boy ran away and tried to make his way back home, but even that attempt had been thwarted in some way.

Distastefully the rumours of what he had become reached his mother who had proceeded to disown him before anything came between the two of them.

'Back on the streets boy, you're no longer my son and this house welcomes you no more.'

After the warning and a flicker of the wrist he was thrown across the room and forced to flee from sight. He thought about her throughout the night, as he peered at the bums in the night, slouching with their sickening demeanour.

Even the neighbours chose to shut an eye while closing their doors and windows at the edge of the night, rather than look at the boy and his following flies.

The boy had some hope that someone would take pity after hearing what he had to say.

'I could begin by telling them that I was abandoned by my close-kin.

Name's Ollie, I believe I found myself in quite a jitter, how may I serve the night?'

Now that the only way for him to earn his due remained the cleaning of the chimneys, he would stop at every house on his way.

He had been dragged inside as he was forced to do whatever was needed to keep on going, without speaking a word to those who watched him with their strange fractioned eyes. The places he had visited were the common grounds, from the forgotten floors to the husky doors, where they freely reigned with no restraint. Wherever he went, they followed without straying away at the sight or at the smell he had produced.

On the contrary, they had been pleased by it, as they basked in his scent and came to be.

By now they spent most of their time on his body despite being given the evil eye by passers-by. They saw how the boy wretched himself in puddles of dark gray murk while he was covered in the winged menace which the flies had carried with them.

'Be gone vile one, do not turn your gaze to us with your foulness and your evil flies!'

He could vaguely remember their faces though at the same time, they didn't look as human as he thought they looked then. There was a clear distinction between their likes and normal men, which couldn't be denied.

It was something closer to the moving bits off their mouths which gave it away, the unnatural way through which he looked at them had tainted his very own gaze. Nonetheless, he got as far away from them as he could, oh, the untrustworthy men.

The streets had been dark and the alleys felt unwelcoming to him, that much he remembered.

By the time he managed to avoid those who'd have him stray and what he had left of his cheap tools already broke. Now he was rejected at every doorstep, even before reaching their thresholds, having become dirty and too wicked looking to be trusted. He received no sympathy from others and he could slowly feel his heart decay.

Aren't they in need of someone such as I?

This must've come as a surprise but by now most of them had no need of him any longer, having replaced the need for manual labour with something more fluid. Some strange device which seemed to crawl inside their coal-infused towers and draw everything in akin to some black gut parasite that did the job more effectively than any man or child may do.

It drove him to a change he wouldn't have expected to happen, being forced to sleep alone in beds of lice and only in the darkest alleys. His skin had become as dirty as one could have it, in the circumstances which had been told.

'Well, it seems like this is where they'd find me if someone would look for a wretched child.'

He muttered as he pleased, despite being cold and with an empty belly.

Though something did appear to be audible in the dead of night, it was a rabid creature growling in the farthest reaches of that tight alley he was in. The moment came where they'd have to face one another!

He stopped making sudden movements and said no word, luckily for him, the mutt hadn't immediately jumped at his throat. Sharing this refuge with him wasn't as pleasing as he cared to admit, but he hadn't a choice in the matter.

Oliver couldn't help it either, as curiosity drew him nearer to the beast. The fragrance it bore reminded him of his mother, as he pondered on it for a moment before realising it must've been in heat.

With the least of choice, he decided to go on ahead and look for it so he may end it before desperation came to be. It would've been perfect and a lot of trouble could've been avoided if he had been slain then and there. But alas, this wasn't the type of mutt he expected it to be, unlike the prime beast that was able to break bone and munch on flesh, this was only a twisted reflection of what it had once been in its youth.

The fact that it was growling was only directed at its own self since there wasn't anything to be done about the condition it was in. Some strange force was devouring it alive from the inside out but even stranger was the fact that he was able to recognise the type of larvae which lay inside the poor creature. The boy almost started drooling at the sight of it in a most benign manner. After the initial observation, he had judged that there wasn't any muscle mass left on its body.

The boy and the mutt looked at one another and realised then that there wasn't any fight left in it. He thought for a moment about the queerness that laid about the creature and what was it that kept it alive, at least before making sure no one would see them. What followed was a set of mad motions in which he started pushing as many of the fat, luscious grubs inside his mouth as he could swallow. Some of them hardened at the side of his mouth while others emanated something akin to a struggling motion.

There wasn't any fear left in the eyes of the mutt any longer, no light in the dark. Before realising why that was, he peered upon his own bloody hands and knew that he had drunk the dog's blood while those parasites were going down his gulley.

As much as he desired to be repulsed or disgusted by this act of gluttonous rage, he saw that more than half of the mutt's belly and what had been inside of it disappeared. The rest of those that flew around him seemed to have accepted the boy by now as some sort of living-hive, going through his various holes only to make sure their children would be taken care of.

He tried struggling against all those thoughts which ran into his head, barely realising what had happened there. Was he the one responsible of those vile acts?

Furthermore, the boy was driven away by a pair of stray cats which threatened to inflict severe pain and even death as they made their way towards him. Darker rats were trying to get away as well, with their fleas, shrieks and dangling tails.

With that and the fact that there was a bloody pool on the ground, he saw that he was covered in blood and guts, which would be an uncommon sight. The first chance he got the boy threw his shirt into the gutter. He was half naked by the time he made his way through the city, as he chose to walk under the shadows to avoid being seen by the night patrols. Brown-coated vulgar men looked out of spite.

It was by the time he came to the outer gates when he changed his mind and decided to return. Wretched woman that she was, on the building on the fourth floor, she hanged clean clothes on a line, waiting for someone able to climb. To him, it felt like a provocation of the highest calibre, a challenge for someone who'd be able to yank them off her chain.

'I need them if I am to be taken seriously!'

Said the boy while he cleaned his mouth and neck with the insides of a pool of water which lay on the street. There was no stopping now, especially since he was already half-way through, grabbing by each window ledge and readying himself for the slightest hint of a drop. Was it the distance which made him notice the bottom floor fading into a pool of sea-worthy blood?

No, that was his mind playing tricks on him, especially at the end. At least, to say that it was easily his best job done so far was an understatement. He was quite proud of himself. He was unaware how he had gotten to the ground safely.

As the years passed, for the longest time, it seemed like this would be it, the life he had been looking for. None would deny him that, to say the least, that's what he thought. For, day after day he labored like a dog, raising himself highly amongst the docks.

He felt as if this was where he belonged, a place where he wouldn't be seen like some stranger, where people didn't see them as he had. But they were there, outside, peering through holes and the cracks in the walls. Was he the only one who had noticed them?

That thought had never occurred to him until the time nigh.

He had nightmares during the nights, especially during storms when he had little control over his actions. One of them in particular had a dark man chasing him around the corner in the building he had slept in. His face had been exposed to a hole from which popped a few empty bulb-like nodes.

They emitted some sort of peculiar glow which seemed to draw in many wicked-looking moths that peered at him in an utmost disgusting manner.

He remembered the fright he had felt as they began chasing him. Oliver had been well aware that there was no escape from the torment he was set in, especially in that lucid nightmare in which he felt weak and helpless.

There was a man with limp and a grown tumor which shared a similar shape with the eye belonging to the common fly. Its form had been repugnantly forced out of the socket.

'No one will find this secret of mine, no one will know I stuff my guts with flies.

Heed me and do my bidding, help me that I may keep this secret at sea and don't you dare come looking for me.'

The boy chanted as if his grim spells had come into effect. By the time he approached manhood, he found himself on one of those ships, doing chores across its deck. It became rewarding in less of a time than he expected it to be since the men on the ship almost took him in like a brother. To be given in return would be fine clothes, a meal and the promise of a pension if he were to grow old.

It went well for the longest time, even more than he had initially planned, up until the day he had caught a big one all by himself.

A dreadful thing that might've dwelled at the bottom of the ocean for all he cared, which called for the immediate help of four other fishermen to pull it on deck. The moment it fell on the wooden floor, the lad saw something which the other men appeared to have missed. While they were busy celebrating the catch, it seemed as if some bumps of skin laid between the scales, many of them being as disturbing as they looked.

As they cleared on and left him to enjoy himself with his catch, he noted that the aquatic creature had been filled with parasites who had taken its body for granted. That fine meat wasn't to be devoured by their likes any longer, he thought.

'That was a good catch there, I'd say I'm bound to have you maim the pole more often if you keep it this way.'

Said the captain as he nodded at him, though something still dreaded his mind, his obsession hanging with the likes of being vile. Neither of them had noticed those things which crawled inside the fish, nor would they care. A sick realisation came to be once he thought of the people who might've eaten the meat with those crawlers inside of them.

When the night approached, he made his way unseen, towards the deck where that infested thing had been. On that dreadful hour, the sea was silent, there being no fish in sight to make splashes on the ground. They waited for his arrival, as the lesser ones came out of the tiny parasitic bodies which lay inside the fish.

They flew around but made little noise to wake anyone up, having been pulled towards their master, to whom they belonged.

'Leave now before they find us together, they don't have to know of our secret. I cannot face losing another life, not this one for which I worked so hard to attain.'

But his words fell dull as more and more flies came out of the many parasites lodged inside the poor dead sea creature.

The fear-struck lad made his way to one of the boats and took flight. He was aware that they would never see each other again, yet guilt still reeked of this sudden vile act of theft. Even with mercy, the lad wouldn't be able to go through mundane activities without a hand and how else could he fend them off as they happened to fly at him that way?

Regardless of the punishment, what was important to note was the fact that they had a sense of his newly-acquired scent as they came. He observed the fact that some of them flew off into the distance only to bring more of them amidst their ranks. Many of them lay distraught.

Instinct drove him to open his mouth and let the flies nest themselves in, since it was what they wanted after all.

Moments passed and his mouth had become some sort of a repository for them to dwell in and bring their prey in. Those tiny thick-headed floating imps had the nerve to bring some repugnant substance inside his mouth.

A hive was on its way, though their children wouldn't settle down for devouring Oliver's bitter meat, for the horrid matter wasn't that he was drooling, but the fact that they appeared to carry tiny pieces of meat and droplets of tainted water to quench his needs. Once he realised that the torment wouldn't end as quickly as he had thought, he took pleasure as well as guilt in their presence inside.

'Would they hunt me down if people saw me in this condition?'

The freak, the monster, the in-humane thoughts came as he rowed as far away from humanity as he could. His mind was somewhat unaffected by the passing of time, but the facial hair grew with the countless generations of flies which came into being. Some of which appeared to have left him while others made a permanent home inside his gut.

Strangely so, there wasn't even a need for him to release any kind of liquid or unwanted decay any longer.

Repercussions had been known to having living beings inside his body, some of which made their way inside the liver, while other organs might've been compromised as well. Though the farther he went away, the more he wondered when was the last time he had spoken with someone of his past kind. None of them were able to supply for someone who might've spoken to him in this time of despair.

After lying on his back for far too long, he woke up to see that the dreaded boat had almost reached land.

It was a wasteland filled with dunes and small blotches of sand for as far as it went towards the horizon. It would be the first time he had felt the warm sand between his toes, not entirely dissatisfied by it.

The floor was made of cinder slabs of pale orange burning mud-stone, which bore large enough cracks for the flies to get inside of. Oliver would've continued his walk if it weren't for the cry coming from a child which got his attention.

He was sitting in a cage, tied to a metal chain atop of a tall pole which held him adjacent to some waste bushes.

As he approached, the child had been shunned away, frightened by his appearance, with the strange way his jaw had become and by the number of insects which he revealed to be inside of it. None in sight might've been qualified enough to save him, henceforth, he turned in whatever way he could.

He bore resentment for the tiny caged creature, especially since he had planned on helping him as little as he could. Nonetheless, many more children lay abandoned in cages, left to rot under the setting sun. They must deserve what's happening to them now, why else would they be here, to begin with?

As he bowed his head and went away, offering the scuds shade, the others left in order to bring him the so-desired sustenance he now begged and longed for. It was a long way but they were fast enough and somehow managed to bring him the water unsalted.

Something in it swarmed, like tiny parasites which swam inside.

'For far too long I have suffered this fate.'

By now he was unsure if he could speak properly any longer, not to mention that his mouth had been less functional than before. Many teeth had no fillings inside of them, not that it mattered since they were used for their warmth and protection for the larvae that grew in his jaw.

'Why is it that I'm not hurt by shudder or by heat?'

The words left his putrescence as he bobbed his head.

It felt strange that he was aware of the irreversible process which had started taking effect over his body. Starting with his limbs, neck and mouth, every piece which had been an extension of him had become a dragging sight.

Nothing could explain the change which had taken place, while the dreadful in-humane had taken hold of his fetid appearance. Worst of all was the fact that his fingers had been twisted to the point of resembling baskets whilst crossed together. It was important to note that despite their appearance, those hands managed to catch a hive's worth of flies as he shoved them back in. A lot of what was right in his head seemed to have been stricken by a plague of doubt by now.

He couldn't tell much about the visceral structures he encountered after, but neither could he distinguish between the creatures and their masters since they appeared to have worn the same type of clothing.

They wore their etched robes in order to protect themselves from the blisteringly hot sand thrown at them by the wind while tirelessly working in the heat. At a moment's notice, one of the slaves pointed at him as he began shouting.

'Mirage, look at the mirage!'

During the commotion, as he noticed the stone chains wrapped around their ankles he decided to inquire about them. His paranoia had kicked in, making him reluctant to speak to the curls.

'It seems to me that you're one of the servants, aren't you?'

Not only did his voice not fit his body, but it also gave way for some of the flies to flee from his mouth. He had put on a dreadful show for them to observe what happened to those who attempted fleeing. Under the light of the barren sun, he looked like a delirious sand-mongrel caught in the midst of performing some strange ritual.

'Be gone vile one, your presence here is tainted and unwanted, and we may not cower under your dark grimace this day!'

The voice appeared to have come from a fatter man who wore a robe of dirtied skin, with bloody sand-coyote teeth attached to his knees and arm pads. Compared with the rest of them, he didn't look as much as one of the locals as his strangely pale skin gave him the appearance of an overgrown sand figment than that of a desert man.

Nonetheless, he prepared himself to be heard as well as all of his demands, at least until being ruefully interrupted.

'I've come to ask you in an utmost civilised manner for food and water, nothing more.

If it may please you, I may return the favour with some kind of labour at a later time. Though I doubt we'll ever meet again for I am reaching the end of my wits and cunning tricks. '

Without blinking twice, he appeared to be shocked by the fact that he could talk like any other man who had approached him. Even more that he knew the tongue.

'These vile tricks won't work on us for we've done nought to deserve this encounter of ours. You're but an evil wretch in search of trouble!'

Despite his demeanour, there was fright in his eyes, for he was no fighter and neither were the other eight shackled ones. He was not one to judge, especially with the constant humming in his head but they had to come to an agreement sooner or later.

'I've made my claims and I'll settle for no less of an answer.'

The more he repeated his speech pattern, the more he had to stuff his mouth again, which in turn provoked the horrid looks amongst his spectators.

'Very well then, if there's no other way to make you leave, I will return shortly.'

The man gave up far too easily and had already been out of sight.

'Now, why are you so shocked to look upon me?'

'No trouble. We work, we are released when we're done work. No sooner than that.'

Had the time for their release come at hand?

Would that be the reason why they've all taken a break from what they were doing?

'Don't tell me you stopped because of me, my poor and vile heart couldn't take it if it were true.'

Carry on as if I was not here.'

With that came a grin as well as a set of strange behaviours, having knelt before he began covering himself with sand. It wasn't enough to help him disappear but in the least, he obtained some approval from them.

For some unknown reason, they were all set in groups around broad wells, turning a system of paddles that looked as if it ran into the farthest depths that the earth could muster.

Had they been forced to undergo labour?

If there was something warm and sweet inside, he couldn't tell since he had only recently lost his ability to smell.

'What is this nonsense going on here?'

The man immediately covered himself before he was brought to his attention, as the vile one was not to know he was there yet. At least not having to look at the vileness which reeked out of his opening calmed the man.

Uncomfortably, his eyes shifted back to the slaves which made them immediately push harder than they did before. Oliver leered like a snail as he came close to one of them in the back.

'Don't think I wasn't able to see you from over there, your master told you all to work, hasn't he?'

'Not master, never be!

He come push us around and give us order as one.'

At least one of them seemed to have a spine, after all, approaching him did take some guts.

Though it may also have had to do with the fact that he was much younger than the rest of the slaves which made him speak out. Oll hadn't realised it but he was having more fun than he had intended to.

'Take this and leave us alone, we're not to deal with your kind any longer.'

The man finally decided to come out of the shade before he threw a big slab of raw meat into his hands.

'And what of the water?'

In response to his inquiry, the man went around the stone ford only to emerge with a heavy barrel. There was a shimmer of sweat on his face as well as he had shown his crooked teeth.

'Many thanks, stranger, I'll make sure you'll be repaid the next time we meet.'

'No, dark creature, don't ever come here again, we have our people to take care of and a mission to bring to fruition.'

He nodded as there laid little to no denial of the fact. It had crossed his mind that he would follow them through the night only to creep around and drop some of his spawns inside their ears. With the barrel in one hand, he took a swing at it, which almost drowned the flies or pushed them down his throat. Nonetheless, they were rewarded for their bravery, as he placed the slab of raw meat into his slobbering mouth and winced. They gorged on the meat as he carried on throughout the wastes, lost and free of any known human presence.

Neither of them managed to get this far through the desert.

It was something he alone and his flies adapted to, while no living human being could endure the heat in a plain desert during daylight as he had. The blisters under the skin and the layers which had grown on top of them stood there as a testimony to it.

'Not precious water, no waste it!'

His throat had been left dry to the point where his only consolation remained the fact that the broken words coming out of his mouth reached different octaves. He became entertained by the various morbid reaches of his tongues, having little doubt that he was slowly losing his mind. Past his impediments, at least he'd get the satisfaction of a few hours of sleep under no shade.

As he lay upon the barrel, he used one hand to cover his eyes and make it dark while the other blocked his mouth to prevent their escape. It hadn't helped as much as he thought since his gaping maw loomed like a cove tied to a giant human skull.

His dreams had begun tormenting him with the reminiscence of the even more distanced past.

'Pull it right in this spot, be gentle with it and don't forget that it needs to be delivered before midnight.'

The man ordered everyone around him in a quite demeaning manner.

A most disturbing aspect of his being had been the fact that decade old flies came out of his mouth as he spoke. One thing led to another, after which he was prompted to look at the ceiling and notice the legions of youth and mature flies, breeding innumerable masses.

'What are we packing, chief?'

'You wouldn't happen to be dull-headed, would ye?'

The same thing we've been packing for the last twenty or so years, knucklehead, ye should've known that. Now release hold of that container on the ground.'

He lost himself in a circuit of boxes and highly stacked shelves while the other workers were distracted by their maintenance checking. Within a short framework of time, he appeared to have returned bearing a bloodstained crowbar.

'Here, see for yourself what's that we're delivering.'

After a lift, he managed to open the box and reveal that there were flies inside, stacked upon one another, with a delivery note inside which appeared to have marked at least several destinations.

Oliver was struck by a state of fear as well as by the long awaited desire he had felt before.

'This can't be, they don't belong with the likes of you.'

His face reddened as he made his way from the factory onto the streets. He lost his grace as soon as he noticed that everyone around him was stuffing their faces with the vile fliers. They have become the perpetrators while he laid mundane, being as busy as he had been at their age, inhaling the short ones rather than minding their own business.

Seeing young children chase them into circles made him shiver. By the time he grabbed one of them he felt as if he could rip his arm apart. Fear lay in the lad's eyes, which prompted him to stop in order to regain some of his lost faculties.

'Spit them out, spit them now child!

What you're doing here isn't right, none of it is.'

'Let go of me this instant, can't you see you're hurting me?'

As if to prove a point, he ignored what the boy said and started jabbing him around. It was more than enough to make him listen to what the man had to say.

'Get rid of all of them and don't let me see this disturbing behaviour ever again. Now get out of my sight you runt!'

After being done with the boy, the rest appeared to be staring quite intently.

There wasn't any other option left for him but to escape through the underbrush of the lower ill streets. It shouldn't have happened by a long shot though he found the way to his home. Nonetheless, it appeared as if it was a pleasant surprise to find out that it was still there after so many years have passed.

'You don't know for how long I've been waiting for this, mother, to see the shock on your face after witnessing what I've become!'

After each step, he appeared to stagger from the extra weight placed on his body, immediately contorting to that obscene form. It was far too late to stop now, especially after being revealed.

'There's a terrible thing among us, help! Call for help!'

It was only after being seen by the fleeing dwellers that he realised how low he had stooped. He had failed in his first attempts to turn the knob since his hands weren't purposed for that type of action any longer.

Knowing that there'd be no way to shove through the door with the little strength he had, he turned towards the window and formed a boulder of meat which smashed that peculiar frame as he broke through the glass. The shards flew in as many tight spots as they could land in, piercing the curtains in their debauchery and mad charade. He had a strange sensation, akin to being trapped in an opera house, with his every move being watched by the silent spectators.

There wasn't even a hint of doubt regarding what he was capable of doing once he laid eyes on her.

He sniffed around, enough that he took in the scent of dandelions and cheap perfume, wondering whether or not she was expecting anyone. The more he waited, the easier it had become for him to notice how well she had done for herself, now that she lived in a spotless house, filled with expensive furniture and lavender tapestry knotted on the walls. It felt as if he had been nothing but a nuisance of a child, something to keep her expansion back.

With a baleful strike, he tore off her pearls from the glass case she kept in.

'The nerves she has, daring to kick out a restless child only to fill her life with fake jewels and no emotion.'

Her winged slaves had appeared to pick up many of the pearls that had fallen on the ground. It looked as if they were used for household chores after all. Dreadful things happened in his presence as well as some of them being filled with pus only by having flown too close to him.

'Stay away from me you dreadful thing, don't come any further!'

She was standing a few feet away from him in the living room, behind a door that had an old mechanism which required a good while of time in order to get properly closed.

'Couldn't even trouble yourself to change it, could you?'

Oliver came close enough to place his hand at the edge of the door. It stopped any attempt she might've thought of. In a moment she fell behind, heavily breathing in her place.

Even at a distance, he could feel her lungs pulsating violently, desperately trying to push out flies out of them as hard as she might. This process would repeat itself several times throughout their conversation, despite his repulsion.

'Is it too late for me to return to my dear old defenceless mother?'

Do I not deserve the stay, especially after such a long journey?

May I not approach?'

'Stay away from me, oh stay away from me, monster, damned fiend! The only son I may have had died a long time ago when he had been trampled by a carriage under the hooves of a dire horse.'

You couldn't possibly be him.'

'Liar!'

The crackling tone of his voice was enough to banish any fly from his vicinity.

'What do you want from me?'

His mother asked after making an effort to stay calm.

'Nothing less of acceptance for what I have become, especially now that you turned out to be exactly like the rest of us, another drooling and accursed creature placed under their feigned servitude.'

For the first time since he had seen her, she had finally taken the initiative of looking at him as if they were both equal.

'You caught me, my dear son, I lied. There's no denying it any longer. You've become the freak I always thought you'd become. If I had kept you around!'

She tried making a move and grabbed something sharp then, as she spoke. Poised on the thought of cutting him, she winced at being caught.

'Even now when everyone is more akin to you, you still remain an outsider and a stranger!'

Before she even got the chance to lunge at him, she had been struck down by a wicked blow. The sight of him placing his deformed hands together had lain as a torment of its own, which came before he even had the chance to come at her again.

Blood gushed out of her forehead and right behind her neck. The flies were finally delighted by her torment, having acquired tiny beads of blood only to carry them as far away from the scene.

'Are you going to end me because you cannot handle the truth?'

She spoke from the dark corner in which her body crawled in.

'The truth? You could have cared for me, enough to make me stop!'

'You could've stopped yourself a long time ago. There wasn't anything preventing you from crawling back to my feet and asking for forgiveness. It's nothing but your damn fault that you did not want to stop.'

'Stop talking!'

Having had enough of it, there came another blow down on her, this time being far more distasteful than the last time. She shrieked in pain as it had done more harm in the dark than it would've done in the light, hidden behind the curtains.

'Would you go that far and murder your own progenitor? It wouldn't change a thing now, would it? Not what you've become.'

While being aware there'd be consequences, he proceeded to walk disturbingly towards the threshold, near the frame. As the knocks started on the door, he was aware that they were staring at him right where the window had been. He shook himself before closing the door the first chance he got, but they saw enough to warrant using brute force.

Before noting that she took advantage of his distraction and tried reaching for a pair of scissors, he turned around and crushed her arms.

'Do you think my death will stop you from running away like the coward you've always been? Go on with it then!'

Before he could make another move against her, he realised that she had become the dog he had always been afraid of, rotten and filled with the many of the same larvae which threatened to awake from hibernation. Only at this point had she been hurt enough for them to be exposed.

'This is what your future looks like, dear son. A rotting cadaverous gutted child which has never been human to begin with. That's what you'll end up as, begging for your misery to end.

But your prayers shall never be answered, and I will be there to witness it all!'

Right as the officers had broken through and her shouts faded, he woke up to a sight of sand. He had become annoyed at the fact that he hadn't the chance to retaliate at her words, a thing which he'd never forget. There wasn't any hunger to deal with yet, coincidentally with the fact that the meat slab had disappeared from his mouth area.

He was disturbed that they had thought of force feeding him while he was asleep even if they were taking care of their host.

'What dreadful thing could this be on my back?'

It started being as painful as it could be at first but as it got closer to the bone marrow the body began growing blood lumps and skin clots, slowly forming giant wings.

'This cannot and it will not happen, not as long as I still have a hold over my humanity!'

He hadn't had the chance to say anything else in the matter as the awakening made him realise how ill he'd become.

Oliver pulled the barrel for a huge gulp of water and quenched his thirst for another day, enough so he could at least reach the far plains of the waste. Under that morbidly crowned sun, he wished he could've grown functional wings and sprint into a flight as far away as he might.

'This cannot be, but do my eyes deceive me?'

He was dreadfully surprised at a sight which had bewildered him. The man had become unaware whether or not if he was looking at it right as he looked upon an actual town, a modern creation which lay in the middle of the wastes.

A madly shining silver star shone in the midst of nothingness, almost hovering inches above the sand, locked in a world of its own. The constant buzzing noise in his head only got worse from this point on.

That shall be the end of my loneliness, dawn of the days to come!

'Allow me to introduce myself.'

One gatekeeper stood there and leered as he approached, having to perform a mandatory check before he would be allowed to raise the barrier, letting him in.

'Not one of many words I presume. Well, I'm.'

A stroke of breath suddenly came. 'I'm'

His throat felt dry, having been unaware of the reason for which he was trying to engage in the conversation.

From his mouth came the most incomprehensible words a humanoid could even mutter, after which the gate opened. The way it had been forged made him uneasy, at least, after looking at its sharp spikes and metallic thin hairs it bore around each metal bar which formed it.

Not precisely what he had expected, though it wasn't as if the rest of them were any different either. People were moving and trying to act normal while doing what he would refer to as their regularities. It was strange enough that he had lost all interest in them and chose to pay attention to the nearest sewage gate he could find.

It took him at least a few attempts to push the grate open and look at the black pool which ran below. The waves appeared to share some of the dampness and brooding crimson which often belonged to crime scenes.

Even a meekly dead rat ran through the stream, but it couldn't have been the cause of the strange colouration it bore behind it. Nevertheless, as it had served its purpose, this was to bring the man's full attention to what was to come.

One dreadful man had taken the liberty of moving towards one of the walls, only to be met my force. He kept bashing against it until one lurid moment when he turned around to reveal his face and what had become of it. A black moth-like being emerged from his body and for a second there, it looked like his body had only been a giant cocoon which held his grand form behind. The oily dark being then flew away in the sky aghast.

After being basked in the realisation of who that was, he couldn't help but gasp at the body while it was being taken in by the tide. Despite wanting to shout he felt his dry lips being wrapped around by flies as they puckered to stop him. That had been someone he knew, in flesh and bones caught after an act of terror with the expression starkly on face.

The body would've shouted if it weren't for all that murky water in its mouth. Unable to handle the sight, he stumbled on his feet and backed away, speechless as the others came to put back the grate in its place.

'How could that be there out of all places?

Tell me you damned thing, how did she end up inside your sewers?'

He grabbed the first man who came into sight, but having become aware of his inability of speech, he emulated some sort of a high pitch out of his nostrils. They were all afflicted by the same degeneracy which made them feeble which rendered them unable to explain the dreadful apparition in the sewers.

No one spoke a word, though kept pushing those revolting sounds out of their bodies. After a sudden pull, he couldn't believe his own eyes how he managed to rip off the man's arm without much of a mess.

There wasn't even a reaction to accompany this bizarre act of dread, not to mention that there was little to no pain involved. He had been bleeding out of the hollow body which lay inside, not blood but rather a stuffier substance which looked a lot like amber in the setting sun. In that liquid, it all made sense, as he saw the flies inside and realised that the people there had become their hives.

'Oh, my tormentors, grant me the freedom I so desire!'

He spoke softly, as opposed to his actions while he fought his way through the crowd, pushing and ripping them to shreds, anything to escape the clutch in which he'd been held.

There was no remorse in his being.

'This need, this desperation, I need to hear the voice of another human being before my mind goes mad.'

He grabbed the first girl he could lay hands upon as well as her stuffed bear, only to be met by the same noise bred by the rest of them.

Disgusted by the creature, he released it only to witness how it went into a partial flight after attempting to leap as far away from him as it could.

The sight only worsened his mood, to the point where something inside of him started slowly rotting.

'I won't stay here any longer to be mocked by the likes of you!'

Those locked doors, the barred windows, the distasteful behaviour they protruded from beyond their earthly bodies made him lose his direction as he sprouted into another flight. He beckoned no one to follow in his mad stroll while having come to the desperate realisation that he longed for the real touch of another human being.

'I long for a mere touch, a warm body again mine in this ravenous commotion. Guide me toward another unless you desire me to wither away and wane under the sun.'

There wasn't any telling as to know whether or not they understood, but a cold grasp came from behind and as he looked, the town was there no more, gone as an apparition of the sand. Some of the inhibitors of his body had already left in search of the others.

At least he could count on the fact they would listen and obey his primal need of socialisation. Much of his dignity had left him on the ground to crawl, carrying the barrel on his back while grinding his body against the sand. He hadn't much need for his limbs though he managed.

As for himself, he noticed that the flies were somewhat giving him a consistent direction to follow. Faith led him to believe that soon he would be among people like him, whistling in a crowd contently, unlike in his dreams where he wanted everyone around him dead.

Likely, he followed the trail restlessly without sleep while hearing nothing but the noise they made inside his head. By the time his water reserves had ended, there was nothing in sight and there was no strength left in him for flight.

'Dreadful beings, to where have you brought me now?

I won't be able to last longer if I keep going down this path.'

He'd become angry at everything around him as the night thinned out. Everything that happened to him as far as this point had taken a toll he could carry no longer, though for some reason the desire had grown whole again upon the sight.

Hope had died for him the moment he was too far to return and as far from what he longed for. The only consolation left to him was the sight of a living tree which lay in the middle of the wasteland.

No one else close to sight, at least, none who might be able to satisfy him.

'So, this is the place where I am to die?'

The very thought of it made him shiver in the sand, oddly enough since he had been at the end of his wits for some time. With that in mind, his body stopped struggling in the dunes and got up from the sand.

He held the false impression in his mind that he would be able to walk there like a man, standing straight with both of his feet set together.

But the weakness returned to his knees as he was forced to obey those who have dragged him in the first place. After getting closer, he realised that there were other contenders he had to deal with, large and brown desert wasps who reigned in their nest atop the tree, making an accursed noise, aggressive even when they flew passively there.

Their slave now did their biddings, after all, one favour could do me no harm. We've been through enough, it would be the least I could do for them.

Pushed by his desire, he winced at the sight but carried on their wicked plan, pulling the nest out of the trunk. He crushed their only exit, leaving the nest at the mercy of the sand, watching how its maws dragged it deeply below.

'Would that be all, if then, are you pleased with how I served you?'

They wanted him to crawl over there. That was it, but those fire ants would torture him without an end.

'I'm weak and unable to get rid of so many of them. Do not turn this place into my grave, I beg of you!'

For once though, he wasn't forced to do a thing but wait, at least until the noise in his head had stopped.

It never came though, and he had given in, mournfully dragging himself over the sand as he climbed onto the tree.

'You have betrayed me, oh poignant atrocious insects.

Worry not for you shall never leave my side and this shall be my final promise.'

Regardless of what he had once called himself, his body had become part of that hallow trunk in which he brooded. Some unkindness kept him alive despite having what was left of his organs outside his body, protected by the flies as if unable to rot despite being exposed. His appearance remained as haggard as it had always been, if not worse for the wear.

What came unexpectedly was the attention which he had received as flies from all over the place were drawn to him with tribute. He had grown to be a glutton in there, stretching into the coves of sand with the least amount of work his body provided, not to mention that his legs had lost their functionality at last.

Without the practice, with the noise, his speech had degenerated, leaving him without an option but to live in that state, unkind. At least he had managed to gather a crowd around him, even though they mostly pointed but to mock him in in his lowest form. They dared not approach for fear ran of what it might do.

Alas, it had been time for him to look down at the cracked bottom to see a river like no other.

Oliver wasn't in the least concerned with the purpose but rather with the haunting images of what went down its stream. It might've been yet another apparition, sensing that his end was near.

There was nothing to stop the loss of control as the consequence of his weight began pulling him down.

Braver souls tried coming forth yet stopped once they realised that it was far too dangerous for them to get closer, as the ground had fractured. A bellowing roar of dust engulfed their sight as he was pulled bellow to his damnation, taking all his flies with him.

By the underground creek, where he had been pulled, he met the woman who had waited for his poor soul to arrive.

The central chronicles had their leper walls receding into nothingness. Since the ascent of the comers from the outside world, there hadn't been a second more for the living to come to their thoughts. In hopes that they would be brought there and asked to mind their manners, they had forgotten to be paired.

'We are lost now, and it is your entire fault. Punished be, my sense of loyalty, I should've abandoned you when I had the chance!'

'How come you chose to stay then? I wager you have taken a liking to me.'

'You do little to interest me now, see? I have found a new play thing that I may mess with in my quest of joy.'

This mad monk who filled his bitter senses with saw-dust was incapable of thinking right longer than a few moments. There had been iron bits into his lungs, which prevented his breathing as well as his senses. Now he would be tense, as he felt like some deranged creature which couldn't help itself but lay in hiding.

A watcher approached at an interval of twenty minutes or such. For every stroll he had, he had begun spraying the walls with his bayoneted-shaped arm. He looked like a metal angel, with a hood from which no face may ever be seen. No other likes such as his might be seen around, as this one had been too much to bear, as the other watchers couldn't help themselves but stare.

From a large tower behind them, there had been five openings from which they stared at him. Though they were made of iron, he had been forged out of some darker metal that made him stand out.

If they were representing well order as they had been finely shaped and lay in some sort of artificial conundrum, he would be stressed by the many metal spikes and the head which had been laid about. A passer had been killed, a trespasser to be precise. What had been of him, or his memories had mattered little to this one.

The minds of many as well as two couldn't face what this one had become. Not only would he be a stranger to himself now, especially since this dark watcher had appropriated the head for him, but there'd be nothing preventing him, after the task had been done with, to put it on.

A perfect fit, of which first reaction had been to shout at the sight of the leper walls. It would be dangerous for him to be near them, but it would be even more dangerous to live at all. No one who had been present had any desire to keep them alive. It would be something near a sin for them to be allowed passage.

Now that the watcher had eyes, he could see through the head he had taken. There'd be no stopping him now, at least not from hunting those who'd come. But as for a proper warning, since it had come to it again, he opened his mouth and said.

'Worry not, as I have decided to humbly set myself in awe. You have entered my abode, so you must know that I am not one of the watchers but one of them, one of the possessors of the walls.

I have only decided to love myself amongst them to observe your kin more closely.'

Upon which, this one opened his metal body with the tip of his bayonets. His wings drew inwards and it seemed like a piece of that leper wall had been inside, pulsating as it appeared like only a piece of it had resembled the wall. The rest of that magnificent growth could only titillate it ever-more. No amount of its sprays could force it back there, from the spot it had been taken from.

Clearly the men had been looking at the absent thing, with the little circumstance in mind, as there would be a fight to be instilled in them. If only one of them had the half-o-sense to try getting away. At least one of them could survive, but this thing had claimed another head, received over the fact that they had waited for far too long there.

And this watcher had immediately closed his body, revealing a small trap-door opening in his neck which pushed the other head down there. This newly acquired head would make a fine replacement while the other had become part of the wall. A process of absorption would come to be, as the other watched brushed by in their way to clean the mess which had been created.

Now, this one man had managed to escape and get through the mass which had been lain below. Many bodies lay on both sides of the bridge which lead to the leper walls. It was clear by a single sight that the bodies had all been headless.

'I'm being chased, allow me some escape, please, can't you hear my voice now?'

Despite the man's best attempts, he only found himself being trailed in the midst of that locked inner chamber those watchers had come from. Well aware that he was being chased, it was time for him to at least come to terms that he wouldn't escape.

A sudden turn revealed what was about to happen. There he stood, the man who had accompanied him. It had been, for that one moment when he had come to life. He was being dwarfed, unable to fight back as this towering watched reached for his long arms and cut him right around his shoulders.

It had been a nice addition so far, looking at so many heads which had been embed on the wall inside of him. Soon, he would have to return to the leper wall and become part of it like he had been intended to. No more suffering would be held.

It was about to go on well. Something came then. Many of the automaton-like watchers appeared like they had stopped working. Not only had that, but they all appeared to be lost. Or parts of them had.

A trickster must've been too obvious, especially by the handiwork he had done. Their backs had been pulled, metal entrances stroke and broken. Within them, he had seen many tubes which had been inserted not only through their backs but down there as well as near the leper wall. In was through that way that they had been deactivated.

Many metal casings and wheels and cogs stood clogged by the mere growths which had come from the leper walls. Now, the progenitor watcher looked at his brethren which had not only infested everything in that room, contaminating it beyond belief, but he also stared at the many faces he had taken in the past.

At the time they had started manifesting hands and legs, they had begun drawing it, pushing towards him in an attempt to get him to join them again. Voices came and started coughing. Speeches lay distorted still.

It wasn't like he would stand to be part of whatever this had become. As the corpses marched below, they suddenly revealed themselves, on both sides of the bridge as some kind of bodily formed monstrosities. Their bodies had tried to reject the leper-like appearance but it couldn't have been thought off.

With the organic material, the leper wall didn't have a need to be sprayed any longer. It turned out that the spray had only served as some kind control over its expansion. This fully spread leper walls could only begin to cover and break everything in their path, encumbering and beginning the process of tiny extractions.

From them, millions if not billions of eggs would sprout and spread, creating tiny insects which would spread the leper's disease, all because he couldn't help but chase a man in an attempt to take his head. This was the legacy of the watcher, in his distraction, perdition would be denied.

Behind him, the door was locked, in front of him a wall of metal which would only rot.

An old broadcast from the archive kept repeating itself time after time inside the station. Someone's private code had been broken as it was torn apart and mixed with twenty exact copies of itself.

Every single one of them corrupted. Either some virus spread some misinformation or whoever the owner of those files near the broadcast was must've been some sociopath of some kind. Reading or even working through those had been disturbing for its referee.

To be clear, many of those files contained leaked meeting points that cadets were supposed to seek. At least of those who had been lucky enough to have been granted some temporary flee.

On a loop there had been the interview of some old writer, maybe some speaker of the kind. But his appearance had been obscured by the folder in which the files had been placed. Many of his facial features couldn't be seen. Whoever he had been interviewed by lacked any kind of awareness of the kind. Fingers slipped, hands shaking, could've been some intern.

Folders with name by her hands, it was clear that between the two, those who remained from the crew had little interest in what was going on there. An unworthy amount of insignificant moves came again. Still, without a way to access the interface, the board had only served as a way for those things to be projected on. It would be useless to try anything then. By two, there had come the feeding hour.

around the board, over the counter, where once open clad of the empty space where the seats were, stood the door leading inside the cafeteria. It had been high-permanently close.

Opposite to it there was the view outside the station. Inside, it was clear enough that neither of the crewmen could deal with the tension any longer. Expectation be Nile.

Not since everything, out there at least seemed to be so occupied by space. A few planets lay too near one another, but they hadn't been affected by any gravitational pull. Though, that wasn't completely true. To them, it only seemed like it, as most of the planets had been forced to some stillness, while the universe was forced into some movement which couldn't have been forgiven.

Events happened there for some reason which may not be explained by any rational means.

Sometimes a planet would vaguely disappear. Now, the station found itself inside the core of one of the planets, only that it seemed to be empty. Some backup system had detected the fact that there was some atmosphere present and the lights kicked in.

For now, nothing from inside the core fell on top of them. Stall had been caught off guard. He moved someday last week, out of nowhere and it felt like it's been an on-going year ever since. His head was gone, simply cut off from the rest of his body. And the weird thing about it, what the crew had looked up at was that in one of those folders on the screen, there had been pictures of him waiting on display.

A slide-show had been activated, moving through picture after picture, set to go off then. Before the feeding hour, that is, someone or something had revealed how they stalked, hit, pushed Stall down, proceeding to do whatever they wanted to do with him. Afterwards, his head happened to be out there, hanging around the core.

Though atmosphere was supposed to be present and everything was somewhat affected by the gravity inside the empty core, there was a floating head belonging to Stall. He was very much alive. Indeed he was staring, floating, trying to flee from sight. For some reason, the crewmen's eyes widened' a simpleton's act which made Stall rather ashamed of what he had done. It would be a fool's act to think otherwise.

But someone had attempted to kill them, even though they were locked in the same section for some time now. It couldn't have been one of them, could it? The pictures from the slideshow hadn't gone into detail. No way of knowing.

One may start to wonder, after seeing that no blood was present, were they being tricked?

Imitations made out of machines didn't bring on the risk after the case. No matter how hard one may try, he couldn't force it inside.

'Did you see that? We're out there, out here, in space again.'

But this time, the planets had been out of sight, and the stars hadn't been properly aligned.

The cafeteria door opened and there came the machine.

A general announcement came in. The board's display appeared to have changed before there had been a chance for anything to be made out of it. With a flash of a surge, there it came. If there was one man who looked at it, for more than one second without having immediately instanted towards the food plates, that had been George.

'Immediate landing incoming, please proceed near the safest area possible.'

They had come to a full stop, and suddenly they landed. Something had been of the matter. Without a way of looking out there, one would default to giving in to the fact that they were stranded. The fermentations-council from Cloghe.

With a defect in the way and manner, one could look into what went wrong with their escapade so far. Not one but two members of the marked cover had survived the crash. Some of their cloaks had stopped providing the much desired layer of camouflage which was needed in order to help one survive such a harsh environment as that of the planet they had been stranded upon.

Everything around them gave in to the coming storms. There could be no denying that it wasn't safe to go out there without means of protection. As fumbled visions came to be stricken away, there had come the dust from about the upper plane, which was headed their way.

'What was that?'

'I said, it's heading that way.'

From the opposite direction, can you see it?

I believe it's that flashing dot from one spot in the sky. There can't be any denying in it, from the unnatural way in which it moves and. Well, look at that configuration that's being picked up by its signal.'

The radar started going on its own again. If there was something to it, the radar would have to pick on in.

‘Go, wake up Pierre. He should have a look at this.’

Plenty of space shrapnel would’ve been enough. But this had been something else. It was a space station, rushing through the atmosphere, going on that way, without giving any kind of direction from the push-over light. A sphere of distrust came over the men.

Two reasons remained, with one being insignificant, enough that it would be ignored and the other one being the fact that for each light-pane which had been laid on the station, there had been a cloned head attached to it.

‘Am I seeing this right?’

Are they talking to one another?’

More than that, they seemed to have been living in a state of constant falling.

Their hair had been drawn back and it looked like, instead of falling in the same direction as the structure, they were stuck in a state of almost hitting its sides. As the heads had lain, there couldn’t be anything taken from it, without a doubt, and to an end’ shout, there was no one standing over there.

‘They must’ve been some projections. Yes.’

‘They’re here, they’re here, look.’

A pile of heads stood in the corners, near their crashed ship. It seemed like they weren’t animated this time and if anything, it looked like they fell. Not a single one had resisted the crash and it turned out that they were released from the state they had been in.

‘It’s not safe, you know?’

There’s no need for you to touch them.’

‘ one second, I know what I’m doing, allow me this, one single...’

This wasn’t supposed to happen, and that Pierre had learned it on his own skin. His entire arm disappeared then, and with a single turn or a flicker of the body, the much needed reveal came. He turned, with a head attached to his body.

A space-pioneer left there with a new head on his shoulders. This one was sad. Without general directions, it couldn’t have been thought off that there was a hand out there with a bunch of heads attached to it. But Pierre’s face had been vaporised.

Perhaps if one were to look at the cafeteria inside the station, one would serve heads or a hand for the upcoming diner. Plenty of bored machines lay there. But one peculiar sight seemed to be set at play.

On a freshly spread wall of turquoise, the image of a particle-like spread hand stood there like a painting, holding those heads in a spread position. It attempted to get as many hands in its lap as it could.

That had been a mad quest for the living-machine. Before long, it approached, spreading its long metallic claws, drawing near every side. It pulled the flat surface, from whence its fleshy flat remains threw. Socketless and without an iris, the eyes moved only with a slightly observable transparency. And those things had been spread all across the station.

Without a mention of the fact that there was a sudden consequence to this sudden retrieval, the command of search and reconstruction had been communicated between the robots. Those heads would be rebuilt, while the hand could be abandoned.

‘There must be a logical reason to it.’

A mad machine had been struck by this. Its operating device hanged upside down. Below it there stood a head staring at it. There was a look of boredom which had come over it.

Its eyes sparked. From an inward pull, this head couldn’t have made it through the sudden burst of engine in which it had been caught there. one tiny bit of its eyes were somewhere else, watching and following through something of a quarrel.

Fours hours already out of the way.

Down, on the planet, the crew from Cloghee found themselves locked in their static-placed locked-room. They were showered by the sounds made by Pierre’s body. He would simply not leave them alone.

‘If this goes down for ten more minutes, I’ll lose it. I’ll head right out there and grab the first thing that comes in my hands and I’ll simply.’

Wait.

‘We’ll wait until it clears. He’s still human, so he has to get tired like the rest of us.’

‘His body may be but I don’t know about that head. There’s no sign. Get some cover, I say!’

For the top head of a stranger who seemed to look dumb, with its ravenous hair and clamps in the neck, it certainly knew how to get creative. With a grasp, to himself, he threw a rock and almost got to break one of the glass covers of the ship.

‘That was close.’

‘No, it wasn’t. He needs more than a simple...’

Head, he threw it, away.

The crew had been reluctant, even though they had went with it and opened the door. Looking down at it seemed to have helped everything stay clear of what went on. They did appear to be less reluctant once they had used the camera attached to the top area of the side-seat outside the hanged cradles in which their equipment had been stored.

‘It ran out of things to throw, it seems.’

Everyone tuned in to Dolquoise.

‘Don’t touch it. You know what happened to him!’

‘I know but that had been the pile. I know it won’t happen to me. There’s no way it could. Plus, look!’

The head melted. It lay in a pool. It looked like one of the machines in the station had accidentally spilled boiled water over it. Without it standing there, there had been nothing down on the planet either.

And the station only stood there in waiting. Enough hours passed for the men stuck in their section to get bored of their own boredom.

It had been ever so-reluctantly boring to be there. It didn’t feel like there would be much of a change any time sooner. If there was something to stare out, as they gathered around the board, it was the fact that there wasn’t anything interesting to be seen on its screen.

The old footage of the interview had been paused and now, it only looked like the slideshow and the folders had been drawn back. Without knowledge of what was happening, it seemed like the machines had stopped performing their experiments on the crew. Now they had been preoccupied with something far more important and interesting, which was the fact that those sheets of skin and bone could not be forced back together.

Why, they had picked and placed them neatly only to see how little could be done about it. These strips would still not go to any waste. One could still eat them after all, and they were getting close to running out of supplies.

‘What have you expected?’

Logical fallacies aside, I would abide and observe that there was no possible way of putting them together.’

Obviously something which had to have been known, but those things had defied the laws of physics by simply appearing there.

It was to be held to the contempt of a machine that stood recording the obscenities and the mere fact had lain itself this way.

‘We’re located in a universe so chaotic that we’ve fallen prey to our own game.’

And it was true, it had to be true, the fact that the cold machines had become so vile in their desire to mess with the men that they themselves were stricken down. It felt like the station wouldn’t work any longer, because it was now set forth inside the cave in which the ship resided.

The cafeteria door had been broken by the mere apparition of the ship. Momentarily startled by the single head which had rolled inside of their room, they stared.

‘Look, our crewman returned, and. He’s brought guests.’

‘Wait, where are we? What happened?’

Both of those groups looked rather confused at one another in that moment. More so, the door sprouting beyond the cafeteria malfunctioned as well. The men were met by the machines which only looked curiously in their direction.

It was strange. The men who had been in isolation appeared simple, in ways which one may come to exploit.

‘Don’t even think about it. Whatever we stumbled upon let it be.’

‘This is what happens when there’s no cloak hiding us.’

‘Wait, there are machines in here.’

He pointed about his shoulder. They stood like a bunch of boxes with small rotating wheels which held each other in place with the help of their electrical bands which didn’t seem to move either but absorb the kinetic energy they themselves produced.

When they were done bringing all that energy to form, the bands would draw back as to completely encompass the metal wheels. Small metal legs would expand from the wheels only to reveal the holes in them. Sleeping gas came out. Way too effective, especially for the people who were around a ship that had a means of protection.

Both crews fell immediately on their knees.

The metal boxes opened to reveal the androids hiding inside.

‘You’ve got something on you.’

Between the two metal boxes which had been shared, in likeness of the fact that they rotated with the help of solid metal elastic bands which had been pinned down on both sides of those shifting mechanical orbs, there stood a head which prevented it from fully functioning.

Of course the head wasn't living, as its brain had been destroyed, being caught in many circuits and many pushing wires, but there's been something else in it. From inside, it looked like the brain had been turned inward, turning into a mechanical creation, which only pushed its ambiguity aside.

In that machine now stood the head, much more so aroused by the fact that it had immediately been encased by the metal shell which had been drawn back. That action was quick and well thought out, as the machine approached in order to smash its sides.

'Open yourself up.'

'Allow me to open it, I shall begin the procedure of acquired forgery elements and begin cutting it apart.'

There wasn't any way of knowing how much damage the device would do.

'Stop, are you certain this would go on well?

Logic dictates that this will fail, immeasurably so, to the point of doing irreparable damage to function.'

'Then cut the chase and cut its power cord, look, beneath the engine, near its wheels.'

They've done it, with undoubtedly high-remark to the fact that it didn't stop.

'Restrain, immediately.'

A waiting period came to mind. There had to be some way to shut it down. It wasn't going to happen. All of those tubes powering the machine haven't worked properly to begin with. Now, they'd work no longer.

A wait had been instilled. For every second spend there, drops of oil kept dripping of their cases. They could only look and wait. It was unnerving, even for them.

'Should we open it?'

'Wait for it.'

There couldn't have been a second more to pass until the question had been asked again.

'Problem needs acknowledgement. Gas had been replaced with toxin. No human left alive.'

It felt like there was some anger there, especially since the compartments of the station had been sealed off, the men killed, the heads thrown displaced so they wouldn't be living either and now this. Despite the lack of powering, the machine continued working.

It looked like this rude inhumanity had ended up with them giving up.

Behind them, the torment had begun, as they would be defiled by this human head as its vile speech kept pressing on.

More than a few glances had already been shot out of the window. It was then that the prairie could be seen, with those sharp wooden stakes at hand, through each close-call and moving lance, each trembling hand stopped.

There were quite a few men applauding there. It was all too obvious by the redness of their palms. Many had almost come to form their strange calluses by doing that.

I jumped out of the balcony and landed on my feet. Front row, it looked, the fourth and fifth seat, had two men standing up, looking at me for some reason.

Neither of them knew why I had done it, as they were busy enjoying their show. It had been displayed there, right about the front of the large obelisk which dwarfed the tiny men in the parcel.

'I thought it wouldn't be here.'

'But it is, now come here or take a leap!'

The voice which came from his left side had been the one conductor who solemnly waited for a thicket. It should've been in his hand by then. But each pocket had only been weary of some dirt inside of it.

'No thicket?

Are you sure? You come here every single day and you always have one on you. I would expect anyone else but you to be that forgetful.'

The show waited for him. Not because he had been someone important, but because everyone else had been startled in response to the fact that he needed to do something. The mad thing inside the obelisk wouldn't wait. Such a confined creature, of the set of fine lines, trapped inside such a small cage, could only lay so low until it would break its cage apart.

It took its time to push forward an m-shaped leg, from the side, which only expanded as to make a likes of m-shaped long legs look rueful in that yellow sky.

By then, the boy had been the only one staring. But he's been too tired to do anything of it. Those legs, they weren't mean to do much, as frail as they were. It was clear that they were only part of a set and appeared to have forced the stage for a ruse.

By the time they had extended and had wrapped themselves around their zone, it came to him that it had so vastly prepared to bring out its hands out there. They were quite better at grabbing, oh, they were quite the spread. Indeed, through some vastly outnumbered set of finger holes, they started creeping inside each ear-lobe they could reach inside.

He knew that creature needed to feed as well, but, any other boy his age would've found this creepily unforgivable. Not him!

'My name is Paricott. The other boy you've previously served before I even came here was, my twin.

Yes, he was my brother. Please forgive me, but I don't want to cause him any trouble.'

'No thicket then?'

'I could try looking around inside his waist coat. It's his after all and that would happen to be a reusable thicket, wouldn't it?'

'Only one use, per view as well. There would be no refunds for any young man, and changing the man would mean two uses.'

'Between us.'

He seemed to have twisted his eyes to their tips and ends, only so he may get an overview of the show attendee. It would be rather silly to think otherwise, with so many of them being used. Well, he's at least tried to get his attention, to the point where turning couldn't have been anything but a nuisance to him.

At least that's what it seemed to be.

'You don't have to charge me for the price of two men. We could pretend I'm my brother.'

'Which one?'

'I beg your pardon?'

The conductor looked as if he had been smug. A drain of sand was already being filled from above the obelisk, and it had been pouring from the top of its golden, stone-dunes as the hieroglyphs started being run on.

'Which one of your brothers would that be?'

‘How did you know?’

‘Try not to be hasty, I’ve spoken to your brother quite a lot, don’t try taking me for a beginner in this line of work. Between the two of us, he would tell me something now and then about the likes of you.’

‘So you know.’

‘Enough that I would happen to make the difference between you, another and the other and whoever might try claiming themselves as some kind of imposter.’

‘What imposter would that be?’

It was staring at me now. All of them were. That thing had a piece of its body sticking out. Its legs were no longer shaped like m-shaped daddy longlegs, but seemed to have gained a fat to them which prevented them from moving. As far as he could tell, the creature wouldn’t be able to get pushed back.

What had been sticking out, to put it out of the obelisk from whence it tried pushing from, came some shooting-tied an expanded pitch which looked like some sonar body-bulked machine, with strings attached made out of the same bolted tallish skin it bore. And each string seemed to pull that hard block of body which forced itself into the air.

If that would grow to the point where it would be dragged out there, he knew that he would escape.

The men in the front seats had a chance of pace. As in their face was left some kind of old and harrowing look, which only made it so they gave up. They haven’t been killed and seemed to be too busied by the fact that there wasn’t any way to exceed their expectations.

Less interest could be shown in the well-being of their colleagues in front of them. As he continued, he had to think of what he was supposed to tell.

Would he expose the creature and in turn expose himself as well?

Does he know I’m not one of the brothers?

‘Well, you see, my brother doesn’t know me that well and what I, I. Found it.’

‘What did you find? Another thicket? Another lie? I can tell a liar from a man, and you seem too young to be one.’

There couldn’t be anything even conceived of it, at least not yet. What did the man even want now?

It snapped. Perhaps it was the waiting, or it couldn’t be bothered to wait for everyone to live with it. No one else had had the opportunity to turn, maybe one or two of them managed to lunge forward and save himself but the obelisk from, his prison thrown, as if the choice had been taken and it would fold.

Everyone cracked there, thrown on the ground as they stood and obeyed. Not of some mind formation but because they feared what that thing may do to them.

Paricott only watched in content as that thing came out. Its four legs had become fat, with two of them being covered in the grain of sand which had come from its peculiar prison of sand. All of them lead to a thin body which held that box of fat at the top, which had been strung to the calves of each leg in part.

Where had those finger-holed long arms gone? They were nowhere to be seen. Perhaps from up there? Had those sonar-strings been its arms?

Well, there could only be a way to find out.

‘What are you doing boy? Don’t go near it, I swear, it’s not supposed to break out. This isn’t part of the show.’

And as he approached, he came to know why they all feared it. He was wrong, what he had thought had been wrong. It wasn’t anything but a trick of the mind there. Everything around them felt likely it had been projected into another place. Both of those realities overlapped through some method, through some other, that creature hid it there.

He approached and saw each man in form of plants. After bending down to touch one, he had picked a part. Unable to realize what had happened, in the other world an arm had been ripped apart. But he wasn’t able to move, he couldn’t be hurt by the boy.

It could be excusable. At least, there had been some hope, he’d say to himself, that he would rather try not ripping too many.

‘What’s happening? I can’t turn. Who’s screaming?’

‘It’s the boy, the boy that was trying to cheat his way out of some thicket. He’s torn lord John’s arm off.

Someone needs to stop him before it’s too late.’

Each string worked at it, drawing and pushing onward for their likes wouldn’t stop from that constant commotion of movements.

There was a sudden smile on his face, after coming to the realization that what he had been doing was so wrong, he couldn’t come to control himself. With a push and a clang, and a string and like that, he started grabbing and choking forth, each piece of plant, which ripped easily at that.

No one dared moved, out of some non-explainable mark, until the ones who stood forth suddenly turned, on the whim of an effort, the boy had been stopped.

Would he be cowered like the rest of them? That was uncertain. It couldn't be that he would give that easily in. He had enjoyed himself way too much. All that meanness and the way in which he had expressed himself gave him too much force of will. He had really wanted it.

But those four weak and fat legs suddenly pushed themselves into position. And from the bulk of the top there came the hand which stretched and placed themselves into position. From the side, there push outward a mad concoction like some lever which turned on and on until it stopped itself.

There needed to be some assistance as one weak hand turned on the piston and the other tried itself on the strings. Even those plants which had been placed there, which had become flaccidly awake now came to be together. Now that they were reunited, even with those parts which had been broken, the song had taken full effect.

How could they call themselves men now? It had been a fully-fulfilled exchange. Through some way, they had been brought onto the other side and were made of flesh no longer. Now they weren't plants, not that those were plants to begin with, but some vines, which had wide images strung like films which had recorded the lives those men had been into.

The boy had been thanked for. The conductor himself seemed to have come forward, brushing past him, only to perform the exchange. He had kept a face quite humane and mundane. In their past and strange relationship and trade, these men had been robbed of their lives and memories.

And for what? A few bars of gold.

'Oh, here's for your trouble, boy. I think you've earned it. You know, I think you've done as great of a job keeping them distracted as I have done my work on you as well.'

He wasn't pleased by what he's done. He found himself feeling like some of the lowest kind of trash there could be.

'I didn't mean to do it.'

'I saw you looking, for quite the extended period of time. You didn't say a single word, you haven't even tried to warn them, why?'

'Why are you asking this now? Those men.'

'They're no long there, nor here. The only thing left out of them, is, their memories.'

He found himself staring at the man, in the prairie. No one around them stood there, at least, not the fiend which had been trapped in its obelisk. Only the two of them stood there. The town was still inhabited, if not by stranger, by the wives of all the man who had attempted their show.

And this conductor seemed to be getting ready to leave.

‘So that’s it? You’re going to leave as if nothing happened? What of this town, what of? How could I even explain?’

‘You’ll figure out something, kid. I’ve been trying to work up these men for weeks, so I think I deserve a break for now. If anything, this may be a valuable lesson for you to learn.’

The conductor had already made him was to the small mound which had been made. He looked as if ready to start digging, but he only pushed a piece from the top and it looked like he found what he was looking for.

It wasn’t like anyone else was looking either. It was still too early in the morn’.

Paricott didn’t move. He couldn’t chase the man out of fear that he may end up like them. And that conductor had little interest in anything other than himself getting away. At best, there had been some waving, as he left the boy behind, taking off on a carriage which wasn’t his.

There was anarchy on those mad streets without an end foreseeable to sin. On that long road, there appeared to be a one sided view in which those hooligans threw their stolen goods off the fence. Curled points ended after each spear shot towards the ground.

Many of them had formed some weird, angled rounds of misdirected wounded collar metal-bones which served as the signal of their dying world

‘What are those things trapped inside there?’

Though behind closed bars hid no living men but the remnants of those which had trapped themselves in order to prevent any other life from being taken and mishapen.

It felt like the head had already destroyed half of their means of survival. No longer could they grow crops on that burnt land. And their faces had been changed, as looking at their savage masks had only revealed some disgusting layer which grew itself after it’s been used for its own filthy pleasure.

They hid the fact that behind those masks there was nothing. If one was to remove it, they would find nothing but the hallow entry which lay there untouched. And inside of that open space, there seemed to be another placed mark which stopped itself at the middle, being thick enough as to resemble the insides of a thick ring-worm, if one were to grow one inside the human head.

It looked like that wriggling thing had imprinted itself like amber, shaping some kind of redundancy of woe and anger.

So much so, that inside there could be seen some rubbery bands which had made it so the head could come out of some piece or the likes of some head of a doll would if one were to make such a thing out of flesh. And that served as a reminder for the wicked pact which had been thrown and pushed, mistreated as one was to be, dreadfully away from the coming end.

Fire only threatened it less, for inside that body stood the only thing which kept it alive. It had been the fact that all that emptiness served the remaining soul which had physically manifested itself into some breeding abomination which pumped through a set of lungs which had been conjoined with the inside of the head that got repealed with nothingness before being drawn inside.

Many pumps reeled as they were reminded by the sounds of the fleeing people outside, that if one were to pull that mask off, and the soul would no longer be living. Organs would stop working and none might ever dare speak or be roughened by the agony which would be felt. As clear as it was, there would be no way to get through this discord without the oncoming stress.

As each moment which had been spent inside the body of that cruel and that filthy, unpleasant space, they would know that someone was outside, trying to approach or make it so they might confess of the vile danger their own evil produced. It would be clear that none may be defiled any longer once they would be brought the death.

With each step that body took forward, the soul only acted in repulsion, forcing it to reconsider. And it had been no body, but indeed one of those inverted ring-worms which had stolen the body and as they had. It couldn't even be considered for their likes alone had instilled ever-so much harm on others.

No one outside knew as they only watched from safety.

One child wanted to draw in closer and take what he felt it was his to take. He pulled on the mask, like some creep and froze in his place.

The gap only started pulling like some skin which had been drawn. It felt to the side and revealed the dying soul which had been staring at the child. Slowly, the flabby inverted ring-worm tried, desperately to infest the soul with its own kind of mad inversion, only to have momentarily failed.

It couldn't be looked down upon, not now, of all the vicious times.

It so happened that the child died immediately after, as if from some hearth disturbance or a stroke which had come from the shock. Time had come for joy and some kind of celebration would come after the soul would attempt to make it so it could steal the body of the boy.

Perfidiously unnerved, the soul would shake in revulsion, as it tried so hard to gnaw at the bars. It grew restless with the fact that it had been so weak and that the teeth had crumbled after coming into contact with those wickedly twisting bars.

Flatulence could only bring it closer to the fact that it had been filled with that maddening fright which couldn't have been tried for. Something wrong had gotten in its pucker of a stupor which had been its small decaying brain. Not many options could be tried any longer. Obviously, one last attempt would be for it to try climbing and flinging itself over those high places and onto the other side.

But the hinges of that gate were too high and it couldn't have been attempted. Not with the present men, who would once and again stop from fleeing only to gasp at what had looked like some vile foulery of human-life. Its twist had been unnerving to be looked upon.

Time was pushing, drawing, attempting to bring an end to this anomaly of life itself. None dared any less, none would confess of the vileness which happened there. Most importantly, none cared enough to save this dark creature.

Though the shell and skin may have been protected from the likes of fire, everything else hadn't. An unfulfilled purge with the help of its degenerate urge would defile the likes of this unprotected soul.

And that inverted ring-worm only watched how the soul slowly drew itself inwardly, affected by that infestation, burning from the dire, tirelessly dying in the hellfire.

The rest lays obscure in dust.

What was the dye exactly? One could not even hope to dissect it order to hope to find out anything about the chemical imbalances in its composition. Such a claim would barely come close to scratching the surface. It was an unquestionable mix of tenderness and pain that could be added to the skin. Bones would start moistening, as well as the groundwork around it. There was the leaping effect one could draw as much as he could from the dye only to find out that drinking it left a hole through him. He would feel colored, to the very red or magenta he had basked in.

And that would not be enough to savor the full bluntness it bore. Adjacent to the island where the change had happened, stood the mighty empire of the octopi. They rested there, almost defeated, launching jets of ink against the tall walls which protected the isle. The act of theft taken against their master was unforgivable. It was shameful that they allowed it to happen without putting out a fight. Claiming otherwise would be treachery of the highest kind. 'I shall move now. Hear me 'steps.' A tall pair moved in, closely being submerged in the ground yet whole. They moved like tiny bumps underneath the skin, showing only their tall legs and what joints shook inside of them, bouncing as they were given the appearance of living trebuchets. Constant jolts of power gave the impression that they bore mines inside of them. It was unnecessary to claim there was another floor there beneath them. One living floor which registered everything and replicated it just a few feet away below. That way they would forge their stages and make sure that no movement would be lost, the kind of which made even the stalactites and the stalagmites shake and shatter at the thought. Why would that be? Mainly because there was some kind of drawing fear which was pushing through them, the veins only trying to give as much movement to the register of living. But this ordeal hadn't been the result of preservation; rather, it had been a way to look for the object which had been stolen. Otherwise, it would be completely lost and at the hands of the most decrepit ones down there. Its presence had been felt. Each beat of the living, almost heart-like organ could be felt. But it wasn't alone, as it had acquired the intelligence of a marine biologist. In its tracks there lay just enough to make one feel as if there would be scurry in the half-plants, half-deep sea creatures he had left behind. They would be somewhat completely sorted out inside the walls, growing in ways one could not even fathom that they'd live past the initial inception. Down there, up there, just about everywhere, they managed to produce eggs and fertilize them, even with their wide-spread organs which had been infested with the protective juice the land itself produced. It couldn't be accounted otherwise as anything but a deliquesce of thought. That these half-scum sea-lurches would start spreading their legs and implanting themselves into the replicated seekers. Sooner or later they would either be slowed down or even worse, they'd wake up being completely manipulated and replicated in their mind-controlled phases. And the original directive would only be completely maintained and inserted into a new generation of useless divers. 'We have escaped.' Said the man, who was thinking about his act. No one would sing of his glory or even care if he were to be utterly annihilated. As a matter of fact, he was to be completely pushed over the edge, to the point of never being able to return to his false glory. It was an act of anxiety which drove him forward. He was crawling past living beads and bitter credence's of the malign. Which in themselves grew to make tiny chambers, or spots in which the Lem'Uhrs hid. It was in the instant he had come into contact with them that his fate was partially sealed. With all the false tracks he left behind, this completely sinking organ might've had the change to escape. But there Lem'Uhrs had a special deal of function which wasn't accounted for. They were stragglers which hid inside their heads strange cameras which recorded what happened around them, storing them in the most capricious manner. To them, there would be nothing more than the destiny which they would share with others. In their spherical-chambers, they were eyes, recorders, creators of materials used for the utmost complete digestion. It would only serve as a mighty hopeless thing to breed there a few more creatures with hope of taking them off the chart. With them here he knew he would be found. These creatures freely shared what they had recorded with him, which made him realize that they couldn't be trusted for silence. They kept on the walls with long legs, which held on with the help of almost spiked hairs, that drew in and out, pushing around just about a few motions which dragged on. From here on, he could see the display, of how he had entered and what would he do. But I leaped away, just to avoid getting myself stricken by a giant long-leg which had been thrown against the egg-sack limb which had erupted from inside of me. Their intelligence somewhat provided a threat that couldn't be dealt with. I knew that if I remained there, I could see myself being shattered and broken for my attempts and my desire to escape. And they would figure out eventually that I was the one who planted every living creature behind me in order to thwart their attempts. 'Leave me be, I beg of thee, clear your recordings and I shall find a way to set you free from your hidings.' But their long and hardened bodies only started contorting even farther, pushing out a mass of hairs. That was their natural defense, though it may have rendered their bodies even more immobile, the forest of soft and long blades they produces appeared to be able to cut through everything. Case and point, the one Uhr who picked up the half-bred creature threw it against him, only to see it completely destroyed, pulled inwardly until out of the mass, only a liquid started dripping out. IT couldn't be permitted any longer, this strange change into bacterial promise. He saw moving rows in the pool which drew from it. And it hadn't been because of him; rather, this had been an infection of the hair-disease propagated by him. 'We shall create a life in the recordings and we shall make a piece of you from what you've given us.' 'But I cannot be replicated; do you unfathomable beings of cowardice know what I am?' 'An intruder who bears a wicked ability to fall through the world, pointlessly trying to get through to the sea, only to have known that there's no way back to it down there. You must be dragged back if you ought to rejoin with the rest of your body.' 'So you know of my cause?' At which there hadn't been a given answer. Instead, what they had given them was that strange and strangulatory promise, which was pulled from one of their dug-spots. They hid a bunch of octopi-spies, who hid themselves unkindly in the walls. 'These were supposed to be yours, I presume. Many of which had given their lives to carry on messages back to the empire. What do you suppose might happen if we were to thwart their attempts at rescue? It wouldn't be that hard at all, I presume anyone with the mind and the matter would be able to do it if they tried hard enough. It's only a matter of pushing in fast enough and drawing as many of them in as possible. Now that we have your form, we could set traps and.' 'Stop, I understood where you were attempting to go ever since you opened those yapping things I saw moving. What do you want in exchange for your silence?' 'Underwater grottoes and caverns such as yours, that's all we desire. To know that we'd be safe somewhere in your world without any disturbance. Our was a peaceful existence until they came and I cannot fathom you not being the cause of it, both the human and the organ. Both of you have some acts which would make you irredeemable in the eyes of your betters.' 'And who would those betters be?' The thought could only now be deciphered. As in the realm below the depths, where one had been cursed to the punishment of eve, he fashioned the bodies of the wicked council into an undecipherable amount of bodies which stuck themselves within one another's sides. It wouldn't work; it wouldn't be denied that there were things inside their bodies which propagated their living. But that Yyork could only wait. One day he would return. In the meantime, he passed it while pushing for the farther reaches of the grotto, breaking its shell above him apart, only to see that he was nowhere. Surrounded by a nothingness in which his muck dripped, he had realized that he wasn't trapped but stranded. Stranded and beyond any means of floating or moving away. His company had been destroyed; the crystals shattered and the rest of the bodies had been pushed off his bounds. Now, there would be nothing going on for him any longer, but that strange way and deliquesce as he was looked down upon. By whom if not by the mad spirits which gathered from around the rims of the ether? He wasn't surrounded by any kind of space but a made blue, of some deep aquatic blue, which served as something for him to be taunted over as they spoke. 'Have you had enough of the silence yet? Do you understand or have you come to know that we're not truly dead? Of course you wouldn't be able to fully destroy us. We, who have served as the council of evil wretches and malignant physical embraces would be nigh-immortal.' Ever seeing, they finally showed up, part spectral, but their bodies started putting themselves together at their tops. In an immediate approach, they could be looked upon as some kind of body misalign junction which drew all of them closer to one another in order to function. Each of them took a piece of scrab, or some piece of glass which encompassed the other one around them. In as strange as a fact as it had been, there wouldn't be any shame for what they'd feel. Angst far surpassed their woe. In as much as a few strangling woes, they found themselves watching and peering, snatching and lurking inside their own disregarded motions. In a few more moments they started eating at one another as the one head came forth, the main reposition which had suddenly merged all of them as some floating piece which held their necks as tubes. In as much as it could be forgiven, they were trying to pick up a few of the flying limbs which crossed themselves like blades, spinning around as they would push away the ghosts. One beak only showed a few signs of inter-locked eye-heads, which bore their stalkish mouth out then. This speech-contraction, golden, small, bore a few half-rings every five inches in both directions. From the other side, in this chaos of deformed faces, in which one could even see a half-grown full body which ought to have been displaced from some other dead-world, there stood the skull of glass. And it spoke, again, alas. "You have arrived at an opportune time." The diacraphone spoke for them. It had been highly accustomed to the dishelmed surroundings which were there. It was time though, to see it for what it would be worth. Lighted candles appeared in each of the ghost's hands. It could not even be distinguished from what was worth no longer. Strangers they may be, it would take some time until their sequence of interlocked lights would draw back to a known level, or even an acceptable one. But each of them used the entry to push on at least some imitation of what a night with starry wonder ought to look like as their surroundings darkened for the first time in decades. "There haven't been many of you who managed to turn the court into a supreme cluster such as this. Were you prostaticized when you began bastardising us and our hope? It's hopeless to think now, just what would go wrong if we were to take a piece of you and push it forth." Likely, as they looked around, it had been decided here and there; just about anywhere one could look that it would be disgraceful for the highest bidder. No one sneered as their own apparitions started coming around them. To be groomed and pushed through, bitter as no remorse be felt was rather uncouth for many. Yet they sneered no longer and finally pushed themselves forward. "We want you to know that there are so many things wrong going into the world because of you." "The stability of the isles had been thoroughly affected by your sudden insurgence and that of your servants. And we supposed you're to be held accountable for everything, if that's the case." "It cannot be permitted for you to go there any longer and goad the masses with the filandery of mistrust. Even now, we are aware of your plans, and know that you shall do you best to proceed with them, even if it means bastardising the images of men we have sworn to keep away from this place." And it was time, for the first session they had managed to get a hold on him, to make him talk. It would be rather interesting, the way in which neither of them could push themselves as fast as two thinner layers before seeing the muck showing signs that it would rise again. It was just unforgivable, as this damned creature dared threaten them again and again. How much would it attempt pushing itself to the point where they could not accept it any longer? "You shall speak or we shall drain you away until your carcass shall be revitalized in the weakest possible form. It is your choice." Rising from the pollution it had created, Yyork began speaking with its many bubbles and splashes, which went as far as to push through a few signs of speech. What else could be done in order to avoid this? If it weren't for the kind of laughter which was displayed there, one could not even account for the dread they felt by any means. It wasn't going to go any faster than this, they'd be aware. But one splash admits many seemed to resonate with a few of them just then. It made no difference now trying to portray what he seemed to be doing. It seemed like the various bubbles didn't form a language facilitated by their various pops, but out of the sound their produces, which had been stored from inside the rocks. In other words, Yyork managed to conjure a few words from another plane of existence. From the previous men who had been judged and from the creatures which had been denied any kind of idea of vengeance as they were forced to flee into terror. Dread would not be accounted for any longer and it said. 'I've been judged for the morally wrong doings of a man, but I am no man.' 'What is this mockery? This voice doesn't belong here? Fleeing cowardice, you think you will be allowed to summon some voices from the past?' 'Bear me a sharper sting and I shall return to haunt the one who killed me.' 'Prison, prison, let me be in it. I have a cage I brought my brain in. Look at it; don't you like the brain birds?' Awakened, as if from a distant module for memories, they remembered it; a few birds which had been completely made out of brain mass flew around the strange aquarium he had been brought in. It had been such a mess, that the water had been completely drained and pushed out. 'Do you remember him? I seem to have a vague recollection to it. Even now, I seem to be set on that Pyn'Hsthar. It was by his own hand that he died, you know?' 'We are all aware of it, I believe our arrangement to get his bird brought them still in our power. We own them still, mind you not of the consequences that are overly pushed past the coins.' Better than the groins they had ripped from one. 'Acheeeeeeee, Achleeeeeeeeeee, achleeeeeeeeeee.' Came another shout from a series of eight of them. All of them looked surprised just how terrible they sounded. How dreadful and unnerving even they had been made to feel. So many of their failures resulted in accidentally torturing the victims which were brought there, all of which stood here as a reminder of what ought to be done for the future cases. 'Just to be certain, we'll replace this hole and abandon it entire.' 'It's settled already.' 'Do we have to? I cannot help it but be actually pleased by this. I enjoy the sounds I hear, and I cannot even help but see myself in all of those who suffered at our judgment or at the lack of judgment we have shown them to.' Gates would not be open for as long as their peering gazes stilled. There was a wave of bleakness then which appeared to hit them in full force. No one had been spared by this complete disillusion, their emotions being turned to vein. 'Why, I feel as if something changed.' 'Unchanged for years, these corners we've been pushing ourselves into have never been touched by anyone in such a manner.' 'Is it him?' 'It cannot be. Everything he's done so far has been judged and been allowed by ourselves. Do not confuse something like this with his inception. He's merely being allowed to act as he pleases inside our own pieces of the corner.' Distrust reigned nonetheless. As soon as the specters that were there disappeared from sight, and the color of blue suddenly desiderated itself, there was nothing. They floated in a malign essence which kept splashing against their bodies, unable to define it properly. Was it a wave, or a just a strike of dark powder, it was unexplainable, but it felt darkly harrowing, to the point where neither of them could decide what ought to be done about it now. 'Let it be known that we have decided to return to you in order to properly judge you for the destroyed commitments you have broken against the so-called aquatic servants you wrought under your command.' Now they had approached, though their ghastly side seemed to have shattered and had been lost, they still bore their enormous head forth, the parts of which were still active by whatever means possible. Each thought solemnly as they began going through the motions. Each obscure commotion would do well as to pay the needed attention to his broken head. His skull lay crisp and non-erect in the manner. To falter would've meant a thing. Wings might've been broken, stolen and misspoken. But they had brought their incessant crevices so wide that they began pushing ahead their livid defies, long and portable, there near stacked bag-like limbs began accessing the various fluids which surrounded them, keeping them at bay. Various acids made sure that the muck would be constantly purified just so it would be much easier to completely defy their presence. From one to another, they looked and communicated at least something close to an undesirable command. Destroy him, now, cull him down, and let no soul return. But what if we cannot? We will only show weakness that way and we shall only get devoured in that case. It's weak; this fiend cannot even stand alone to be judged. It should be completely sent off to another plane. We cannot keep him here and deal with this new plague. I do not think he's the reason for this bleakness which just appeared. I would say that this is nothing but another assault from above. Then where would he be sent? This creature has shown signs that it cannot be contained by normal means. Trap it then, it needs to be trapped for its own good and its own admission. Otherwise we shall only be the slaves of it, acting like heathens for someone we cannot deal with. He is no god; this being serves only as the epiphany of mold and corruption. It should be settled here and now. Let the judgment be adorned until we deal with it, fool. Can't you see that we stand at risk of being completely changed? That would perhaps be the worst kind of imprisonment one could self-sufficiently throw himself into. We cannot hold to fight this corruption. They could all see now, the various cubes forming then. Much wider, bigger, and less complete, they appeared to form crystal which emitted such a dark and brittle thing that they almost seemed to be the bones of some forgotten centripetal convex triangular mold anomaly. It spread through the muck as well, even if this Yyork suddenly pushed itself away. No in a physical or mobile manner, but it appeared to have stretched the confines of the cave he had been put in until he was beyond their reach. 'It's not a result of your containment nor is it yours. This bleakness appears to be something beyond our comprehension, and needs not be ignored.' 'You shall be sent into a prison made of yourself.' Cages bars, even the long distanced warden appeared to be Yyork, in a replica, an embodiment lost, so vaguely set that he wouldn't understand. Barely disturbed by it, he seemed to be communicating with the distant fungi which inherited all of them. No word and nothing appeared to communicate to him any of the information needed to know what lay outside the confines in which he had been forced into. He was struck, unevenly by the various needs he felt. But the council, the judges would have it worse. As they remade the halls, they saw the thing which had poured itself into it as something which would stay, which would remain and never leave. Arrogance would make one believe that there was a thorough need for suffering. It was only by its own admission that there was a way in. Horned and scolding, molding and creeping set in thawed emotion, there came the fiend, which crawled inside the cage. It bore a large hairy back from which there came the faces underneath each segment of giant horn-tube blade. And each of them spoke of something as the prolonged body revealed no main head, only a disabled pair of necks. This one had been called Shyl. Fiend of bedraggled fiends, boredom within a pair of destroyed antlers, mad as a fatherless halter of the malign. What he bore was a pair of children which weren't his, in a bad. All of which were anything but human. Long bodies, torn, and even opening from the in-born descendants they produced, these almost faceless dictators ordered upon one another as they awaited to be thrown out. It would be dangerous to look down upon them. Otherwise, one could easily let his guard down realizing that there wouldn't be any way to escape from their parasitical births. To say the least, the feast of various worming feasts would begin. 'I've brought you something, oh lost master. Must I not give you what you ought to desire most? Is this not agony worth sharing?' He presented them, in a delicious way. As his bag turned outside, there came the sudden contemplation, followed by pure damnation of any morality which may be. Shyl had been afflicted by the malign effects which came from Agamemnon, which had scoured the universe. He had swam through the flood and appeared to have caught some of the corrosion on his body. On top of that, he was afflicted by the bleakness which turned his organs into sad-looking living infantile things. Theirs was a strange approach. No one would dare push themselves past what had been their disgraceful act. I know you may not desire to speak to me, Yyork but standing so close to you made me realize that some of your spores had already implanted themselves inside my mind. Dubious as to what means, I believe I may serve as an altar, a way to send someone to join even if it's for a shorter time. You see, I'm only partially dead and a part of me is out there, going by the sea on a single wooden ship with no direction. Yet I am known to you and they're known to me. Eventually I am to be found by one of the various ones who follow you and when that happens, I shall grab him, place his ever-expanding head on my chest and cut him in half. 'Once the sacrifice will be done, he will appear here, struck on my chest, only for a few moments so he might carry a message of your choosing.' To which he bent, Shyl kneeled and as he promised, the body of an octopi appeared on his chest, long exposed, under some distress. Whatever they produced in terms of speech could be anything but identified. As a matter of fact, there wasn't even any remotely close idea as to what they were talking. Expressing even some contemplation and some disregard, I looked away, in shame and a wonder. What might happen if I were to stay? It was a mere explanation for the luck of trust which surrounded me. Too many Yorks seemed to bother me with their presence. And way too many of them appeared to maintain at least a hindrance of its original mind. Turning would be the best attention, the direction being set. My body started releasing the head and the hair, which would slowly drag me away like a sponge or swarm of concubine sea-stars which tried getting away from a predator of the sea. Likely, I would be allowed, as the gates hadn't closed and I was out. Behind I could see the various pieces and various specimens gather in white, in puffs as they closed now. I could not even swallow, realizing how close it had been, those spores may have entered me, and they would die this far without contact from their master. Protected by a lay of queratinachl, which poured inside my every crevice from the large hairs, I was finally clean. Shyl had only taken the appearance of a foaming blotch of yellow which stood there, in wait for the expulsion. Whatever intrusive specimen may have come into contact with him, now it had been completely repelled and pushed away; disgracefully so as he attained a decisive change which forced him to behave. With a closely attained new pair of legs, he started dragging himself away. He had lied about the claims of that deadly succor. Out there, he had collected the bodies of just enough of those easily attainable ink-makers that he had crafted a few limbs of his own. As the success prolonged, it would not take long until he'd do it as well. But to say the least, these creatures as they might have dealt with their trades and their strange happenings did not detract from the doings of the island. 'There is still hope yet.' An important person spoke. Mayor, he may be, caught by only the least of shows of arrogance, caught Mark staring. They have kept their discussion private, so that his brother and William quickly left afterwards. What was to be decided now, seemed to only lie between them anyhow? 'But William had already told you that we cannot expand so quickly. If we were to bring half a dozen more, most of them would be plainly disappointed, you know that. If the conditions aren't well enough to justify them moving in, your act of charity will be useless. These are workers after all, families and much worse than that, they are high-class people.' 'Bring in the poor then, we'll promise them new lives, places to work and food.' 'How would you provide it then, mayor? This is office is well pleasing for the eye, but I don't suppose you're anything but a disposable clerk if anything else. You don't have the funds needed to cover up for them.' 'I do not need them anyway, perhaps one day you'll understand it, though I doubt a sleazy man like you would know of anything even remotely close to decency.’ ‘Know thee well before know myself, mayor. I cannot stress enough that this will come down running on your back. The burden is only yours to carry, not ours. We’re only the middlemen.’ ‘As always, where there’s a need for responsibility to be taken, you’d shy away from it. I know your kind; I know what you’re like. Don’t act as if you’re concerned by the well doing of the people. Drop the theatrics, I know you’ll accept.’ ‘Well I never intended to decline. I know what you’re thinking now. It may not seem the person I should be dealing with in trades, but hear my concern and take it kindly as you may.’ Marques looked around for just about anything he could bring up, the files in his stack which may have a slither of the financial situation of the city, some plain marks left in by the rubbing of money marks as they might leave their imprint on the desk. Even some coins he forgot about. None, it was all to clean for them to be trusted. That he knew well. ‘William and my brother should return in only a few hours and by the time they’ll return, you’ll see. I think you’ll see that there’s no way out. I cannot bother myself with thinking of a way their lives might be improved but.’ ‘What do you mean by no way out?’ ‘Mayor, you didn’t know? Have they not told you? The journey from island to island is permanent, we’ll ship them then we’ll leave. And we won’t return for at least a few months that I could think off.’ ‘What nonsense are you talking about? Of course you will, this is the beginning of a trade business, our deal and transactions are only on the verge of going on.’ ‘If you say so, but I think that for a long enough time we should keep a distance, that’s all. For our own safety and not only for that alone, we need to take care of our own, nothing more. You know that we’re not implicitly trying to harm you or your business. It’s only that we cannot help ourselves but look away if bad things happen all of the sudden, with or without our attention or because of us. Reason would dictate that we shouldn’t put too much thought into a business which is plainly doomed to fail. And this miserable lot you call a town, I cannot even spare myself as much a single.’ A bird came in the window. What a strange thing. It was domes and filled with wooden bars which kept its crystal wings from falling off. In a way it looked like it had been a set of the piece from the room. ‘Just what are you intending to do with the people we’re bringing in?’ ‘That’s none of your concern, Mark. The only thing you should care about is.’ The bird again.

Words of evil magnitude

It was by the touch of Ivanoe, that he came back. From that strapping segment which went down like a centipede with many tiny legs and flat heads which pushed towards the other directions, he finally sat himself down near his friend. They had encompassed everything underneath them with their long-legs, which pushed even farther than their bodies could possibly hope to get. As fatness increased in them, many flying single blots of had, almost desaturatedly-looking yellow pushed on their tiny spread of flight-definers. Legged by the overly enlarged heads, they appeared to hide inside of them a great amount of store wings. All of them usually falling beneath them like spread rigs. Uncertainty touched the latter. As they would start adapting to the earthly-kind of ticks, drowning not from anywhere else but from the air, going through the affliction of the mind which had conspired to make them get back to their kind. Mostly, it was a few lustful twists created from within a monochromatic pitch which drew in color. It replaced the sunless day in the ever-present stop of the creature which covered the continent. ‘I’ve lived a good life, haven't I?' Asked Ivanhoe, who spared no thought and no wonder at his friend, Roscowaff, who stared at what were once blushing forests and undeniably beautiful houses. His family should've been there. In one of the regions which had been completely filled with it. But that had been a long time ago, and he could not bother to bring himself back to action. To his surprised reaction, he almost gave in. 'Have I been brought back only to be mocked? You know I have no home any longer, I can see it with my very eyes. It may be amusing to you, but I feel hollow on the inside. No one will try to make my life better here.' 'Let's go for a walk, Roscowaff.' 'And end up talking to you again? Can't you see that I'm sad and depressed? I lost too much to get back in.' 'But you haven't even seen the candle. It shines even now, ever since the day we brought it back. I lost a lot as well, but I don't think you're just as interested to hear about me. After all, I would've figured you out unworthy of a return.' 'So now you've brought me back to see a candle?' 'And the Dead Sea, which spilled on the mainland. You should've been here to meet our guests, they didn't come here from the sea but they helped me get a great spot during the witnessing of the waves.' My mind and eyes worked in unison as the reminder came. My heavy arms only started to touch over the rims of the projected earth. I looked down upon as a man would upon a pool of dirt. Before my fingers went through, I came to know that I felt nothing over the implied destruction. Even though I didn't feel it there, I have done something much worse. Perhaps it was my sullen lack of appreciation or it was by mere chance that I had managed to write down a few mutterings which resulted in the less malign, a destiny which made me feel a battering of illness. My feverish fingers started pushing in. I saw the words appear in my mind as if a summoning gate was laid upon my very feet. And I only had to make the key and twist it in. The words I would write appeared with a solemn power. A manifestation turned itself, spreading through the cracks of the gate beneath me, like a pile of gelatinous pair of carps, which had been turned inside out to reveal as much of the time they had spent out in the sun. Not only had there been dead meat in that contorted pile, but I could see that it formed itself into a cage around me. Suddenly, it turned back into metal and I felt trapped. 'I hadn't meant to write that down.' But entrapped could only be the only thing which went through my mind. The predecessor stood behind him. I saw his long tail push through the railing, leaving enough for me to think about what I've done. Luckily, this was only a jest, he spoke. 'Bend the bars; you know that I'm only trying to play with your innards. It's a way of our kin.' It communicated from within, inches from the prosthetic remark which he had desperately tried to shake off. Had that room always been that wide? No walls could lie if the manifestation of smoke could crackle forth. He was forced to sit and take as much of it in. Drawing near just enough to form a pair of numbing scowls, he had been ported back to the where he stood. His friend looked at him as if he misunderstood something, and had suckled to some deep inception of his thoughts. 'I wish I knew why I came here. Perhaps I might've understood so many things, but I can only look for a way out so I may start a new life, that's why I brought you back, my dear friend. I'm in deep trouble. The villain I had been met by came over me and forced some pathetic knowledge and disgust, for which I may never be able to get away from. I distrust the living, even you, my old acquaintance. He forced me to write things, telling me they wouldn't happen. But I had only done what he had wanted. Like some fool being forced to do as he is pleased. No one could ever dare look at me as a man; they're avoiding my gazes, regardless how hard I'm trying to prove them wrong?' 'What did you write then?' 'On his dark table, where the image of a right world was, in the jest and during our laughter when I thought I had been brought up, I wrote humanity. I wrote slavery, the world be theirs, there would be no heirs, no fertile beings, no creatures of our own. Primitive apparel, tools broken, crippled as a default, left to rot and be lost and to evolve ten years after we're dead.' 'But I haven't changed.' Roscowaff couldn't feel anything going by him. He looked and felt similarly as before. As a rule of thumb, one could rub his whole body to find out if something came out of him or returned. 'Perhaps I've taken you too fiercely, look at your chest.' Wounds lay there, a lot of them, all plain to see, battered, strapped with a flattery unlike any other. He had chopped a few marks from which the four anchored, deep rat-heavy bludgeons occupied the pieces he had cut. And they showed signs of the invertebrate protrusion which almost came to force itself to blossom. It would be dangerous if they shot behind of him as well. Not only could he not bother trying to fight the urges which had encompassed him, but the dread fell within his touch. He reeked of disgust and repulsion. Not a single touch could be justified, as Ivanoe leaned in to try so much harder. Unlike his dexterous hands, he tried living off the plain of walls, pushing through to eat as much as he might be able to. They showed the least meaningful signs of compassion as soon as they were touched and writhed as soon as heat came about. 'I could not force myself to kill them. You know I like animals.' 'They're bad, really bad; I can feel them pushing the others inside of me. I think I'm full of them.' 'At least you're not dead. And maybe I have been a bit too late in killing you. It's difficult you know? Trying to get you back to life when you keep pushing back and then in, like a straddling boat. This isn't working for me that well. The role of one who has to drawn you back in from the transitional phase, I mean, look at yourself. This isn't who you are.' He almost saw him depart. Somehow he forgot to mention that they would be theirs as soon as they changed. But this changed hadn't been unprovoked. He didn't go into detail at all. No, in another dimension they had been the norm. Lookalikes, akin to us, with many rat-fat pestilences pushing out of us. And their long stalk-beans would push from the back only a few inches in the back where they would connect to the joints of the arms, the knees and even a piece of the line. The poor afflicted souls were forced to become like them. Just as I have forced the primates to become men, they were the next to follow. I refused to join their vile plans, out of fear that the other men might not like what I've done. So many awful means of touching still keep me awake. It was the way through which their already-forming detainment grooves communicated to him. An archaic pulsing detainment, of what this life had become. I couldn't shake my eyes enough to look at what took over our crafted sinks, and the top of Ming, our dynasties and our deserts, the jungles and the water shoves. Everything which had once been classified as natural and unnatural came to and end, until they became part of the mega-groove which sparked on the misunderstood. No more could I spare myself of looking ahead. We were met by the party of the other survivors. So far no one has been aware of the fading after effects which took them in their world in order to use them as slaves for their Encephalitic burial-constructions. For it was in the halls of the decease that the written words where at their mightiest. And each time they dug deeper than and as deep as they would, they would find the destined olfactory trap where all the bodies of their limbs and their rotting imps rested. For within them there lay such an obscure mystical might that they could defile reality as it were. 'We must make it one way or another, the anarchy-brothers. Only the two of them will know how to break the cycle of the growing grooves. If we may not, I'm afraid our planet will be torn apart.' He didn't even know. This secluded men had no intention of even peering at him, unable to decide whether or not he would be comforted by any insatiate need for the knowledge. If only he knew. The destination changed. The eight of them walked unscathed. Mostly, those who had invaded their world were naturally unaffected, unless stirred. For which reason everyone had been breathed in the sweat of the orlichriahic growth of many tendrils which went above them. 'Don't worry, Roscoe, I've taken the liberty to take a bottle with me. They shouldn't feel you until you make contact with the ground.' 'Why is that?' 'Well, you see, they're.' Everyone looked to the side. An opening from the very mound of dirt came. Like a flat competent barred elevator, it came just in time for them to go in. 'Has this been planned before?' 'I wouldn't see the reason for it. Why, I think it would be rather cruel to look at it from any other angle. But let's not spend too much babbling about it. I think we're waited.' Roscowaff could barely take his eyes from the placed. What had become of this, if not a disgrace? The field lit by a light so obscure, one might think that the hard jousting ball around the earth might've been the wink of a goddess, seemed to bother his sadness no more. I felt amused, bemused, by the fact that they had visited him, of all the people as we made our way towards the elevator. He didn't see or sense them in a direct manner. But his brain had been replaced with a much bigger, growing one. That had the displeasure of self-inflicting damage as it could not function properly any longer. Yet another peril had come from this exposure. As it happened to them to behold, they came out of nowhere and brought dominion over the world as well. There were seventeen lords who basked into the glorious stone of the well of Pth'Irn. The lord of wonder who appeared in his garneted fashion vests, which carried along his strange fingerless nests planted on his back. As they started pushing around and twisting, rotting his body to a degree of unearthly beggar-skins he had collected upon the ripening of life, he had crafted himself another body in which he lay. His utmost unclear wonder was whether or not one could achieve immortality not through exchange but through his fashionable statuettes made out of skin, delightfully placed in his mad gallery of tinder-brought, brain-wrought halls. In them, he collected, this demented foul thing, an insulation of wounds, within which he placed the rest of the bodies he had taken. Their skins were useful and demented. At night they would speak, unattended over the fact that no one would pay any attention to him. Most of the lords appeared to share, willingly an ignorance which disturbed him in his highest regard. It could not be called into question, whether or not he brought his arms forth. It sneered at him, that one body. Speaking of a tongue of greed. 'Help me, my lord; I have sold my family into slavery to share a cup of mead. May I not be given something in return from my wrong doing?' 'Vile creature, you have done something as impetuous as to ask me of the most evil kinds which are alive. You shall suffer for daring to insult me in such a way, wretch.' Chehrukan, as he wondered, for the first time, to bolster his thought, he came and pointed in his eyes, drawing everything out. From him, there was nothing which remained, only the dreadful images left by the Danes. As, inside, there had laid the marks of whips and canes and battering hits from their weapons and stinging whims. This one had been punished again. From atop of his plunge, he had been thrown about into the darkest of the pits. Following through the thickets of complete vampiristic delights, he found them dwelling on his body even with him in sight. Ever since then, he stroke a deal with them, bring them whatever had been left after he was done with them. And it came in at utmost advancing manner of bitter thrusting and nightly hashing, in which he bore, a sack of beggars, thieves who joined their ranks and other petty criminals to whom his delight had give him the only kind of expression he needed. It would be pleasant otherwise, to even consider going through each of his steps and noticing just what he got. They were deceived only momentarily then, for he had dragged their kind as well, only to pull them from inside their strange dishelmed sides. As Chehrukan came to his senses at last, he took his spoils and went away, in his gallery, to which he displayed only the utmost unfashionable of creations, the kind of which none may wander at. He was joined by lord Kikrikiesh, who torn his head in a bitter storm, to which from it there grew only the bitter remnants of the broken years. For he alone, was defined by those wrought things which made him lost his mind. Desperately he had looked, in the most obscure of places, in the cities, in the mazes and even into the abyss. Kikrikiesh, the lord benign, looked into the false paradise, only to be met by the vile decrepit spawns of the siren. Bred into existence by the grand beasts, the honored fiends, who had made themselves, be held up high, in their stone-ford citadels, where no one might look to abide. For their destinies looked forth, unnerved by the lost. The souls of sired and of fish, who died in the centuries of sailor and their hook binders appeared on top of the spawns. And those sea-creatures, controlled and completely saturated by their constructs of unearthly gowns came out of their caverns to great the lord in his obscure home. Deceived by nothing else, in the matter, brought to the one which may falter, they opened themselves upon the plain and revealed their mantra which spoiled the land. 'I see that you still bear bad thought to our world. But why have you come here, in the ground chosen by the land-dwellers? If not for yourselves, I would adjourn the like of breaking habits and I would've crushed you just like my brothers had, bringing nothing but dread to your depths abound.' 'Fear us not, lord, we bear to ill-fruit with you. Instead, we're only trying to commute with what we've lost. This is only a ritual which might serve as a reminder that we haven't given up to your homes and our traditions even if the invaders came forth and forced us be.' 'But this land is not yours.' His shroud contained only a few marks, which were carried by his horse. The shoes it wore were not of metal but fashioned of the lord's eyes, his fingers and the flies which followed, the few organs he had to spare and even a piece of his spine was there. And he had given up on quite a few, leaving to himself only the bitter shell which held a heart which would not tell of any tale. Only the living could look at him with no despair, only to reveal that he was the true lord of wander. Unlike his fake predecessor which had been a sick impersonator, this one inspired others to look and see, and think why it 'be that he was followed at last. In his mind, of many perils, he could not stray away from the pestilence, at the girth. Words would not comply, the needs need not abide, for a much distressed alacrity came. 'I see that you need something out of them. So be it, I give you this egg, so it may bear one thousand of your kin as long as you have your way with it.' With a sheer sneer, they mightily exchanged, they wrought themselves a fashionable curse, the exchange of which made them ask one another of the obtuse maladies. 'Will you exchange a few children of the Hissiiis? For us? We'll give you just enough, perhaps we'll trade you.' 'Enough of this, I haven't come here for small talk. Know that my time is coming to a stop, and one day I shall be brought to my knees and be filled with ashen-wax, melting by the lights and mass of light which shall fill my body with delight. And I shall be seen as a relic of a past, not as a lord. As it cannot be avoided, I only desire to know, where my missing years are?' He felt like this blunder would've made him stronger, as he was unable to think of the disgusting state in which the brought themselves to him, he only forced himself to know and look. Despite the fact that he was shook with a cold, which make his body get brought forth to them, he got no satisfaction from their answer as it faded. 'We do not know where your years are. As a matter of fact, we do not know you, stranger. Who might you be?' 'But we have met and your kind has worshipped me before.' 'Leave us be and never pay any heed for what we've done. You're but a strange infiltrator, who has brought us nothing but pain.' They turned on me and never came to even spare a second more. Before one could think again of the matter, he would not even be delighted to find out about the agony the drones had come to bring about them. And he could only think of Hystrioth, the one who bore the entry to the world of Chstroth, his mightiest rival, brought to the knees, as the mightiest of wonders came to fill in the empty heels inside the lands. Surrounded by a few isles, stood the great obscured nature of Chstroth, who made his way into the plain of Cashaloth, from the distance in the eves of wonder, where realities only spread as soon as the thunder stroke the land. His servants, or slaves, his rounded warriors stood height. Now seen for what they were, eight foot high, standing in the air. Despite their sight, and eight creeping, floating legs which weren't, naturally attached to the rest of their bodies, they would plant only one long filthy mount generated from inside their gown of tessellated blue-energy, going around their belts which anchored the only pieces of body which still stood attached to them. They were in this reality but weren't here at the same time. In some strange way, they were both there and here, working on their ships and their strange planetary hips. Of each other's light, to each of their delights, it could not be told, they would not fold what they brought with them. As their long appendages shot into the air, working on various screens which rounded themselves in a giant cylinder, they would be able to completely gain control to the planetary axis of their core. And for the matter at last, they weren't there to hasten or to waste any time. Instead, they were merely in there, somewhere lost in-between the worlds, in spaces where no one could find them as as they might be born out. From one screen one of these servants could turn a piece of their moons inwardly, crushing a few of the stones and forming statues of those who had been worn. To pieces and to the stale, one could not be brought to knowledge again. Many of them had taken to the kind of librarians who only stood about and wasted time deranged and crested as the most perfidious delights. In their minds they were bringing only the purest lights into the worth. But their overlord rested in his cage, the giant cavern, caught by the flint and steel, the fights which came, erupted to no end. 'If only I could wait them out, perhaps one day one of my servants shall come and find me.' He spoke, and from his many deranged citadels, many of which stood like giant primitive blocks, spread into deserts and locks of steel and flintier. Burning to cinder came the rocks. They were constantly driving destruction on his lands, with no consideration for him or what he had been doing. Pure agony and dismissal came to him then, as he would not walk again, this cripple overlord, who locked himself in the most absurd manners. For, he had been another lord, one who bought himself another world. And now and then when one of the others came, they would bring each other closer to him as well. Unable to define the light, the myths of his deceiver and what he lost, to one specifically, his appointment came. As he would want to make it through this reality and reach him in the end, otherwise, he could not possibly escape his fate, to die ever after knowing that he had lost his years to some dame. Lyishia had been the lord of the broken hearts, even thought that was the last thing he wanted to be met by, the one who held it on her side, breaker of promises, flaunty of woe. She was shallow and permitted only the few admirers to come to her. Only those who were strong and mighty and obscured by the nature of beauty could be gotten. Within her reach, his sorrow may never be forgotten but attained. He couldn't help it regardless of what happened, again and again, the memories would not return again. 'Delightful Lyishia, make my bidding and let me know. I wish only to know of you and of your deep and dark sorrow.' It was pleasant, knowing he would be listened after all, even by her, of all. But the lord of seven dead children and one putrid dog returned just in time to show himself where he'd be could be seen returning to that plane where he lacked the courage to make himself be seen again. It was likely that he was unashamed of the various holding cells in which they were. To be pronounced at least, prior to his defamation had been the fact that once he started in the nerving rack, in the deposited grave, he would see them later rise again. And from their graves, they would sing, free us father, land us what we want. It would be most obvious that their dog would bark, it just might be that neither of them would see an end. As strange as it sounded, the conflicting account which spoke of the imprisonment they shared, it had been clean but thoroughly decided that they wouldn't be able to look to their sides. It would be undesirable, whether livelihood would be permitted. In the strange state of being, something of them had been lost. A strange naivety, the eyes of children being replaced with those of older being trapped between the realms, but the hound it wouldn't matter. It would bark and choose the path of chewing through the gutter. By chains they stood, dangling like birds, beneath the secret long wells underneath each of the various strange telling of the gorgon-mounds. It felt petrifying standing there. With each blow of the led, hopelessly in awe, they would wait for any kid of witness that could spare himself. 'Look at me; can't you see what I have made out of myself? Father, I've worked through the bars. I've grown stronger, I'm sharper and I have made it so you will take me back. Ignore my brothers and release me alone, so I may walk like another lord. So I might join you.' 'Silence!' The voice of Hyumndliydñ came. And they all stopped from the tracks of their remains. It could not be perceived that they would be listened at all. They mere tried outdoing one another in short attempts of pushing each other off their tracks, just so any kind of exit would be established. 'But I desire.' 'It doesn't matter what you desire, as your presence here is the only thing which keeps me alive. Even if the mutt were to completely get destroyed, I would be smashed and get thrown by the other lords. Outside my realm, they cannot suffer me. And If I were to lose my title, they would not stop bickering until anything I've ever claimed to have made will have been ripped out again.' They were lowered then by the chain mechanism. Underneath them they could see his underlings, those horners. Petty and weakly bodied, their features were scrawny and seemed to drag into the fatness of the back. Soon they had observed how wickedly peculiarly they paced, leaving behind them flaps which pushed themselves to the sides. Sometimes they ripped each other and started snarling, rubbing and pushing onward. To their strange names there was only the strangest of words which might be bred. It came from their backs, pushing on again. And from it, the various stings which lapsed and grasped, turned upon one another, freed at last. In taws' tree there lay the agony of a short-fuse. Thing which ever threatened them to be. It would be impossible to care of them, for as long as one remained there, one would know of the throng of spades and the blockades. 'We're not ready to bring them back to life. Hold them up there and make sure they won't make any other noise, I shall bear my wrath upon all of you, do you understand?' 'We shall do it, master, worry not, word if nothing but a thorough command to be settled with.' And no more they waited until they had dissected even the last of the thorough fate. It was agonizing to look back and realized what they've created. This behemoth of a wheel turned on just enough chains to create an ever-reaching motion of crippling paddles on the side. The undergrounded warfare had been started by such strange machines which didn't give in anything but their agonizing sounds. With each strike of the paddle, the water pushed on, crushing in the stone. And more of them would be brought forth until there'd be nothing reaching around. Various molders would fall, as avalanche of stone which brought fear as it would disarm the strangers from ever trying to produce the wheedling seeds that had to grow. Under the bedrock and the various expanses, there was the consideration that they were killing the in-life which hid itself inside stone. Not only had that been a chance, but the danger which had been produced there only produced their wicked wonderings which went too far. One would sting himself unruly, looking for a way within. 'I need to bash a rock and see.' And within it he would fine the Croton-reptiles of the Umbrage Amber, abandoned from an ancient war where sentence did not exist. And from them, attached, mounted guns almost rose, stylishly stopped, until the wretch had walked off out of its range. But as it prepared to shoot as much as a single spinning blade, it stopped out of the fact that it couldn't work like that. Painful though it may be, the agony of drawing onward was that they couldn't even defend themselves. Watching closely, one would have to say, they shot only lashes of water which crept as much as they may. But from them, there was the wonder, that no one may know the wiser. That waiting would resolve their problem by itself. As soon as it started moaning and throwing and curling in its ball, this thing drew inwardly and expelled its guts immediately before it would be known of expected to show what had happened to it. 'It's bile of guts attached to some kind of canon I see. Do you suppose he would get mad if we took it for ourselves?' 'We found it; after all, it should be ours!' It was settled then. They would repurpose it and use it for themselves. Without a single doubt, one could not even be the sole decider of what should be theirs, or what should be taken. It was unnerving and insufferable, infuriating even. 'I want to use to break the machine. I don't think the lord cares about much.' 'Blasphemy, can you even hear yourself speaking? Do you not realize anything of the peril which comes with such treacherous words? We were given this moist place and plenty of nests for our backs to retreat back into and breed the next generations. Why do you insist that we may bring an end to it? Have you not done enough already?' 'What have I done now? Asked questions? Because that's the only thing I've done. If you don't like hearing what I've got to say, then you should leave and never return but know that I'll stay here and fish as many of the golden carps as I want.' Blasphemy after blasphemy as they would share those infuriating looks, while the canon only stood frozen solid like a statue. It shouldn't have worked any longer, not while the ammunition had been locked inside. But they wondered still what might happen if one of the bigger rocks would just happen to reveal a grander beast, a taller one, one which might be strong enough to break through their pace. Without a second look, from face to face they exchanged the fear. He appeared there, Hyumndliydñ stood there, surrounded by a gray-blue, cloak made of dead harpies which only hid the many hidden mouth blades he hid beneath him. His body was made out of those mouth watery joints which spoke each time he pressed as much as one step forth. From his laughter came the turn, without realizing, the pitiful ones stood facing the walls. 'What is he intending now? Will he end us here? What if we'll be gone?' 'Let him be, don't give him any ideas now, I wouldn't like to lose what I have of my feet and of my strange grown.' But before he could explain himself or give a reason for his appearance, they heard some giggles. Some more of them followed. As they turned they saw this unnerving pair of children laughing at them. Of course they were a different pair, who only took the appearance of their lord as well. As they had been done shape shifting, they revealed themselves as nothing more. 'Spirits of the woods. I see them. What caused them to come here?' 'Forge that, you need to inquire of something else, why are they impersonating Hyumndliydñ? And how do they know about them.' Before they could get their grasping claws on them, and before agony could be reached, they started jumping like green sponged, around each moist wall, from which water started sprouting. It was from them that their various nice-smelling perfumes came, though it brought them an insufferable amount of disgust, they honed it for as long as they lasted there. By the time they could even explain themselves, it had been too late. Neither of them would even allow the proper explanation for which they were there. 'I must listen; I must listen and hear, the lord will come here if you keep making noise.' 'If we stop, you'll get us, don't you worry about it now, for we shall looking into your secret plans and decide it for ourselves if it's worth it for us to pursue you.'With which they stopped the tatter and didn't bother until it had been late. For each step and every kind of threat could decide to throw itself where it was needed. The feed they would pay to themselves would be unworthy, for what those sponges found in the cracks was far more threatening than the reeking habits of the strangest tendrils and the least aware deciders. It was the matter of the universe, the very blurred out boldly encompassed creeping piece of agony which stretched as far as to enter them as soon as they came into contact with it. And the sponges couldn't even fathom the unnecessary appliance of the matter which gave them vision into space. And that terrible thing had been far too much for being so primitive whom would themselves grow like some bold lichens which lost their sentience. Just like the war-machines which hid inside the rocks, they had been appallingly afflicted by the same kind of unsanitary disease. No even a wretch could spare them of the fetching alacrity which spread itself through the spores. And not even the spores could spread again once they had received their marks from below. In as much as eighty shattered bonds, by the various alphabets which had been forged for word-domination and speech-control, the monks of I'lliratha Lohnmustn, managed to fill their guts with swords. They've been assaulted for their sacrilege during a mad crusade for the bold headless cutter of the wretched bond. Unashamed now they lay in defeat, resting at broken feet, unable to contend with the changes which broke their tiny legs. In as much as a symbolic gesture, the servants run as they cowardice would not allow them to return where they had gone to. 'We'll only claim that we've seen nothing and experience naught of the kind. Do you understand?' 'I shall say what I desire but I think you're right. We won't manage to get any further unless we give something of ourselves to them. And if it means we'll sacrifice some speech.' Speech, that decaying thing almost struck him, this mindless progeny of the most insufferable forms of life. It couldn't be conceived at all, but it had done it, it had angered all of them as fast as it might. The essences crawling towards him now. Lord of wails, forgotten as he wouldn't even dare behave in his hall of lost orders. It would be highly insufferable otherwise, to even pay him the credence of looking him in the eyes now. What had transpired against him had been the state of disillusion. He was a fluke, he didn't care. Whatever entered him now appeared to be there. It was there, he'd yell. 'It's there, I said it, and it's there.' He ripped open a book from his library and pushed a single page with a numberless cut at the bottom only to see the solidarity of ink which gathered from each letter which mixed. It was a sham, uninteresting, it was a blow, a bloke. And as he saw it, he felt as if everything he had even collected had been nothing but a morbid joke. So many books lay in his library which he had never read, so many paintings he hadn't liked. And yet he never screamed and shouted as the realization had never come. In as long as a few paces which were taken, he had been set to push onward, calling forward to the last piece of schedule, the mandibles pressing on the ink as he would try pushing it in his mouth and even farther than that. Nails began biting inside his throat, as he would look upon no other place other than that which had provoked him. It was unnecessary to wail, for he would not be heard, once the ship he was in had sailed. The other lords wouldn't not be aware, for somewhere in this throat, a sphere; an anchor of many chrysalis-shaped tiny monitors had appeared, chained by the winged menace which disappeared. Oily, as it had become, he could feel himself vanishing from inside, only to be taken somewhere he would feel nothing at all. It stopped soon after when he started seeing them in front of his face. One rhombus had been placed near a cube, a pyramid and other vaguely shaded forms. Interacting with them had been the least of his thoughts, as he would not even suffer it now. What else would matter, other than the latter?

Obscured by the vision, he had reached and grabbed a circle, only to see one of his fingers drawn in, giving into and becoming a part of the circle he had touched. Afterwards, the circle flew back with the others, and they shared it between themselves. Each of them emerged as a single toe which in itself gathered enough strength to cut itself open and reveal the white-ants. In their flocks, they flew, being wide enough to look like miniature giants who wanted to proceed. Some of them would find it necessary to breed inside his head. Look around, you're dead. It was the mere thought which was lost on him. Some wings were spread, others weren't, but seemed to appear mulled. Dulled even by the blades of the air, which had been the remnants of the lord of wails. He had been silent ever since he crushed his spine and crawled inside the nearest corners he could push himself towards. Now he saw, the only image which could draw his attention. As his chest emerged, no longer would he be purged from this epiphany of mild disease. Least of all, he could live as plainly as he could, knowing that a piece of software, a machine was inside his head. It had occupied a good portion of it, making sure to break everything else. Mindless, the brain had been crushed and smashed and instead of it, he would watch them turn back. The bleakness claimed another victim, so it seemed. Depression emerged on that ship, turning the good wood ashen, lost to a motor disease which wouldn't even be accounted for. To look back for more would mean, that someone else had been that way. Falling prey to the miniature bolts, the cold would strap the nearest home, as it stopped the ship near the glacier. Without a realization, of the elements which defied even the nature they had been given in, this came to pass. A mass of inconceivable gray turned everything into that which couldn't even be conveyed. A turn for the masses of the solid sleepers of ice had brought the last of the performers back to life. Without sight and nurture, there would always run the danger the forager of dreams contained, as he had presented himself to this man with a mass and a pass, uncouth. Brought to an end, alas, barging through the first window he arrived and placed himself near. 'You may rise up now; I have put you to sleep so you may avoid having to deal with this pain.' 'I'll faint if you won't let me join you.' 'Already now? I thought I could only bring you here and give you free reign so you may go wherever what's left of those fragments of your mind convey. I didn't think you'd submit to me or to my will.' 'What else is there left for me? Just look at it and what it had done to me. I cannot fight it, I cannot even hope to please my senses with memories or.' He forgot, of all the senses and what he thought, a piece of him belonged to that machine. Whether or not he liked it, there wasn't any escape from this edible mass of disconcert. A bitter worm had entered his gaze. It was likely to be symbol of the falling of dirt. 'The sky is raining with it.' 'I see, but what's the cause?' There was a wonder at this strange pavilion, the kind which only brought this to mind. 'It's not dirt, but fragments of the ship or the shuttle which had failed to materialize in the world. Never you be the matter, I think there's no chance for us to go any farther than this. What awaits you outside is agony and despair, so you may just as well stay.' One secret words came to pass, written for a mass in the distance. Jumping, leaping in the garden. Snails and birds were one being in part with the trees. They were flying madly, only with the wings of bees. And their tails were wrought in so much fat that they appeared to be giving birth to the desecrator lookers below their ribs. But they weren't the animals, the beings or the things mentions. It was only what humans looked like now. Instead of wings, their giant hands were flapping, instead of the one tail; they had their legs wrapped around. Deposited inside their chests, there was only the wrathful alacrity which ought to be detested. A miniature of guts which turned about every second which may have set them apart as they spread. In the exposed cavities they allowed children to rest, but not by normal means. Inside their heads there had been devices which prevented them from ever-coming back to life. It was their piety which made them lack knowledge in the arts. They would be drawn to fancy images instead, never bothering to look into anything at all. A crude awakening had drawn all of them to the nearest totem-pole, to which they bowed. Inspired by the worship of the garden, flowers bloomed as soon as they had their minds awakened. As a beige tinted fire came into the totem's eyes, its many faces started shaking as they were watched. 'Walk over the lanes and find us the eight.' 'Eight? What was that exactly? A trick, which all the children were first to pick at. To pick one from the nearest crowd would mean that one should look away and shroud his eyes from the nearest other thing. Rising from the nearest holes, their ears had been fashioned to the point where they could initiate flight. It was necessary in order to proceed and interact with the other beings in the plains which could only be heard. 'Carry on by the regions of Indalur Oggo. Only there shall you find one of the eight heads.' 'He was a liar then? Would that be right?' 'It doesn't matter. As long as you are on your path, everything else might as well just be ignored.' Then it had been settled. No one would seethe or care. No one would dare, unlike what had been peremptorily the only agony of bonding rituals which could be spared in this short of time, it had to be accepted that sooner or later they would become sociopathic in nature. Instead of being on their way, they had accosted their small chunk and started pushing it, with the help of the infuriating children who were still attached. Plenty of the wires began pushing through their heads until the unnecessary ad missal came to be. Nothing could be uncontestable any longer, despite the fact that the lack of appliance to their muscle mass left them feeling less than strong. Guilty as charged, unable to be left alive, they sneered at each other and went away. A much wider horizon awaited them. The totem, the totem, the totem had been inscribed. Wilder powers had been at play, the kind of which would never reach as much as a single well-to do. Yet there was enough time they had spent there. In as few as a few secondary moments, they began floating away into the distance. No one had dared observe the distant contributions at the false dawn. It was a piteous think which had claimed too many things from the world. The false dawn approached. 'It's necessary.' One of the children spoke. 'Unless, it's useless.' They were toys, which served as nothing else other than some pointers to some grater catalyst which couldn't be complete. Laurels were in the sky, the need to breathe through them crossed their eyes. A multitude of false hope could only fathom itself as they gave away when they were met by the threshold of Ttuthtriat. 'Listen to us now; we deserve a remembrance, now it's the time.' Forgiveness would be asked by them, for as long as it could be conveyed. On ladder pushed inside someone's latter movement of the unfashionable amount of hay they expelled from their laurels. It was a complete hole, a box which contained only most of the dirty utensils used for complete assimilation of ravens which flew inside their traps. It couldn't be conceived either that they'd meet them there. 'Pay a toll of a single ear, child and the rest of them shall be granted safe passage to one of the totems, do us harm and you'll be trashed by the various wind traps that always count themselves in.' 'Must I be petty?' 'Please yourself no longer, here, take it.' One of the children from the flying rovulas threw him an ear he had simply ripped off. It remained to be inconclusive whether or not he could handle the pressure. Laurels and dirt, more of the girth, now it was time to set forth and listen to them speak. 'Will you please just give us what we need? I only want a piece of my self ripped away.' 'By whom?' 'The one who placed the totems in those places.' 'Wretched child, but you have no mind of your own, what happened to you there?' 'I believe I spent too much time alone, something messed with my occipital signal transmitter and now I'm deeply affected by paranoia. My state is getting worse. I think I'm inside a giant holder of meat which will eventually swallow me. What might I be able to do?" "Stay there until you rot. This sacrifice of yours had been accepted, bother us no longer." As easily as they had been dismissed, it was possible to know no letter any more than it was needed. Grasping at their sight was that distant fashion of ground around the rims and plains. Bothered by the wretched heaves which even dragged across it, they could see the giant totem which had been formed at its own base. It bore an inconsequential kind of alarming sight, which pushed within itself a bigger reach towards the top of the sky. It grew like a living thing would, even share in its appearance, though most of the other totem parts were too unnatural to be part of the fit. Resting longer than it was needed, their attention spanned towards the approaching giant, peculiar flying contortions which held them. Also, to be recognized, the children had been seen as well as they were pushed within the Quakers they spewed out. Too many deaths had been claimed, and many of them seemed to swim inside the land. "Muddy, I see, this cannot be, but I can feel them wrenching to get over themselves. It's no simple dirt they're swimming in; I can feel the puddle made out of the previous generations of Quakers which had fallen before them. Stay here, I think it's late for them." Previous sightings of rising peaks could be seen amidst the puddle. In that soup, I felt my body's desire to join them in order to be eaten. It was a desire I couldn't recognize in myself, a gift from above, I should've accounted for before I started on this journey. "Let me be, oh, let me be. I cannot even, for the sake of me, hope to escape this desire." It pushed and pumped through his chest, the more he saw the orgiastic piece of the totem play with the Quakers, as they would be thrown there and taken back. To look at one in particular, one Quaker had survived and not only so, but he appeared to have been completely if not close to being submerged in the pole. His eyes were shaking and seemed to be higher above his sockless home. Even from the distance, his many voices served as a sign that the Quakers below hadn't died, but had transcended their consciousness and living. Instead, they had dragged in one body kept alive by it. What kind of vile words had been inscribed on that tablet? Though none may know of it, this derangement of unnatural order could not be comprehended by simple minds, especially by that of a single child. One ought to be robbed by it as he would have no other chance but to submit to the process and to join. "Stay away from it, brothers, I do not want you or your suits to be taken away. It's far too dangerous for any of us to approach." In itself, there was a breed to be snatched from the creeping lack of touches, the warmth being close to inexistent. Such a morose feeling had crept on all of them, coming from a wave, the despair being felt which pushed everyone away. "Don't fall for the depressions, and don't look at them now." Far more tremendous than what they felt was that despair-filling awe coming from an almost flat end. In the distances, forms started barely dragging themselves near numbers. It was a highly repulsive manner which gave them away.

Vile pocket

As it just happened for the creeps to rise, there had been a clear sign of the nearing demise which had lain near to him. One man whom had lain like some kind of creep just awakened from the likes of being caught off guard. There was something cheerful about the creature, something which couldn't or wouldn't have been explained otherwise. What had it been? A cruelty which had been shown to be as nothing else, that's all. Where the man had awakened laid a near-sighted kind of legged fog. It was all in his mind, this stranger, and this demented fool had killed his wife in his sleep. There laid naught but a single pommel in his hand, with which he had managed to batter and crush the side of her ear, from which he found himself in the same manner, so to speak. The maiden had lain dead, but no other signs were there, as to show what had happened to her. What had been the reason? What had it been? Unlike her, he had stood there very much alive. No wound, no blind spot from which a spot on his head would've been softened by the means of another weapon. It had to be it, the trail of blood coming from the side of her head should've confirmed it. But by no means had it done anything of the kind. He stood there like some blind thing. Not even a man, a thing which had been spineless. He had been a dog, a mutt, the likes of which could do nothing any longer but cower in shame and wonder. 'My dear, for what I have done, what shall become of me? My servants would be quick to come otherwise and leap away from the sight of their mistress lying where you stand, breathless and caught off guard. Where hath thane been, my dear, when I was in need of refuge? You were there, for I was in need of help. And you have indeed delivered the kind of help which had been needed in the least. No longer would there be any kind; no longer could there be some dreadful experience to be dreaded. It was something shameful from the kind of hope which lay there.' It was an ill thought, for which he had shown no remorse whatsoever. No more would he be looked at as anything else other than the murderer he had been. By that, he could only look at himself the way he was whilst he lay in the same way. He would be seen like some kind of king, or vile thing, that of which lay in its own wake and the scent of which would reveal the sweat of the flight. For he had run out of his childhood home that night, right before any of the servants might've had the chance to get away and do something which they might regret over the rest of their lives. It had been important to be noted at least. For his own sake, he never looked back and seemed to be set on the road. And it had been, for the likes of itself, in it for its own, something he had never had to deal with. In more than one way, he had been largely unprepared for the likes. He was no stranger to being scum though, oh; there had been plenty of that there. 'Release me you hooligan, you dirty face rubber!' 'Atta boy lads, take care of this petty creep, think he can just come in and plunder our likes of us. Say, you're rather pretty faced for a bandit.' 'Not to mention being as dumb as to attack us right in the open. Isn't he? What's it to you that you'd come here in such a way? You don't seem the kind.' For a moment there, I thought I may have lost my temper. The men surrounding me were rather vile and paranoid. Something about them bore something really strange and peculiar. Something had been wrong. It wasn't even necessarily right for me to take what hadn't been mine but I couldn't help it. It was wrong, I knew it, but as to have my bags filled with that nasty liquor seemed to have taken a great toll. I had refused to speak. 'Push him around, that's right, give him a good push. Make sure he eats some of that dirt as well. Don't allow him to get up, he won't do anything, will he?' The men who surrounded him seemed to have taken a taste in his blood, or at least the thing which came out of his mouth. So far, it had seemed to be something akin to some combination between the liquor and a good pint of blood. The man was left there, stranded and naked. Who? Who? Who was he? Why have I been dragged near him by the road? 'See this man old' here?' 'The man asked you a question, for someone with a lordly face as yourself, you would've thought to have had at least the decency to say something for yourself. And stand up like a man when you're spoken to.' 'Am I not a prisoner?' 'Well, no, you're free to walk, or limp, or whatever means you might see fit for yourself. What do you say?' My feet had been nastily twisted by their looks alone. It wasn't clear as to what was going on. But reason alone dictated that there was something close to being done. It was unnaturally uneventful, the likes of being forced to parlay with their scum. Though I listened. 'Here, see this man right here?' 'Yes, is this happens to thieves around here? They get beaten to a pulp, I suppose?’ ‘Right, but that’s beside the point. Well, listen here, pretty lad, we think there’s something to you, which you’re not telling us right now.’ What had been unclear now lay itself bare naked as it had been thoroughly met by them. This man had four of his very own fingers missing, it was clear enough that he was left there to die. ‘For what reason might this warning be then? I’ve only done a mistake, which seemed to be costly but not at a great of deal as I thought it may be?’ ‘Why’s that then? Doesn’t it frighten you that we may sell you to some guard on the road?’ ‘Or rob you naked just so we may get you? Isn’t that right, Darge?’ The scarred man cracked a glance as to signal him to stop there. It was then that the two men had met eye to eye, not the jackal of a runt, but the other one. The clearly educated one who may have stolen his glass of a monocle he bore. One clear mark of great engineering lay rounding it around the edges. One glance passed yet a second time before he winced. ‘What of it then? I don’t think we’ll be able to trick the man, just look at him, he knows.’ ‘Can I get off already, Darge?’ It looked as if even the stranded man, with his battered clothes and bloodied nose seemed to have lost his temper and stopped waiting. Something about the clearness with which he watched or he had seen appeared less than likely to bring in the distress. As it came to him, he had looked in awe as the man suddenly leaped from his crossed spot and straightened his back. What he had brought back with him from that very spot had been a small bag with which he would seal the deal and make do with the ordeal. What had been laid in with no came clear to him. ‘My name is Jonas, the one rat-looking fellow is Cork. Darge, our leader you may have met.’ Which only left that one fellow straight over there, which lay by a tree? His rounded device which had been bore over his eye seemed to expand ever so slightly and push forward to the distance. ‘Someone’s bound to come this way, at best, I’d say one or two hours at least. What might you think about it now? I can’t seem to notice what lay beneath it but they seem to be dragging a small cart with a large metallic container.’ There he would be named. Hawks, not even the most liked name he could find but it’d do. ‘It bring the question, mister, are you to join us or may we leave you to your fate? You know you’re not any likely to find someone who’d actually give you the chance to speak or even approach anyone at all. Perhaps it had been fate which had lead you to us here at this hour. So what say you?’ Darge asked, stroking what seemed to be a gap where his face split, right at the chin. His teeth chattered and for some very grand reason he appeared to be excited. Had he know who I was? If I had even the slightest clue or suggestion, even the likes of thinking I’d know, there wouldn’t have been a second were I to stand. Unlikely to be called into action, it seemed so that they could be called there, in some refuge underneath the plight of the woods. ‘I say yay, I have no other place to go and no order of thoughts to come to. Whoever I might meet out there, my luck would surely untrue me from anything which might drag me away.’ ‘Then come on and hope into the plight, there’s need for us to hide.’ What little sense of it had it made, we leaped into a part of the woods where there wasn’t anything of the like. There were no leaves falling, nor was the grass growing there at all. It was clear that through some way, some dreadful and strange way, I would stay with them. These strangers, four men who didn’t seem any likely to be grand. ‘Don’t make any noise and listen to us, all right? Hawks, what do you think of it?’ ‘From the looks of their company, there were four armoured horses bearing knights, a few bandits they hired, eight priests, two priestesses and a monk they had brought with them.’ ‘And you couldn’t have told a fellow any sooner? With those chances we’ll stand here bearing potatoes and small fruits all day until they pass.’ The rat-looking fellow said. His lower lip seemed to resemble a small barnacle in the light and appropriately called so, there wasn’t any direction in which his feet moved. ‘Well, that wasn't the ordeal I was suggesting. We are unable to take any of them and trickery is out of question. For as much as I have enjoyed being part of this group for the longest manner, I think this is what might break it for us.' Darge took a moment to look at him. Hawks was little concerned with the sanctity of their band. Even less was than that had he been, Michael Bargth, who had been at least pleased with the name he had chosen. It wasn't much but he came in. 'What If I were to come here in the middle of the road and act as if I had been robbed.' 'Pretty face won't do for them. Just take a look.' He pointed as to where he could see. From the distance, despite them being nowhere to be noticed by the means of sight, he had looked as something he had known to be out there. It was a chain of solid smoke, which almost seemed as if it was going off a straight path to cut through the clouds and try digging through day in the absence of night. It was something which was unnatural by every means necessary. He hadn't even been aware of what was going on out there, the man who had been pretending to be a thief, as he himself had been just as confused as I was. 'I don't think I really know that either is the smoke supposed to be the fire of the brew inside that small black pocket.' 'No, you fool, don't be as wicked headed as he is, you'll miss the entire thing just as well as he has. It's a, wait, what have you said just then?' 'What, about the smoke?' 'No, you scarecrow wicked thing of an older lad, the.' 'Black pocket.' Hawks came in, suddenly aroused by the strange speculation that he may have an understanding of what that thing had been. Clearly, he had been aware, of knew of something of it. 'And since you know that well, as you make it so clear, why don't you go as well and tell us what's it supposed to be. Black pocket of a thing, what do you mean by that?' A curious thing in itself, as he seemed to pick up some ash which lie on the ground around them and raise a small mountain which had been given form by the likes of his hands. They wrapped around and brought some more. As if from his pocket as much as it had looked likely, he had brought down a small match which had been lit but hadn't been given light as to the ashes. Something from it immediately came to seek for some refuge inside the pile and immediately appeared to have encompassed the entirety of the match. 'See how the light appears to have been extinguished as well with its body? That, my dear friends, my dear fellows was what would be called by a layman, as it appears in its form, the likes of a dear human life.' Again, he had been interrupted by the man with a bloodied nose. 'So that's the pocket, huh? I knew it to be unholy ever since I laid an eye on it. I seem to have a deeper understanding for what it is that what it is likely to be. There's something dreadful about it all, something which cannot be changed. They have been made aware of it and seem likely to have sealed it.' 'That's what the priests are there for?' I asked, looking curiously cross eyed at the far distance in which it lay. Even from there, I could see it drawing ever nearer. Hawks continued. 'As I have previously said, there's something to it. Something which couldn't be explained by any natural ways, but that thing surrounding it, the scamp who is made out of that bitter substance seems to seek sustenance only from the lives of good men.' 'Henceforth we would be safe.' Again, that bloodied fellow interrupted, having had the greatest smile inhabiting his face. He had been quite proud of himself by the means of which he admitted his guilt. It was undeniable that everyone else seemed to muster the same feeling, other than Hawks who had maintained his composure and I whom had been unsure of what had happened the previous night. 'We can assume it's safe or would be safe for us to draw to it then?' Asked Darge, who was battering what appeared to be some kind of small weapon hidden under the silk of his arm. There was something near him there, whence he lay. It wasn't anything to be looked down upon. But then, it came to him. 'What do you think it may happen if we were to unleash that thing upon them? Say, what if we were to find a way to strike as if it were some wicked spot in the hull of the small armoured cauldron in which it lay? That way it may as well escape and find a way towards their end.’ ‘And ours as well, if it just happens for it to suddenly have tasted for wicked people.’ Said the rat-fellow while brushing across his tiny whiskers. His small moustache had been weird looking and somewhat demented. Not only that but their time had been drawing ever so near over the fact that it was coming close to them. There would be no kind of strangeness through which they could lay or hide. ‘They will see us, I tell you, they’ll see us and make sure we won’t make it time. And you said it yourself, a few knights.’ ‘Petty things, they could be dealt with.’ Retorted Hawks to the man, as he rubbed his nose. I couldn’t help but look at what had been laid upon me there. Somehow, I could see the faces of men which had been contorted and shown into the very sky through which it cut. It felt likely that the smoke had managed to infest the sky and devour clouds and the likes which would’ve made it ever as likely as to be had for themselves in themselves while suffering. As to the apparent loss of time, it looked as if they had stopped a few miles away from them. The knights had gathered, priests prepared. I lay there alone, with no one to look around at, as some kind of victim which had been mesmerized by the sight. Not only that, but I had also been in the middle of the road, where they had been projected to come. One knight had managed to ride forward and cut through the chase. It was through one of the fields of which he lay there unaware of had been happening so far. Though he had come and he introduced himself immediately. ‘Sir Proghmontary. I have been disposed here to inquire of your presence here, man who looks to be unwell. From whence had you come and what is the reason for which may you lay here bearing your arms in this manner and with the likes of being found alone? Would it happen for you to be stricken in the head?’ It had been the early moon he had forgot to mention, especially since he had been unsure as to whether or not something was about to come on its way. Perhaps a rescue was already there, unless they had carried on without him, the stranger. ‘I’m Asopheus, a monk.’ The knight looked around me with his eyes, with a metal band going around me and little to no interest as to know what had been wrong. Clearly something didn’t go on either of our ways as he had required knowing. ‘From which Monastery would you happen to be?’ ‘Oh, my good man, my lord, I am but in training. I have been sent here on a mission of piety and had been required to live through the life of a poor sinner and be as much of a petty beggar as one may be.’ At the sound of my attempted scoundrelry, there appeared the actual monk out of nowhere, as to have made himself known, or the fact that he had eavesdropped from the distance when he shouldn’t have even dared. It was likely that he would’ve been aware of something even better for the likes. Something was clear there, unsurprised as he had been, this man actually listened and appeared to have a slight recollection of such things. ‘Then feel as if you’re relieved from this choice and mission you’ve been sent to. For, I, a monk of the grand chapel of Ariloth, have decided to undertake you under my wing and take you as you are. Feel no need to show me any gratitude for I am doing this out of the desire of my own heart and even less than what is likely to be had. It’s more than even that we should be aware of one another and the like, for I have more than faith to show to you.’ This man had even shocked the knight in the way he had spoken and approached. But there was no word which may come other than. ‘It’s not something the grand general might like hearing about. If he were to hear of us bringing over a stranger, of whom we do not know anything about, there could be more than a few problems to be held against us. Know that there’s even less of a certainty that we wouldn’t simply be thrown into the first dungeon they could find, or even discarded by the other knights.’ ‘And I shall deal with each in case it comes to it, but know that I have no intention to abandon a man like him. I saw it and can still see it through his eyes, there's something to him which begs the forgiveness of the diving. Come Charadlion, for our friends await.' At which scoff, he seemed to make way and allow me to follow right in the footsteps of the Monk. As few of a wager as I had in it, there seemed to be likely for something to be held against him as a man. 'But why have you decided to take me here?' 'Shut your mouth and follow new-comer. Have they not told you already of what we're planning on doing? Are you as touched as the main in the suit had said?' It all made sense now, as I have truly known, or might've guessed in a blue moon that this man hadn't been with their. He had been as much of a scoundrel as the rest of them, which brought us there.

In the small den of lions where I stood. Bowed and cowed, still dressed like the poor man I had looked like, it looked strangely dark then. Despite being day, my vision darkened and all of the sudden I could see the image of a burnt forest and the paleness around there. 'What is going on here?' 'Priests, hold the man for a very few moments, he seems to be affected by the varge.' It came as no surprise that already there had been tricks made out of some illusionary whim which came out of that pocket. 'Who is this man, why have you brought him with us, monk?' 'If I may.' Came in the knight, surprised at the fact that another bulk of smoke had come out of the enclosed cauldron, at which he could do nothing less than fall back. It was even less than eventful for him to lay. A dark mongrel of a man, darkened at which he lay in the back. 'Bring purity to the closeness and respond. Who is this beggar whom you have brought?' 'Nothing but an apprentice, highly divined holy one, I have sought nothing but salvation for this poor sod, which lay clearly in need of it. Take a look at the man.' For a second there, two blocky eyes had lain in his sockets. They were coloured in coal and seemed to be at a distance which wouldn't be near to what he had appeared to be. Clearly he had lain in the waste of the pocket, near which this affliction lay. He saw them not but clearly could walk away. Out of the road he strayed into what seemed to be the hills in which his fellows laid. There they were. 'Can you hear me? What happened?' Near his words lay some kind of echo of dark, out which he spat the coal on the ground. Their bodies had been ever so frail that one of his breaths had managed to cripple and destroyed them. 'What have I done?' 'Murderer!' One of the dark ladies which lay near him yelled. She had the aspect of the land and bore two red globes, which had been even smaller than what had appeared to be. In which place, they crept alone and had ignored their likes. It wasn't even fruitful of a thing which had crept and wept in the very own kind of blood which poured in their pores. As soon as she had been done with the reason for which she had come there, a quick pause between them caused them to lay there both and weep. It had been clear, that through some kind of strange approach, she had managed to lay there near me. I couldn't help it but stay near her as much as possible for no other reason at all.

What lay in his mind wasn't what he had thought but his eyes, as he looked down at his hands reddened. A light had projected itself farther away from in and there it had been that he stood. Alone. 'Where have you gone, kind lady?' The peculiar lack of grasps had taken him to some kind of extreme disparity through which he couldn't have thought himself anything less but the kind which lay in fright. And fear had settled for the kin of woe, the rightness and strangeness which lay near his rightful place next to her. He had followed the trails she had left, it had to be hers. Tiny red caterpillars moved in the lanes where she may have gone. Together they had created a path ahead, from which neither one could look down upon one another and at the same time be distraught with what had happened there. Not any clearer had it been that there would be no kind of cruelty to be had. This trail had leaded the liar to a broken house, in the middle of nowhere. And she was there, bloodied at the mouth. 'Not again, not a second time. I haven't done it, I have not done it.' I yelled, almost commissioned like some peculiar stranger who had awakened from a mortal coil. 'What happened?' No, ask the other question, quickly, before they realize or come to know what happened. 'Has something unclear had been said of myself or another?' 'Listen to us, man who walks backwardly, unable to surrender and succumb to the likes. It isn't like that, by the likes of anyone else's memories to have been told. You are one whom weeps and creeps in the light now, have you no sense but to approach the cauldron and the pocket?' 'I told you, my, your holiness divine, he's a madman, he's a street shackler, nothing more. Why should we have left him walk in paths which be unknown to any. We must look at him directly and know. Who's there and what's it like to have been told of our desire. This strangeness, peculiarness and attire he bears are virtues.' The monk said and stared. This man didn't look evil, vile or as if he had borne some divined ill intention to him.

Something of the likes had forced his likes alone. Neither of them could be held against them or accountable at best. Viler things appeared as they moved on after a clear sight or some quick gaze coming from the priest. He had been infuriated and held himself even less likely than he had been. It was even more so that this new-comer, the man who had appeared seemed harmless. 'Look, in the distance, they appear again.' One of the knights had said and called forth another one from behind to create a small formation. What had come, that devilish creature with its weird and peculiar ways, the methods in which they danced and crept seemed rather vile. It was in themselves that their visions faded and returned. Something of their small stature, brown bodies, hairy mandibles, long faces and the way their bodies almost seemed to expand from inside made them look like some pure nightmare. In themselves lay a piece of the pocket which had made its way from the sky. Though the smoke alone may not have contained the essence, the mere reflection of the pocket seemed to have enough of a power to set it forth and lay in some way through which he lay tempted and for the likes. It would be uncertain to approach but wait for them. It came again.

The sight of the lost, the window to that world where the sky had succumbed. In that world, in the same position there lay none of the holy men or anyone else. Only those creatures, or, to be more precise, the men whom had lain behind them or inside of them. Whatever it may have been. That little matter seemed less interesting and seemed to bear fewer methods of looking in themselves. Clearly something had shattered the expectation he had had as quickly as he had been approached. 'Thank you, oh blessed one from above. Another man, another sane man, oh, savior, you have arrived in time. I need your help for this is the path I have taken in need of redemption. See those eight men behind me? They are all mad?' 'Settle down, man, and quickly explain to me what's happening now. Could you not see what's been forceful and what's been wronged? Isn't it interesting? The mad way through which he may have looked at himself could never be taken by any other means.' But what had been that madness which had taken him as well? It couldn't be explained either, but this was a man who had torn his eyes to escape the red. And the change had been taken from another turn of the moon. The red had become a teal and a blue. Of some things couldn't be drawn in their own but drawn as conclusion which may signal what went wrong. It was obvious, to say the least, that there was some of the essence of that light which had made them far more passive and less than mad. 'I feel like I have wronged you, my good man.' Hence he had returned, with piety in his mind and clear attrition of most of his body, which couldn't be otherworldly explain, other than the fact that there wasn't anything else of it there. Clearly there had been naught. Something of the ashen look around the place had changed, with less of it bearing the sign of the great fire which had purged the forest and what had lain inside of it and more of the cold. Had it arrived any sooner, he may have been more than distracted but, alas, that had been it. Only the fright lain near in the cold, the storm had arrived. It was snow but it felt as if most of it had already been placed there where the ash had been. Instead of it, there seemed to be less likely of a dreadful apparent strike. There it had been, not cubes but small shaped cones which fell from the very place where that black spot had been in the real or the other world from which he came. Another sign of arrogance lay there. 'Look, let me reward you by having brought this.' The man looked around and came back to the ground from which he appeared. Upon his return, everyone as well as he had accumulated some kind of insulated transparent ball of light. It was fire inside of it, just a glance, just a light. 'But where have you got it from?' From under his pelt, at the moment he heard it, suddenly he managed to lift it up with little strength. This man had been so kind as to rip himself open and reveal the dark which had lain inside his body. 'Is that what I think it is?' 'My good man, I owed you my soul, we all has. To have been looked upon by a real man, one of virtue is something which could not be told off by other means. We're frail people, if that is what you may call us. By what means do you think you may lay yourself with us?' Just what had he meant there? It was only a matter which required me to follow and find out by myself. Anything else would mean that I could stop and cease to live by the normal way another man may. I decided to follow them to their home, a place which had been made out of some sickly twisted clay. An abstraction to say the least, neither of us could complain at all. For as soon as I enter, the swoon had taken over and many had fallen. 'What had happened to them?' 'Please refrain yourself from approaching, stranger. Our good fellows had seemed to have fallen from the cold, as it had entirely shattered their souls.' It had made all the sense which was in need of, to be called out in the open in such a way. I couldn't look straight at them and no wonder what had caused this and why had it been? 'You shouldn't have done this for me. I am a stranger, I am no one. Neither of you could've prevailed this by means.' 'Silence, stranger and let us mourn. By the end of the hour, every single one of us will have perished, which may leave you as to do what you wish.' 'Should I bury your bodies then? Is that what you brought me here for?' 'No, no, good man, please, just let us be and stay with us at the end. Hear me of all, Flesh of man, whom I have been called for many years. The reason for which I have been brought here wasn't for that suffering you noticed going. I've came here out of vile choices, as to be controlled and hidden from the ways a man may act.' 'There was a woman, I know of it, listen stranger. Do no lay with them, we all here have suffered at their hands, at their distractions. What they do is, in some way, as we may all agree, take everything a man had and what makes a man and foils it to no ends.' 'Hear, hear.' Said the voices and as they had, it seemed that for a moment, their souls had sparked ever brighter, hotter and even the dead ones seemed to have been momentarily brought to life at the sound of it. They joined as for a pint and then fell over themselves again. 'I wouldn't say it was.' 'Indeed there had been a woman who had taken to care and show some kindness to him, poor sod. A wicked one as well, he would've been done for if it weren't for her.' 'So why are you so set on them? If she had saved him, then, certainly she couldn't have been that mad.' 'Listen, stranger, and listen carefully, as what she had given, she had taken back. And how he had been before couldn't even have compared to how low he had fallen and just how wickedly he lay. After all, we're all dead, we' all lay on the same bed of corpses as they had fallen into. In the end, when every single one of us will have fallen, know that for every single one of us there will be a woman out there laughing as to think of our graves, for no maiden would have wept for such a wicked lout.’ ‘But if you’re vile, why would you be blessed with the likeness of female?’ ‘Because stranger, we’re cursed, can’t you see? We had been driven mad, we have lived at that.’ ‘Listen to the young lad and mind not what we know. We each have gone through maiden after maiden like a horny mutt with knot in mind. And what had happened after? There was need only of one good maiden to have taken over and pushed us over the edge, the place, and the spot that one point where there could be no return. For me alone, that maiden had been young lass, who had decided to mess with the poor soul of an old lout. And I have suffered after not to come to my mind entirely afterwards.’ Until this moment at least, when the cold had come. Such was their nature from what had been told. Apparently, no cue had been as apparent as their likes had been. No man had been aware of what was there to be seen. Likely, it was apparent that they had looked past the broken window and had seen the apparition of no man but that of a vile feminine thing which could be called as nothing but a vile woman. ‘Look, out there fellows, in the dark.’ And in her coming, the sky had turned from that pale blue to a red, her eyes darkened even more and suddenly the snow had returned to its ashen state. Fires erupted from the outside, in a pale field of red, from which blossomed that vile sound and the certainty which would be less than defiled. It would be unfair to lay there, as those morbid things had all lost their souls. Dead men rose up from their pile and stood there maddened. ‘I have to get you, do you hear? I cannot say in this room now that it is filled with these kinds of folk.’ This fellow who had greeted me and called me a man of good suddenly turned, looking defiled. His skin ashamed and grayed, before it started slowly burning, not as if a fire but breaking through the clay with sparks. ‘All shall be enflamed.’ And in that one sentence which had been muttered, they all sprang and started immolating every side of the clay house they laid in. No certainty, nor woe would’ve defiled their likes, nor would there be anything less than what went on. It had been clear that the woe through which there lay no sympathy for the dreadful creature with which they parlay. They joined her in the dance of fire and had united in form. And from the fire they had created within themselves, the brim which had its decadence flayed, there came the smoke. It had been the same, as that ritual had done great in bringing him back to the awareness of what had been going on. He had been staring at the cauldron for moments before he came back to life. ‘What happened?’ ‘Calm yourself, calm, there’s nothing to be seen, only some vile things which had been driven away. Look, out there.’ One of the priestess spoke with a great sense of woe which couldn’t be called in action. Dreadfully arrogant in its own magnificence, it reigned with the likes of being caught. And watched as well. I looked upon that vile creature, small and hairy, almost like some lost child of the woods which had dirtied it and had refused to grow. From its presence there, it was heeded by a returning knight. ‘They are harmless, oh, divine, what do you require of us then? Shall we go ahead and scalp them to bring them to our lordship, the grand bishop?’ ‘Nay let them be. They are tricksters indeed, but no foul creatures to be held.’ Though he had looked with petty eyes and much disturbance at the creatures which inhabited those woods. Sooner or later they would had to be cleansed, he thought, and killed and made to suffer, for they were abominations of nature, not human for the likes alone could be sent by the scent. In some way or another, there was something to be held in sight, no amount of cope had made any less aware of their sight. Something rightful would have come to be, for their likes alone could be seen. In that light, inside the woods they drew in and seemed to bear it to themselves in resemblance of woe. Some sound seemed rightfully to creep and bear the sign of woe. There was a mad wish there, as they gathered, oh little fiends, unaware. The men had continued on the road, while the scoundrels followed from the distance with their sights of metal and pure glass. It could be called into notion that this awareness of what lay around faded. When they laid at a distance in the woods, these obscure creatures which had shown themselves there seemed rather caught in themselves and in their own. No piety could distract from what was going on there. He had been wrong, the man with the divine stature and sight of wrongness and the light, not in what he had thought but what of he told the others. For there, words had been spoken, never to be held to any ear. They formed themselves into spiteful beasts and had grown a few times their original size, and bulked to no greater if worse stature. Their bones had formed and had outgrown their bodies as well, piercing instead of pushing forth, they had been left the sight and smell in the road. It had become clear as to say, these things were bloodied and would eat anything, down from the smallest hare who had found itself on the road, to smaller animals and to the likes which couldn't be denied the rights of life. But they desired no flesh there, in their sight and seemingly endless thought array the need coming from that pocket, which drew forth the worse. Even a glimpse of it had managed to inflict itself onto them and awaken dormant vile desires which had reigned anciently sleeping and pondering for the likes of something which would be dreadful. Paranoid, to say the least, there would be the certainty of a life-like beast. It stood there, watchful, over the roads, it had seen the likes of animals, creatures and the reign of men. Those who saw it never felt disturbed, but it had been woken just as well from its slumber at the sight and scent of evil. From which permeated their likes, oh those beings that came after it. There, the two of them had met, the unnatural wolf which stood there, missing an eye, tailless and fading every second there, standing as some guard as to protect the realm. The wolf seemed self-caught in its own affairs and from its mouth came a longer, seemingly unaware creature which had been given birth just then. From the way it had managed to breed itself into existence, there could be nothing else more undignified, for its own likes had previously been the great wolf's insides. Certainly such agony wasn't planned, unless there was such a thing as the deceitful nature of that pocket which had gotten its attention there. Vile thing, hath it been anything less, there would've been no danger whatsoever. But instead of it, suddenly it had arrived to a living kind of consciousness which couldn't have been taken into account by any means whatsoever. Hard to know if, what was meant for him lay in itself by means of departure, but the unnatural animal that had lain in its domain fell like an animal that had been put down. Such a thing had been morbid to be looked down upon, more so that the creature which had given birth to it lay in such a state. But they progressed further in with such a need as there had been to cut off the living supply and make it so it would want to push forward and lay with dread as they began. Slowly they ate its gut-offspring, tearing it apart between them. A far more atrocious pain had manifested itself inside their guts, with their likes having been felt and openly pushed forward as to be taken and rot. Their insides as well couldn't have taken it all but that instinct of the corruption had made it so they couldn't help it but gorge on the corpse of the animal. Now that they had taken the first bites, they suddenly lay besides it. Most of the have choked and the greed of hunger took over and had managed to remove whatever they had felt. Of the remaining ones, the gut disease had killed them all, leaving there on the road to slowly give birth themselves to a new breed. As it happened for that gut thing to become some entity of its own which had come into contact with their own and suddenly they had made themselves be forced into the motion which had been felt that way. It would be cruel and unnerving, it had been so, to be looked up and down, forth with it. Such a thing of bitter virtue had sprouted forward, small intestine rubbing each other and forming bile-like balls to move around. Yet the bulk of those spheres hadn't been their alone but that of the meat and of the many organs which had been put together in order for them to push and lay. Such a thing was akin to anarchy to dread. As soon as they had been done harvesting the corpses for later feeding sessions, they retreated in the woods to grow. Farther away, something else followed. It had been unclear as to watch and observe their various tracks and leads but they had not dwelled farther away from the road. 'Hawks, can you still see them there? On the road I mean.' 'Certainly, it could not be denied that it is them. Though that spoiled smoke had left a dark trail, I can't help it but believe it as to be deceitful on its road and path. Such a thing couldn't be exploited by any means or any need, be it as clever and cheerful as it may be.' 'Then why are we even following it? If it's so hard, then it may not be worth the profit and the effort we're putting in' 'Shallow as usual, my tiny headed friend, worry not about the profit, as it looks rather clear to me, that if this thing is worth even half of what's it like, then we may have something going on for ourselves.' So long as there was something on the road they proudly followed.

Even through the nights when even they had to stop and rest, they seemed to be rather caught within their own dreams and various inconsistencies. They followed through notes. 'You, new-comer, stay there, with the monk and me, by the river and under the three shade. We can't risk you being some infiltrator, do you understand? In that case, we'd only have you brought to the court and sent to the headsman.' 'I will comply if that's what it's asked of me. My life is rather precious.' 'Well, I'd say. And where would you happen to have come from?' One of the priestess asked. It looked as if she had almost come out of nowhere, aware of something being out of place, even though it had been me she chose to stay near. I have not given up on that advice the men had lain upon me, even though it had been given moments before they went their mad ways, but such as it way, I could not help it. She was in her prime of beauty, not a girl, though she may have given that appearance of sight from her sides, brass haired and rather cheeky mouthed, her eyes had taken the appearance of something which had lain coldly in the summer green. Something rounded her at the waist and for a second there he thought he may have started a bit too much. They all have, as there did lay two things which rounded them around them, close to something not to be controlled. 'May I have a word with the man? If I don't intrude too many, I wish to have spoken to him in private before the dawn of night.' 'But priestess Melena, there's something inconceivable about the man, he's not judged trustworthy as of you.' 'I heard that and I would like a retort. I am a man of my word and though I have not proven it, rather, I'd like to have a chance to defend myself and my likes alone. There's nothing fairer than what's of mine and my likes alone shall prove it.' 'Very well then, a wager, if you don't mind it. For I, as my brothers who lay around here seem to have a doubt when it comes to judging who you are and the claims you seem to be able to make with your little consideration of the man around you.' Came in another guard, this one seemed caught in his own affairs at least half of the time, while the other seemed to have caught him rather watchful of what was to be. 'Shut your mouth Darnall, don't drag the poor lad into one of your foul things. I'll admit that I don't know it myself, but this man doesn't deserve the kind of treatment you're bound to show off people.' 'Silence, I shall do whatever I must and whatever I so desire as long as it pleases me and doesn't disturb his great divine in means alone.' 'No you won't, shut yer mouth, petty liar. You're always doing what you're told, in every kind and each direction. Darn there, Darn here, fetch me something, charge a brick. Whoever and whatever calls of you, never do you deny.' 'But I do that because I want to do it and because I follow.' 'Right, Darnall, if you please, you were asking something of me, and I was actually rather curious on what that may be.' 'Well, now that I may have acquired your attention, worry not, for I have heard just enough. A wager, as it is provided for the stranger. As long as it doesn't interfere with anything of the kind, if you're the good man you claim to be, just listen and do as you may be pleased to.' I came closer and started preparing no remark but some kind of quick wit to get me out of what was going on there. Suddenly aware of their watchful eyes, I was caught in an affair of mine which couldn't have been there by any other means, but that had been it. Oh, dreadful thing, dreadful catch in which I plunged against. I placed my honour against his own desire and his test. As he presented it to the priestess at hand with a mere mark. 'Say not a word milady, for the divine one may whip and punish me in some way which may be just as dreadful and as mad as one may think of.' 'What is then? What are you planning on doing?' 'Only a promise and I shall leave you to your many priestly errands, nothing more.' To which she agreed, then he turned to the other knight. He knew there'd be no fight there either, as much as he had been caught off guard, he still managed to think just straight out of his petty things. 'I shall be weary of it and make the proper arrangements for the funeral of this fellow.' He said as Darn had whispered in his ear, the thing which had been so preciously inadequate that he would have to risk his life in trying. There'd be no other chances, therefore it came. 'What we have wagered against, at least so far, at a small bag of golden marks.' At which the monk had suddenly found himself near, listening and looking rather aroused by the idea of some marks being involved. 'Perhaps I may join in? Whatever it is, I say, that there's nothing more sanctimonious than a monk praying in for the soul of the soon to be deceased.' 'Speaking of the blotched, say, monk, how about this.' At which whispers had granted the man a chance of face and a sullen look which had given him the pale aspect of a dying man. There wasn't anything else of the kind which may have been else close to it, and even as they exchanged bags behind his back, I tried to wait patiently, unaware of what was to be told. 'You're to get to the cauldron in the middle of the night and look through the small hole which had been exposed through it, right at the pocket. Though it may not have been a way for it to escape, its influence should have no effect on a good man, which, I have no doubt that everyone else may suspect you may not be what you claimed yourself to be.' Petty arrogance came and left, there was something extremely rabid in the way he spoke. Even as he pondered and despite there being no consequence if he had declined, he accepted. 'If you're a vile man, you realise you may not survive such an influence and even such a transformation, right? You would be bound to be part of what else might be desired at to be benignly chased out of the form of a man and into something which may have a need to be put down.' 'Don't listen to them.' Said the young priestess, which had undoubtedly seen some good in the eyes of the man. But neither could she say with certainty that this fellow in front of her had anything to do with the likes of a kind and gentle creature as a human being had been. Would he sit down and be felled? There wasn't any way of knowing. It would be such a cruel thing to look away, but the night came and the scoundrels had arrived as well. 'If I am not wrong, I may have a look at them, see?'

A pause had come, akin to the pocket knowing that something out of it would be sought after. The trail of smoke had stopped in the night as seemingly, it had given sight to the change. No one would notice it as well in the dark. Not to mention that there was another thing which was coming. I was about to enter its close range, while most of the other divine figures and the two other knights were sleeping. From the distance, I had been made aware, by a trick of light that hadn't been seen by another man that I was being watched.

Varionkth

Machines could not be trusted on their own as it happened for them to be alive by means which were unnecessarily there. Above them lay the insides of men, which had been stolen and disjointed by unlawful terms from their inside with the sole scope of the decimation of the various fractures which had been hidden there. What lay inside of them now seemed to be a couple of extra pumps which kept pushing through with the entire scope of trying or attempting to lay them quietly in their own terms of speech. It turned out that the attempt at reanimation had been turned and misshapen to some false grandeur which couldn't be thought off on its own. By that, the first words had come into passing and they had been close to being mistrusted by those who listened to every mutter and misalignment of bodily fluids which followed the trench. 'We must be brought close so we may breed.' A maddening thing to say, especially since, by no means whatsoever had they been programmed to say such a thing. Little had it mattered that it was even closer to such a disgrace in its filth that it began shoving itself closer. And closer and closer until one of them had reached another. No man lived, no human being. No living entity had there been in any distant place. Life had been barren, machines malfunctioned. They were there with the sole reason which had come after the decimation of the corpses which had been somewhat kept in good conditions to be harvested later. And farther away from them, there had been something akin to an entire grave filled with many bodies such as those from which they harvested the organs. It had come to be. There, they had bred with one another, giving life to some kind of human-like condition which knew nothing else but some kind of suffering which couldn't be explain. Oh, woe, the sight had been terrible. 'I must feel what it is like to be a man.' One said as it had pumped the organs, shoving them against cold steel, only to crush them into a mess of guts, bile and blood. Nothing had resulted from this so-called procreation but some kind of divine bile which couldn't have been thought off. If something had been wrong and wretched, it couldn't be named. But that mess it had created could only mean that there was another span which would collect the mess from the ground. Had that been the purpose all along? Could it be that there was something to be born out of this maddening creation? As another machine came there in order to take the bile out of the ground, the walls against which it splashed as well, suddenly, there came something from it which made it stop. This ancient machine which had acted like some kind of cleaner had been grabbed to a hold or to some closure. It had deactivated itself upon the sight of the formation which had been actually been given birth just then. Alas, it stood there, out of the cogs and many piles of machinations which had lain on the ground, which had been brought to some kind of power out of the coming electricity, there it stood, benignly unaware of its own living status. Some kind of bizarre form laid on top of its head, as the many twists around the guts had coiled and connected with the tubes which pushed against the top. From its body, there came an extension from its innards which encompassed eight quarters around its area which had been made out of some transparent womb. In it it grew. Something had to be said as the breeders, or so-called progenitors stopped what they had attempted to copy and looked at it. 'Could that be a forming child? Look at it, such a beauty be dreaded by machine and lifeless body alike. It is living by no means of program or error.' But the computers who started through their cameras had already locked the doors and the ways in and out. There was some kind of contamination taking place there and it couldn't be prevented from pushing inward then forward. There it had been, for, by the end of the eight hour, every breeder in the room had been caught in that transparent womb and forced to work towards the growth of the fetus than for themselves. It was to be understood that the likes of their own couldn't have been caught off then. No amount of cope and wonder, the misinterpretation of a man had failed. Many were dead out of the many coils which had pierced through the panels and through the floors in order to eat and grab a hold of as many materials as it could get a grasp of. Such was it that it continued through something close to being monotone. In a couple of hours, there was no human being which hadn't been contaminated. This so-called attempt to revive the human race had failed and having observed that, the computers shut themselves down. Now, it laid there, an entity which had itself in care as well as it had had control over every machine and mechanical entity which laid there. Nothing else of the kind mattered and there was dread. Everyone had been declared dead, both by means of laceration and organ malformation. Not only had their minds been completely crushed alongside their brains, but their bodies had been cut into malignant pieces and had been spread around in various corners around the many rooms which lay there. Nothing else mattered to it. Walls had been torn down and inside of them, there had been forced some kind of hive. It was made so it could store its own dark talons as the forceful growth had shared some kind of silent approach. Had there been another way? Nay, they had failed humanity and by no means could the machines stop the growth of the fetus. A few bodies lay by the side. Inside of there, some kind of trickery had turned what had been in them some kind of manipulated version of themselves. Though the outsides remained unchanged, what appeared to be inside had been nothing else but the exact mirror of what had laid on the outside? Yet from every angle there had been another face and another pair of arms and hands and legs until there had been four reflections or four duplicates of the same person. And in the middle, what had separated them from seeing or even being aware of one another there seemed to be the world. In its entirety, there seemed to be a copy of the entire planet, on which they all walked and felt drawn in at the same time. Neither of whom would be aware of one another's existence. Rather, it had been something extremely peculiar in the way they acted as there appeared to be some kind of strange drawing force which couldn't help it but make them look and stare into the distance. Of this world, something had been seriously distorted, to the point where naught could lay but the sudden awareness that something was wrong. 'Deity, patron or whoever may listen, please do well and tell me why, could there be some reason for which I would be stricken like this? Despite me trying to walk forwardly, I can only move by the side. My limbs are unresponsive and I have nothing but this distant feeling which reminds me of the fact that I had been cursed.' To which there could be no response, nothing whatsoever, no reason for which there could lay by any sight. Simply put, it wasn't right, by any means. There could be dread, there could be something but it wasn't. And every other corpse which lay around in the same room had been in the exact same stance of mind as he had been. A sudden realization that they were suddenly stricken by some kind of strange morbidity which couldn't be felt. Such a thing would soon be distant for one of them. 'Markus, I have been told I am.' 'Are you, why, am I called the same?' Responded Markus to himself. As opposed to the others, he had been truly cursed with an unexplainable thing. He couldn't see the other ones but he could hear them. It had been strange and awkward, it had been rather bizarre, in the way they had looked and crept upon his ear, he couldn't think of nothing else but the voices he could hear. When other strangers passed he would be silent. But outside town, inside a crooked alley whence he hid, he finally gave in upon the wait and spoke to them. 'Oh, how I bitterly escape the sight and ear of the others. I fear what they might've thought of me if they had heard.' 'But, stranger, friend, oh, fellow voice, I have felt the same.' 'So have I.' It suddenly revealed itself, self-aware for the first time, as it had busted out of its own shyness, from which, without a doubt, it couldn't have escaped without prying in. 'There are three of us then?' 'Four, for I have joined and I am seething with rage. My wrath lay in the fact that I have been exposed in the likes of a creeping foul beast of a man. Hear me, voices in my mind, as I shall make my way back and punish those whom had dared look down upon me, as less of a man and more of a madman.' The others had been silent and couldn't help but wait for something to happen or something which may take that feeling away. It was something which inwardly pushed to the point of feeling dreadfully unaware and peculiarly afraid. Of what had happened, to either themselves or the others, no man could say. For another starving creature appeared. He couldn't be called a man, he had stricken himself in the head as a poor attempt or in the habit of dealing with the voices he heard. It seemed like there, he spoke. As a matter of fact they all spoke. 'One hole for one man, four for the others.' No man lay in his mind, he had been left as blind on three different sides. Only one side of his own could see. But more importantly was the fact that, as each of them spoke in unison, a mere chance had been that only one of them could be heard by each of the four men who had looked upon this creature and the peculiar clothes he wore. There had been no distinction from the kind of kink there had been. One blind man tried sniffing as he felt the scent, oh, the perfume which had come from a snatch. 'I feel her scent and I want her.' 'Could this man be right in the head? Look, he is blind.' 'Blind, he is, that I can see, there's no need for you to note.' 'But the two of you are wrong or petty liars.

Filthy voices in the head, oh, how I thought I may just trust you. Though you must be nothing but the voices of madness which come forward and throw yourself at me like some kind of dreadful vile daemons who want nothing else but disturb. I can see it with my very own eyes, this man is not blind but he is rather well to do. There's nothing wrong with him, but his appearance as his stance.' Bent at the knees and mad in the head. This was a vile man, he had been peculiar, and he had been stricken and bent like some kind of ill, filthy and tormented creature which held no ilk to him. He would be a beggar otherwise, if it weren't for the fact that he was mad. 'But it is clear that you are the one who's lying, dead man.' 'What did you say?' Something had gone terribly wrong, as it seemed, or looked, in the way or the manner in which I had reacted. 'Go and check it downstairs.' 'I will do it. Immediately, sir.' One light kept flickering at times. Another one followed one the trail leading to the reactor. It had been cold down there and wet, those nasty cold things had gathered around the rounded pulp which lay forth on the glass, with the means of which nothing but that peculiar thing could be noted of. It stared and it was damaging to the eyes. No one could stare at it but it did follow us whenever we went down there. Half an hour went by and there had been no sign of a return. Clearly something had happened there. 'Is he coming back?' 'No, send another man down there and fix the damn light. One of them has to eventually get to it.' 'But we lost eight men.' 'And we can lose at least eight times that amount if it saves more than we can spare. Now, get to it.' Same way. Same downward path, the cluster, those globes of steely glass, against which they snuck against and suckled at the mere preparatory kind of tease the men were.

And they taunted with their meat warmth and the way they were alive. It wasn't so outside the facility, and the abandoned spectrum which had lain on the other side of the complex. But outside, they had been surrounded by the cold and the exposure to its dreadful nature and the likes which had been called into action. No man looked forward to being lost or as to be unaware to what was going on. Clearly one of them had stopped and laid there. 'One of my colleagues, you seem.' His body had still been warm. Perhaps this could've been the man that had gone before him. Nay, it wasn't. He had been groped a few times around the arm and chest. The marks left by those hands had been deep and imprinted themselves against his body. That alone had made it clear that something had gone wrong.

Clearly, more so than anything else, it came to him that he would lay within himself those things which were unnerving. Different hand shapes had grappled the body. Some of them weren't human. 'The lights, man, have you taken care of them already?' 'I'm on my way, sir, this was a mere distraction, nothing more. I'm bound to reach it by some means, I think, just give me a chance. Damn it, he broke off.' There it was, deep enough that he had lost contact. And there hadn't been a sight of the outside either. He had been alone, for far too long that he would return to his senses. It was unclear, as to think that there would be any kind of redemption or some chance for him to come back and draw in it with himself in some unnatural way. But he was lost there, and the lights kept flickering. Eight more hours passed and men had been lost. It was starting to get cold, incredibly cold, too cold for verdure, hath been the saying. Unclear as to what it means, there were enough men there to figure it out. 'It's getting colder on the outside as well, sir. I don't think the core might work for long unless restarted. And if it doesn't..' 'I know what it means for us if it doesn't.' 'That thought seemed likely to be the cause of his night losses. The sleep, the slumber, the pair of men which had been sent through, it couldn't have been conceived otherwise. Nothing could, nothing meant, for their likes weren't similar by any means. Such was it that in some coping amount of rue, there was something close to parting words. A party of men ventured and neither returned. Their sight had been of broken glass and blood. It wasn't obvious who started it, but the battered marks left by one whom punched it made it ever so clear. It had been the work of a man, who acted in some aggressive manner which couldn't have been excused. Now, the entire perimeter had been lost due to the exposure. Many of the lights stopped flickering at least, as they had stopped being lit in their entirety. It was there that they looked, the men who had been shut in their own rooms. The upper level had been the last to receive the auxiliary unit of power. Soon, it was only to fade as the last of its units of electricity were to be left over and abandoned. Into laying and into hiding, as he lay, the master projector made due with the heat. Some means of desperation came, but it was there, beyond the door. And many men fell prey to its cold grasp. Even their very core which had kept everyone alive had fallen without a chance for it to get forth. Such a disturbance of woe couldn't have been called or abandoned. It had to be left there. Paranoia and delusions followed as the first sings of loss came. The flicker of the lights around the upper level, which only brought on the recollection of something bad which was about to happen had occurred for the first time in a long period. They had been left exposed, the heat faded like some phantasm and it seemed that first, before the light could go off, there came off the door. And it had been as cold inside as there had been outside. Their voices had appeared and there seemed to be some kind of lost interest which couldn't have gone awry if it had attempted by any other means. It was clear who was listening and who was there, watching and trying to listen to them speak. Then the men were no more, and the heat had died and those things had lain dormant ever since. Clearly there was something in there. I wasn't sure what it was at first, in some way, I believe my vision may have been a tiny bit too blurry from the gas. There was something to it, which couldn't be shaken off, regardless of how hard I may have attempted to look into it. And the memory of how I felt whilst being in it seemed to have been called off into question. There was the sight of it, still sitting in my mind even then. Something sharp at its edges, the rock formation from which I started knocking with the metallic end of my climbing axe. Most of it had dissipated in the air as soon as I was done trying to knock and make a hole through it. Something even closer to the scent made me feel like I wasn't the same person who had entered the cave. 'Do you claim to have recalled something you may have seen on your way out?' 'I can't seem to remember anything I may have said on our previous sessions.' 'But you seem to have some kind of recollection of there being previous session you've attended to, would that be correct?' 'I suppose it is. Why am I questioned of this? I thought there was something you had to know. I think I remember there being a letter, from which I couldn't mind but look and ask myself through and through, why is it that you called me? Why were you so desperate for me attending to another one of these peculiar things?' 'No one sent for you. What are you talking about?' Something had been wrong ever since, ever since that gas entered in contact. There being another session with the psychiatric ward. And there having had a conversation which ended far too abruptly for me to remember. Retracing my steps to where I had stood that day had been hard. It was by some pure coincidence or that of a mad chance that I have found my way back home to get my bag and my equipment. My nostrils had a sickly goo-like pile suddenly dripping from its channel. So many things hadn't made a lot of sense. The streets I was on seemed to have been like the places where I lay or where cars moved on the other side. Many of the plates had been the same, with a slightly immeasurable, barely visible eye, if it weren't for some kind of inert blindness which couldn't be exploited, there would've been something to it. One letter changed or missing, cars turned onto the wrong side. Some strangers had been staring at me as if I had been some mightily deranged person who might not be trusted. Such, or less than aware of it, I had made it inside the cave. The scent permeated still in my presence and I could see now the trail which had been left behind. There were glow sticks tied together with some long and sturdy black string, if it weren't as thick enough to be a rope. Someone had made it there before I had the chance to return in time and it looked like, whoever that may be, this stranger wanted me to follow. Disturbingly unaware of there being something which couldn't be cropped or looked upon, I seemed to have messed with the idea of there being various thoughts at stake. There was a person there who was clearly as mad as to expect me to return. More than that, he knew who I was. He had to know personal information of me, it had to be. Not only have I taken a good look and a grasp of that rope, carrying with me all of those light-inducing toes, but I have also looked upon the surrounding walls. What I had seen were the scribbles and the various words which had been written at a stake which couldn't have been anything else but the writings of a paranoid stalker. My home address, my phone number, crude drawings of my face, the colour of my eyes, pictures of various places which had been taken with me in the shots, that's to what point it had come to lay. In such a measure as for me to know where I could turn my head, there seemed to be only one moment in which I had been aware enough as to draw back. And there, my head had just avoided a falling rock. It had been there that I wish that rock would've put an end to me and to my life. Without a warning or without woe, my lungs had drawn in the gas and I have gone somewhat mad. In such a state as I had previously been in, nothing could compare to what it had been now. 'What do you think it happened next?' But there she was, unable to speak. I had taken her life, the poor ward lying dead there. Worse than that, I seemed to have dragged her all the way to my house, managing to reproduce the entire way back, exactly in the same manner, leading to the cave. I had been seen by men and people who seemed alarmed enough to call the authorities on me. Nothing else mattered now as I lay inside the cave, in a bed of my own doing, out of the rope made out of glowing toes, I seemed to have lost myself in the dark. There, it seemed likely that me and the ward had been sleepwalkers, caught off into our penile walk, unable to get up from wherever we have found ourselves in. More importantly, as it had been, there, we took in the gas for one last time. Both us, together, lost in the inside of the caves, my head smashed in by one of the rocks. 'But you don't have to worry, warden, I feel no pain any longer, I feel no more wonder and what I may have done.' That had been it, which made it clear as soon as there was a bit of lid shed upon its surface. Something had been given, or taken, apparent from the discovery, as it had been made clear enough as mightily Herokronus approached. His sight had lain upon the missing form of some long forgotten steel bar. Unknown to him, to look upon it as to judge what it may be, it had been made clear, as to what seemed to be the form of a rather, long and hollow bar or tube. From it he only needed to pinch a piece of it until he had managed to release the gas which had been stored so deeply inside of it. There came the strange lack of awareness he felt, whilst going through vision after vision, one of which seemed to have made him unaware. He had changed, now as he lay, he spoke still in his dialect of Greek but appeared not only to have been caught in his own affairs of matter of mind but also, had it been otherwise peculiar in nature, he would've thought of himself as some kind of lay demon who seemed to have leaped into his true form. And that form had been that of some young boy, who had been lost in the dark, afraid. What were those strange things in his hand?

For him it looked, rather, that he had been using some kind of flaming whip, with which he had tormented some poor woman, stricken and dressed in madly worn apparel around her body. Were those things belonging to some robe which had been used for some mad ritual? In awe he started as he had been assaulted by lights which had come from somewhere but weren't adjacent to no torch. What had they been in the likeness of some eye or some mad shape now pushed forward with sharpness and some block-like hardness which was benignly similar to some club. It would be used to batter and to strike, to no end of which, no man could be like that, of which he was. His vileness couldn't have been matched there, for he had now lived like the vile creep he thought himself to be. Now, his most vile dreams could be enable, in the means of which he whipped and strangled the first man he had gotten a hold on.

And instead of hands, there they had been some stumps which had shaped themselves in three large forms, as to grapple him. They converged and grew upon his own clothes and now seemed to leave an imprint of growths on the man's clothes as well. He had left him there as small bolts of fire had come into his general direction. Whoever those who hunted him were, irrelevant as their identities or their likes had been like, it seemed likely that they had fallen prey upon themselves in order to begin their hunt. They surrounded their lost lamb as he had noticed and seemed to attempt some kind of ritual of mending. He had been injured and that disease, as Herokronus had spied, seemed to have immediately jumped onto them before it started the devouring process. This strange contamination seemed to have small growths like toes coming from their insides and then, after three bodies lay adjacent to one another, like the flames or torches he had such a desire of, now they finally emitted their growth. And woe it is to the young man who had found himself in the body of such a stature. The man had been know and cherished, as a lover, a man and a political opponent. He had chosen to find a lone place where he would die rather than change hope with a younger one who might kill him instead. But he had no way of knowing or even so much as to care about what was going on. This was not only the body of a stranger, but a body he had entered. And it was strange, being in another body, far too strange for any kind of comfort to be had. Soon, his own senses would creep and do him harm. He lay there, somewhat unarmed, unable to remember what to feel. 'What have I done? Whom have I killed?' He chose to wander and now lay upon a sight of beauty, such architecture in a prime of which no man from his era should've looked upon. His eyes lay in a somewhat dark nature, which desired to explore and meet those beneath him. There lay a pool made out of the springs which fell from his straight above, which appeared to be no less clear than what it had been. Dangerously unaware, he chose to go ahead and lay as peculiarly stagnant as to know. 'Who are you people?' But neither one of them understood what he said. They looked as if this had been in, a journey not of the end, not a means of him giving in what had been said or told, but some kind of unawareness which couldn't be gotten a hold of. It was the time he had forgotten and seen as the senile thing he had become. And whilst some came and spoke in their language, of which, he could only vaguely point at, the dialect of which was mostly unknown to him, there seemed to be some anger now. What lay to him was a strange dexterity and woe which couldn't have been told, as quickly as he leaped on his feet he ran. From them and as it came, he planned on getting through as far away as he might get a hint at, at both the wonder and awareness of what was to come. It was a strange defilement of the vile, which could be told through the lenses of a man who had killed. That had been it, as it came to him, he had remembered what he'd done. There should be no surprise whatsoever, as to take a closer look upon the edge which seemed to have crept in through the rummaging clouds above. No longer contained within itself, it had come to be rather clear, especially with what was going on, the various on-lookers who started at their end. Something was coming from the graces above and it had become clear that there wasn't going to be any kind of redemption for either watcher in their wake. Some looked, others wept, and it was clear that the least of it, as it had come to be known would fall on the children. They were laying there, playing and watching through the cold and waiting in the snow. 'Father, what is that thing?' 'Do not be afraid child, it's, it's, I think it's a shard of ice coming from that point, that black moot that has always been there in the graces of the ether, where only cold can be and where there's no head to warm and melt it.' 'I don't understand, father.' 'My son, that thing is only a giant piece of ice which was bound to come. No one listened and no one attempted to heat up the sky and this is what happened.' 'Are we going to be hit by it then?' 'I can't know for certain as of yet, but I suppose the possibility remains, there could be something wrong coming in our way yet.' The train engines were going at it in some motions which couldn't be held up to the standards of men. They had not only gone beyond but it had been a strange disparity between them. Plenty of the citizens were fleeing from sight, even though the many woes, it had been assimilated by the many curious uncertainties which had been for the like. Danger stood in the marsh water, but that pond had been left sunken and frozen. Both so, at the attempt to flee, the Crook's family seemed to be in one of those trains. Soon to leave, many remained. 'Most will ye booze, I think I'll have another pint. Scram off now, this one be mine. I think there's no other way than this one now, get it? They won't make the same mistake as to look at us any more different than it had been.' Clever thing, it seemed likely that he had turned himself into a drunk with the other bums as well. 'Hey, look.' 'What does your old stuffed mouth say to me now? I can't see past me old two tooth-cut boots now and what you're asking of me is.' To look there, in the direction he pointed. It seemed like, it looked like a young lad who had been there alone, going by the small ice blocks, jumping from one to another with boots who seemed unlike those them worse but somewhat worse. Somehow, as they had managed to understand themselves, it seemed likely that they were the ones who were in the right. They were living the high life compared to the young fellow there. The same one who fell off his chin and almost broke off his back. 'Not that sharp of a lad is he?' 'He won't be that sharp of an anything if that thing decides to suddenly engage in its act of falling, will it?' There seemed to be a red light which was crossing there, from torch to torch, in an attempt to extinguish everything. Now, the streets had been inhabited not by the likes of men but the apparitions of cold. Either that or they had all shared too many a drink. 'Lad, young lad, laddie, what's going on there? Please, answer us, tell of something which be going here. Where are your parents?' The lad suddenly turned, to reveal a harkened expression on his face. His dark eyes, dark hair but sudden paleness, which hadn't come from the cold raised itself up to his chin. It had already been too late for him to be reunited with his parents as the train had already left, but what kind of monsters would forget such a tiny man? 'I'm an orphan, my good sirs.' And plenty if well to do, well educated at that as well. He had been a pioneer of life, one tiny man who was left there, in some place cold, abandoned, left to his own.' 'What of the other children?' The other man asked. But that had been when the chance of expressions had come to be. The lad had only looked at the sky and despite there not being any kind of reflection having been manifested from that distance on the shard, he still gave the impression that he stared at himself. It was something which lasted in-between the likes of a few seconds and came to be left there before dissipating immediately away. 'I'm alone, can't you see? All of my siblings in the orphanage had died.' Such a strong delivery came from one so young. It hadn't had to be that way, and neither of them had supposed to be sober then, but it was, by some unquestionable means, how they might look upon him and wonder. 'Will you join us then, young lad? Sir, I suppose, there's not much we can offer, only the bulk of some hit or two, know this, we may only offer you entry through some locked door and what not. That thing doesn't look likely to move on and fall off any time sooner. So I guess, from that point of view that we would be fine in that regard.' 'There are a few places I wanted to visit. You know, if you don't mind me saying, or the very least, if you don't mind helping me get to them.' A sparkle of fire seemed to have ignited in the lad's eye. It seemed like nothing at first, but he couldn't make any kind of difference from stranger and friend any longer. Only a few testimonials could be saved, apparently. That's mainly the way it's been whilst being in a town which was being dwarfed by the cold. It would be easier to lay an eye by the side and wait, yet there were so many of them spread across town. In a few particular homes, there's been evidence of the sort. 'Day twenty eight, the first signs had been shown. It looked likely, or more so that I wouldn't have made it through this winter, not by the likes in which it had been presented. The people have stopped even giving a slight damn to what was on its way, but I had known it. I have known you'd come through and pierce through them and their thick skulls. Have I not been worthy? Have I not been chosen to warn them? Now look at what it had become.' The words had been scribbled with blood and served as nothing less than a prediction of what had come. In a sudden burst or some flash of light, the cold blue steel-like mirror from above seemed to have turned in some strong, embedded red which couldn't stand itself but glow in its glory. There wasn't any doubt as to what it had entailed. Its strange poison had been such as it had been, through the likes of which no bloody rod could point and grain, for that taint, that liquid which had been apparent not only inhabited its mark, its cold tooth but seemed to have spread around town. Now, a silken crimson changed and enveloped everything in a coat of its own poison. There had been something dreadful to it, by the likes of which no creeping terror might do. Such harm had been thrown to the like, that it had been pushed inwardly to itself. That red poison which brought some unquestionable terror then, as blue completely changed to it. Tiny snowflakes became bloodied with the terror they had brought and now. Now the cold had turned to heat. It had been something which had been felt throughout the land and seemed to cure itself by and by. Less likely than it had been, there was something strange, a danger, a stance of terror which took within itself that. That dreadful cure, to the child and the vagrants who hid away seemed to reach an end. Another note. 'There will come, I have seen it in my dreams, spread across the very end from which it sprouted. I will have known then, after seeing it that I had died. My body will have been tormented no longer by the wonder which lies. Will they find out of the end? How might they take it and by what means? Neither of them can understand what you are and what you will become. They seem to dance and bring joy upon their servants, in their bars and hidden places, such a thing was something which may only bring back their happy ends. They cannot see and fail to realise what's there. Nothing's waiting for them, no more will they have themselves in such awareness and such fear that they might do upon themselves as the others.' And then, the flashing colour of red, bloodied upon itself hardened and came to liquor like any other. Each drop which fell from the main structure was doing some kind of disturbing thing which could only break and smash that of which existed in its own space. Such a dreadful thing lay only with the phantasms which appeared to share the same appearance and the same kind of feeling in which they laid. Much worse, as they had looked from the train, there seemed to be an explosion or some kind of impulse as to blow of red. And it itself, there appeared to be a peculiarness and a rage which surmounted the sights of those who watched. They had been nervous as to see it lain in ruin. Such as it had been, their eyes turned into a deeper shade of the same crimson which lay there and in a quick dismissal of guts, they became enraged from having being forced into the same position. Madness couldn't be accounted for another, or so it seemed. 'Lad, you must get away from this place, as fast as possible.' 'But what of you?' 'We won't make.' The poor bum seemed to have fallen on his knees and lost a nail or two. Even two of the likes never made it through, past their own minds, as it just so happened for them to be caught off guard. It seemed so, ever so presently that they could lay awake through the night. In it, there had been some kind of sight, or unawareness, or woe. Strongly, or more than so, it had been agreed by the phantasms who watched, to manifest their bodies and enter the hold which held the door erect. And their bodies had been made out of some poignant red hardened liquid which couldn't be accounted for. It would be even less than likely to be called into action. But such a reaction as of an attempt at resistance seemed to leave one of the men crippled and the other one, who already stood on the floor, resting as a dead man. He stood there, bleeding himself, having it taken and drawn from it like he had been some kind of storage object rather than what used to be a man. It had a strange effect, taking his blood, kind of visionary per say. The phantasms felt this kind of dizziness which prevented them from taking anything into account, especially what happened then. For, now that they were solid, now that they were something more than apparitions, it seemed like there could be nothing to be attained from it. No amount of uncertainty remained. These beings were drunk and looked for no child as of now, for as long as it mattered, the child had escaped. It appeared that the man who was trying his best to get through the rummaging of those strangers only now came to a direction. Until then, it was never likely to be called into action, for as long as they went through, there seemed to be a direct connection between the like of man and the stranger. Gaseous remains still appeared to be getting through him, as a matter of looking forward in some kind of epitome of dead rock formations. There, nears the ponds, after the fountains, he had sipped the gas before he could be reached. It seemed too peaceful then, as he did it, being unable to feel a thing at the distant reach, which couldn't have been accounted for. More than dreadful, the realization came, when the young man found himself in another body, being that of another man, who had been wearing a uniform. Unknown to him as it had been, there was another effect which had proceeded forth in any case. Somewhat unapparent to him, it was clear that he could live in through the strangeness and peculiar stance which had been taken there. In a distant reality, where the old greek now waged in pity as his body faded from the scorched cave in which he lay. Certainly he would've thought himself dead, deceased, unable to survive any longer, or at least not after he'd been caught off in such a manner in which he could've called in itself benignly unaware of what was to be. It was a show, a masquerade of faces, all of which were dead to him. He had been displaced in a cold facility where neither man upon whom he had looked upon seemed alive. There was something to one, in the way he jerked his face and acted, clearly, he had been caught off guard in the midst of pushing forward. He would've stepped on one of those things which appeared there. Not even the animals could defile their forms in such a way. Below him lay a long piece of rubbery and brute-like pumping filled matter. It had blown itself on the ground and appeared to have come in terms with getting itself into the watch. This was a man who was supposed to be dead. His body had been cold, he could barely walk, breathe, or even show any kind of light in his eyes. Yet, inside of him, there had been that Greek, whom had not only rose through the fruitful alacrity which his own self provided, but he also came to wait. He knew, too well, as he had lived inside a creature which was no man, not to underestimate those things. And they were many, and many of the had been spread across the facility as they appeared not to shed any kind of fear or mad delight. They would put up no fight for now, as he had observed, closely called into question, for as long as there was some kind of way to avoid it. Bodily, they were weak and seemed to have domed their own forms or flattened themselves there. It was then that he stopped watching and started marching on. Some kind of trick or illusion had taken place. For that strange deformation had been too sudden and it seemed only likely that there was some work of some deity he had no faith in which that could bring him closer to disgust. He wouldn't trust none other than himself there. As the door opened and down there, he looked only at what seemed to be the dark. Every now and then, after trying to notice queerly through the motion, that, there would be some kind of entry. Some way laid for him to get through, he would be guided there. Towards that point there lay a light, a strong one which was flashing and coming on, dragging with each second, waiting for him to approach. Farther than that, he had looked upon opened and broken domed windows, which he promptly inspected. 'It's clear where you've come from, but you don't appear to bleed.' He spoke to that one piece of rubbery rounded, butchered creature which lay in its own frozen circle. It hadn't been any liquid there, by the likens alone, it could've been anything, certainly something which could be, rather, some strangeness of the metal which appeared. Far from over, as it had been, the sky darkened and that change came to be inside the facility as well. As the light faded from the blue, there came the red. And in its most basic form, this light turned the ones in the facility dreadfully confused, to the point where they would become enraged. At the mere fact that starvation couldn't be pointed or pulled off, he strove forward. Tempted, as he had been, he stopped and took on the chance. He started devouring the creature which had lain there. Though his guts weren't properly working, he found it that he could go on forth and do something to himself. It would come as it may, that no amount of uncertainty could delay that thing. Everything, everywhere else had been so formal, as in the city for example, where the kid watched and went forth, seeing some kind of mirage in front of his eyes. As in, what if those things weren't phantasms at all, but some kind of people from other dimensions which entered their own? And what if how they were coming through, in a disturbing mirage of their original forms, they had been replaced with the closest thing their human minds could process? What had happened to his mind? Why could the lad think so clear? It had been a clear growth which had almost popped his skull open. In it, a tumor, which had manifested as an effect of the red light now appeared to force his every thought inside of it, getting to a point where he had been mentally aged for a short span of time. Or at least for as long as he would be alive. There had been misery in the air and despair. Something wasn't right by no means and no account of the strangers which had entered the building. Each seemed to have a distinct look to them which couldn't be forced to bear by any means the like or the mark of arrogance. They were tied after all. Everyone inside the room seemed to stare at the strangers who had entered the flat. A distinct noise came out of the piece of rope which connected them like some twisted conjoined brothers. More importantly, as it had been, there was that, the fact that it had been inside of them, rather than outside. It was clear, as to be looked upon by the passers, what was going on. Merely said, there had been some kind of hope to it. But they didn't make it so apparent at first. 'What are you staring at?' 'You think you know me you cunt?' 'Pull them down, man or let me drop mine.' 'Aye let him have one, will you? He won't scrape for long there.' Their tongues and mouths were as dirty as one could care to make it seem. In no particular order could they stare or dare pay and heed. For theirs alone had been a breed of despair. Eyes were embedded on their clothes; they were wearing some kind of modified robes, which is why they immediately pulled some kind of cover over their heads, only so they might hide. No credence could make it seem like they would be denied. In their like alone, as it had been, there would be only that. 'Do not hurt me, I'm not a drunk.' But one of the louts had been taken, compared to which they seemed like some kind of brutish creatures rather than men. Such things couldn't be forgotten or named. It was only that in their pain, the one which they so desperately wanted to force others to face, they shuddered. Men cowered at their sight, even the maidens who turned around and tried to hide. Alas, the door had opened again. A cold wind, the shudder of which had only come seemed to bring the alarm, the despair they had felt. Another dreadful man had come, he was ill-looking, by the mere presence, and it seemed likely that he stopped breathing for a while. The door closed and as soon as it had, so had the fire vanished from sight. Heat died within them and their very hearts as this one had come to no mind of his own. There would be something there, at least, if it would be called otherwise in play. 'Greetings, I have come to take you back to the grave.' 'But we're not dead, we have not been slain in battle, nor in words, haven't we taken the lives of our own but.' In a turn, which had included one of his brothers, there he was their last sibling dead. It happened so quickly that he had grabbed a blade which only entered his own side. This, he could not abide by any means, which only made it so, he stared. Two brothers lay in front of him. His blue pelt, bluish from the cold appeared to lie nigh. He was a vile man, he had been so ever since he had been alive. That creature, villain, the compressor started. Soon enough, he found himself alone. 'It seems likely that the ever-moment draws near, when you are to be next in line. Look at him, your brothers lay dead, in a fate which is ever-coming for you as well.' This fiend, this mad knight had been right. There, in the presence of his own, to his remark, stood his brother still, on his feet erect. He hanged himself only to lay there like some insult, like an injury, like a way for him to know that a piece of that rope which tied them had been used as an inflammatory thing, deadly in its method. To no saying word, to which he would pay some kind of attention, suddenly he had made himself be aware of it. Such a glory to be met alone. Like a contender to his own life. 'I won't take mine, worry, not. I won't go as cowardly as my brothers have.' And as he said it, he slowly backed as this cold man, dressed in armour but with no helmet to protect his pale face, this fiend had come. On his way, fiercely pushed back by this laboriously working knight, he accidentally pushed and forced his brother's corpse onto the ground. He'd been pulled with him, only to the point where he stared above him at the approaching sign. 'If you won't take yours, then it will be mine for the taking. Be wary of it, though, for I shall not be gentle and I'll make sure there'll be something to it in some way or another. We may not be brothers but I have a single thought that you may know who I am.' And then, in a sudden urge, he pulled himself back onto his feet and dragged himself with too much of suddenness, that he found his sides being ripped apart by the ropes. Now, as he had been bleeding all over, he managed to get one of the maidens who had lain underneath one of the tables. 'Come any near and I shall take her life. Don't push me to it, don't force me, or else I'll do it. I will be tormented no longer.' Everyone looked in shock as his olive skinned barbarian, bleeding as he were, grabbed the poor maiden all upon himself. A glimpse of the knight's eyes almost made him stare. There was something lacking inside of them, almost as if he hadn't any care himself. 'Where have you taken that knife from?' He asked, expecting, perhaps, to him being told, no answer to that question. 'From one of my brothers.' He responded. There had been a few close calls inside the mansion. A lot of tension laid there, in the midst of some late summer, while the debris already laid on itself. A peculiar thing to say the least, some sign which appeared on the property, twenty feet away from the metal fence which surrounded it. Someone had left it there, by the looks of it, during the night, one scoundrel managed to leap over and cross. Tense as he had been, it looked clear and intense, in the likes of pushing onward for the dread which had been felt. No one dared say a word, or mutter the chant. Half of the mansion had already appeared again, like some made duplicate which joined itself as some sort of continuation. The guests had been woken up during the night, as were the servants, who had been instructed not to allow anyone to come in and check what was going on there. After all, there could be something down there, most of them being unaware, though it seemed likely that one of them had managed to carry on and push onward. Most of the faith had gone, as two trusted Negroes followed their master through. Agamemnon turned and looked at them, with a fanciful expression of distaste. Afterwards, he switched again towards the other side of the mansion and seemed to draw in the call. 'Make sure that all those bodies get disposed of, do you hear me? I can't deal with this, especially at this hour. There's something truly unjust if one's to call in just by the watch.' He had looked at what a mess that had been, half bodies lying there, on the various sides of the floors, looking rather uninterestingly empty. There was no blood in them, which made it even clearer. Agamemnon hadn't any concern and wasn't even disturbed by the likes. It seemed, so, every presently that he could only think of himself and how he had managed to draw in those things. Wretched abominations who resided in that side of the mansion. They looked at his succulent dark servants but not at him. For the common eye they only appeared like some kind of weird twist, like broken glass which had been connected in some peculiar substance, only that each side seemed to have been manifested in a piece of furniture or some limb. And there was the blood which had been so sought after. It was clear enough for whom it were. 'Those should be harmless as long as you don't approach them. Do not make eye contact by any means. I shall deal with my guests in the meantime.' 'But master, I.' 'Not a word Bartholomew, I have faith that you may carry one with the task I have instructed you with. Do not disappoint me; I shall not make it any less clear than that. I will set forth the fur and make it so no blood gets muttered on it.' 'Yes master, I'll do. Come on Alam, master threw us forth.' While he had been gone, the Negroes seemed to pay no heed to the advice of the Baron, quite likely, it had been that they couldn't even care of the fact, especially since they were unseen. Something rather dangerous now came to be. As soon as the door closed, those things went away. But they haven't. They were ever-present, for they could still be felt out there, especially by the Negroes who had been a trifle paranoid. It couldn't be accounted for now, the death of two additional lost servants in there, as they had found themselves thrown, like some abandoned trash or the likes of the lowest scum, like which they had felt in the last moment of their lives. And their deaths hadn't come from above, rather, properly as it had been thought off, they had died for over exposure to their own bodies. It was almost as if, the closer and the longer they stared at their own selves, and felt their own scent and stood there in their own presence, the harder it had become for them to be whole. 'I don't feel that well, big brother. I don't think I'm going to make it through the swamp.' 'What are you?' The way he lay there, submerged in the wooden floor seemed to give him so extreme amount of tension. What might happen to him in that case? He couldn't know, he couldn't watch nor see past himself. It was clear, that this man died. In that half-a-swamp, beneath the floor, it looked like half of his body had submerged completely, while he had been alive. Had it been otherwise, had he been another man, he would've stroke him down with a blow in order to stop that suffering from ever occurring. But that hadn't been any other man. That had not been his brother in soul, who had spent the little time there had been of his awareness in a weak state from which he couldn't stand, he wouldn't scream, nor would he be alive by the same standards. And as he watched, he saw some bubbles rising from beneath the floor as the other half struggled for air. Some sound, the shouting started. And the vocal cords pumped, as well as the chest from the one half which stood there on top. It couldn't be. 'My poor brother, fight, fight, I'll drag you back, just wait.' But he couldn't, as stroke after stroke seemed to bloody his knuckles to the point where he couldn't even care to try any less. He knew what was going to happen there, and thought he may feel bad for this abandonment; this chance would only come once. It was then that he went away and ran, tripping over bodies, crying over for his master. 'Master, master, please, master, open the door.' But no one heard him, thought he thought of a most benign action. If only he could find his half-a-body in time, that would show the wicked fool! The zone of unrest seemed to have been called into action. By two ends of the plateau, it looked as if the councils had gathered. In their likes, upon the finality of the events, the statues erected in their nature finally came to be. Such magnitude bred in the likelihood of life couldn't have been mistaken. Eight giant members in the shape and form of the mighty colossus came to be. But they weren't what they seemed. In their likes they have been not, but partially weakened and strained. Most of them have not been presented in the image of their youth but when they had been old and distraught. Bones and the meek weakness of age seemed to have gathered around them. In itself and by no means could it be accounted that they were exposed in such a manner. Those weren't exposures of strange virility of nudity, but the likes of some strangeness in the lack of limbs. 'What is this then?' 'What you have called forth, the need of the unrest has been called into action. You are to be locked in these forms and in those statues for now, and for as long as the zone is called for and for whatever time it may get extended.' 'But we have not asked of this. Who are you, stranger? Who might you be strange creature with the likes of which, no mongrel, no tainted being, no amorphous being could be enslaved?' 'Mock me not, for you shall be free, in addition to the fact that you shall not suffer the interference of man. This is not his kingdom any longer, it is to be called, for the sake of drawing forward and coming to an end, for the zone to take over.' The magnificence of the creature which spoke came into the fact that it plainly stood there, in a thing which had encased it, the sort which would look or seem to be likely a shield. It plainly surrounded him like some sort of wind marrow, a slight case which never seemed to bother, to extend or to fade. Beneath it laid his darkest form, a blue of colour skin which faded. Marks around the body seemed to signal the coming of the dark. In them they saw something they shouldn't have, what may befall on the planes, on the fields, on the masses if this had to be called in action. 'I protest, you cannot force us into it.' But it had been quick, the matter had already been done before any kind of thing could come. It seemed so far, as to lay there, that there was a kind of unity in the fate they shared. The gates opened beneath them and through a tunnel they rose inside each of their independent bodies. No mistake had been made, that no other man or maiden would possess another one's body. It could be named, the terror and the fright, but they lacked one important thing, which had been the light. As soon as they entered each of their prisons, those glassy eyes which had stood inside their metallic sockets suddenly hardened, changed and seemed to be encased in as much of a strange material as there had been. There was nothing brought into action any longer. If that had been the case, there would be no return now, as the same process found itself happening on each side. Time after time, one of the dark comers seemed to have presented himself in front of a viler gate, to a viler crowd. And in return, he had gotten the remorse for each other's action. Neither council member, nor watcher knew anything of personal sacrifice. It was only in their mark that they would join their own and seem to be watched, as if they had been nothing of the kind. It would be unclear, as to what might happen. 'Such a change of fate, it seems, look as the pillars which rose up in their names.' One of the dark comers, suitors of misguided love for another seemed to be looking and staring from their high places. To them, those houses looked primitive and hopeless. It mattered not what they thought of those pillars and structures which had been brought to the likes of theirs. It couldn't be matched by no means to their constructed citadels, their means to reach the sky. And then, the unrest began. It had been mild and wicked at first, only to mess with the men and what they had thought of themselves and the world around them. There, it seemed like the blue faded from the top of the ether and seemed to fall over them. Many have been drowned or looked for refuge as the waves of blue came over them. They looked like painted soldiers there, fighting for their lives. 'Look at the distress they feel, do they not know how safe it is up here? Might they not come or attempt to draw ever night to a place such as this?' 'They will eventually come, and what then? There are only four of these small platforms which have been erected. What happens when the masses come and flood them? What if they start bringing down the statues and the unrest ends?' 'Will they earn it?' So they wondered. But it looked likely for now that they were caught in the never-ending stream of falling blue. Some swam and found themselves swimming upstream, floating, no, caught in flight. 'Look, mother, I can fly.' Said Leau. For a short time, he felt no anger, he wasn't afraid, he only, he appeared to be floating. There had been something about him in the way he watched and couldn't see past that thing, the way in which he looked or pushed himself past any kind of interference or any other means by which he might be aware that he was dying. Something wasn't right, and he barely noticed it when it had been far too late for a change. There had been something in the way it looked at her. That day had been an especially quick one for the clouds to darken and for people to scatter in the way they had. If one would know any less or none the better, he would've thought them to have been part of it. Of what, to be more precise, there had been an uncertainty. Nothing, yet. Nothing as of yet either. Ten minutes of waiting came and there had been nothing so far. Without a sign, there could be nothing to be made out of it. Such a thing of dexterity. He waited for a moment before saying it out loud. 'It's a thing fashioned with some skill, isn't it?' 'What?' The woman had been startled by the weirdly coated man. He seemed to be wearing some broken glasses which had a grain of dirt mesmerizingly pushing forth as to hide his eyes. 'I mean, that thing in the fence, it was made by no amateur, right? Tell me I'm not the only one seeing it.' She had no idea what this man had been talking off. This deranged individual which only now came to some point where he showed some interest in her. What had been to her that he was looking into? No, he kept staring in that direction. The exact reason being unknown, clearly, he wanted her to see it. 'But I can't seem to see that far away, stranger. What do you want of me?' 'Then, you should get closer, dear, wouldn't you want to see the craftsmanship it has?' Reluctantly, she went forward, not out of interest, but as of some desire to be as far away from the man as possible. Whoever he was, clearly he had a look of danger or at least he gave her the wild impression of a criminal. He was there alone, with her in the night after all. 'What thing?' There had been had a piper, from the looks of it, turned as to hide something behind it. Strangely, it seemed as if, not to be ashamed of the very fact that it was there, she had seemed to have drawn herself to a pool beneath her. Cold, as it seemed, it hadn't come from her but from one of the top lights from whence the peculiar globe seemed to move. In some obscure fashion, she had caught another thing. That bulb was a living thing, which had in turn replaced the light producing bulb. No longer relentless, than what it had been to itself, there seemed to be that, the fact that the man had been gone upon a turn. But, the peculiar thing, that had distracted her. 'What are you, insignificant little thing, to do with me? Why had that stranger wanted me to see you?' She admitted to herself inside her mind that something was wrong. This fence wasn't normal, it had been far too thin and barred, but there was only two holes which went through the half-pipe. As her hand moved on, she suddenly turned and gasped at the sight of one toe. Instinctively she looked at her hands and seemed to see the culprit. 'It's me, I'm the one bleeding. I'm bleeding, I'm bleeding.' No response from the watcher, the man who had disappeared had to be the one. Without a trail of blood until now, there had been no way of knowing where this incident had happened. 'I must be drugged, who's there? What's happening? Where are you? Criminal, cutter, butcher!' And as if called or insulted, the man appeared, silently staring at her, perhaps uncomfortably so. He had the look of a pest, now that he was missing his glasses. Pieces of his grassy beard seemed to have been slightly ingrown inside his eyes. Their likes alone never mattered, at least for as long as it seemed to be there. Inside of his very tiny vermillion bands, right to the core he had been impaled by them. Still, not explanation for what he came. 'Look, look, I told you that you should look at the craftsmanship of the thing, why haven't you thrown a look at it yet? I told you so many times already.' Twice had she turned and the man wasn't there any longer. It seemed benign at this point already. Who had he been and why? Why was she missing so many toes? It had been only then that she had looked at her hands and noticed, nervously aware and confused. 'Who had replaced my fingers?' At the knots, the red strings seemed to be tying and forcing them together. But still, many of them had been missing and instead, many other half pipes had been strung on the fence. She had done her best to forcefully turn each of them at once, only to look in disgust at it. More so, there was some unclear refuge in her mind, for reasons alone she froze. It was then that she had recognized the man, or his arms and hands at least. His fingers slowly caressed her body, taking and changing places, pushing some organs aside, others which had been encased inside bigger debris pieces. And that thing in the distance watched. A weak little creature who could only get itself drawn in by some degenerate wishes, in which it closely observed how that woman had been slowly turned in some kind of weird effigy. Many of her sides had been drawn into strings, her teeth and eye, her entire body pushed and hidden, tied to the fence in the most peculiar ways possible. It dared not approach, but this primordial thing only appeared to be aware of some satisfaction this artist, this carver, this madman had, before he picked up his tools, only to leave and never return. In his walk, there, this creature drew in near, only to observe how the woman had been very much alive in the end. But nevertheless, a claw seemed to have appeared. Not to cross any forward than it had been necessary, a bride stood. 'I shall be the first one there, watch me cross it.' Too many steps had already been taken, to the point where nothing else but one more had to be placed. It followed the others at first, but only by a march had it been noted of the likes and danger, and for the thing which couldn't have been called into action. For that alone had been the likes of the first stranger who had attempted to pass it. His shouts hadn't been heard as he had fallen, never watched, not accounted for, as he had been lost beneath the abyss. The depths had swallowed his agony, and that voice could never have been accounted for. It looked even more present than it had looked like, but it felt as if the man had still been there. In some form or another, he had been trying to get to them. But there had been no other signs of him. 'Who's to follow then? Could anyone else even dare come forth and become unloose in the depths. I see that you're the one.' The man who had broken his skull just spoke. He had repeated the same speech over to himself whilst standing erected against the rock, like some statue, for the likes of him, the likes of many and none else could be for his insides. They had been wretched, scorn and twisted to the point where he couldn't eat the pieces of his mind which had remained. No one else wanted to be near him. 'I will have to eat the other minds, I swear, or else they will fling themselves down the abyss. Why waste? Such a delightful bunch they are, I must have them, their insides, my joy for hunger, and it can't last.' Twenty steps, he had taken from the same spot he had been in. Without a delightful touch, he kind of looked out of place. No more would he wait, or look or wager. 'Let it be me, I shall come down that bridge.' 'Why have you said that? You damned arrogant cretin, look at what you've done.' It felt as if his voice had echoed then, for the bridge collapsed and no longer lead to the other side, instead, it seemed to have gone towards some other place, going directly into the abyss. 'I shall go instead of him, let me, I shall go forth on a bridge that's straight and from which I may not fall.' It hadn't worked, he was still staring at a bridge which leads down. 'You say it, you brought this on yourself, don't ruin this, do not, by any means ruin this bunch.' He had tried saying, repeating, even changing the format to the very point where it may sound normal and by no means as corrupt as it had been. To no point had it changed and worse, he had lost the feeling and control over his legs. That had been it, by means of walking forward he had fallen. There wasn't anything which came out of the man. And yet, the old creature turned, finally revealing what he had been doing for the past half an hour with his time. One finger seemed to have gone inside his skull, rubbing a patch and making it so he was only tasting himself that way. He had looked at himself in the same manner no one could've, but only he knew it. One of the young people who were standing in front of him, of their group wasn't their own. But it was him, disguised. And he had wanted to taste himself, for that version had been pure in the sense that his head hadn't been cracked. It had been nothing but a deep desire to have him, to taste his own body and get some joy out of it. Unclear, uncertain and fearful as he had been, it was time he would approach. The delinquent had finally come to be, in terms of drawing forward, a scoundrel. That's what the one who had leapt, a leap of faith in its true mad sense revealed that he walked on the very air. Or to be precise, the mist which had been there beneath him. 'Look, there's something there, hidden, follow me before he comes after you, it's safe to cross.' And some tried, others stood there and tried stopping the others but it had gone too quick now. Two of them came and fell, their souls had been lost and they had been dead. 'You're a murderer, you know that? They would've had a chance to get through, don't you understand?' 'But I only wanted to help, I, and I.' His throat suckled and as it came inside there wasn't any chance for him to reconcile with the action he had taken. It had been a mistake in the sense which had been very much there. At last, they were there for too long and he had lost his patience. Four bashed heads were quick and he had been left there at the middle. They weren't dead, only knocked unconscious. It hadn't started the cannibalization process yet, at least not while he was still there staring at him. And to be as ironic as it were, he had been the one who wasn't the human being. Unaware of it, he stood there on top of the mist, confused, misguided and wondered what it might be done. How could it be that he was the only one allowed to cross the bridge? And why was it that every single one of his friends had to suffer some terrible fate like that? 'Let them go, release my friends, please, they have done nothing to you that they might deserve such a treatment!' 'Come here then, a trade, trade it is. As long as you give me what's mine, what belongs to me, I shall give you this, what belonged to you.' They had been after me. It was them, in that moment in time that had taken the choice for me. And in fact, I chose not to run, instead making it seem more apparent that I was looking for something more in terms of getting caught in my own affairs. Reading cobble stone tablets, in the grave. Though these were no tombstone, they only served as a distraction from the fact that every single body which had been brought there was immediately dispatched and had been thrown inside a single hole. That hole had been filled with decaying patched and simple things, such as small limbs and no other mild things which had looked alive. 'Why am I bothered when I asked? OH, it was you.' Before me stood a dead man, somehow he had not only crawled from his pit but it almost seemed likely that he would be there for some time, watching. Uncertainty be true, as a means of showing and looking inside of him, there it was. It stood like some kind of empty gap, in which it dangled. The entry he had sought after for so long. And his prayers and waiting had been not only answered but looked after. Inside there was that, the kind which would be dreadfully lost, after this occasion in which he had been deemed as being worthy of the chance. With little hesitation, he only took off and leaped inside. There wasn't any certainty as to what might happen afterwards, but it was clear enough that there would be no way out. Not by any means, there being no hope whatsoever. Here, he would return to his very thoughts, rather than look away and decide. He entered, being pulled in that weird tunnel inside the body. The plain floor was set, an old one, filled with stone. But no tiny pebbles which had been spread, but strange conflagrated spares which had been tied or had become in part wooden. They shared some kind of danger in terms of them being sharp and going forth, spreading, smashing, pushing and cutting. One stroke made it clear enough, that there would be something inflicted upon his mind. Everywhere else he looked, at least from his side, it looked like many things missed. Either the patched above earth, at which he looked at the empty reflection of some kind of fading reality, or some malign image of himself which had been multiplied. And many of them looked back, others mocked and laughed at him, but more importantly, he had been almost desired by his own self, to be consumed with what went there. A trap door below, two of them, eight, but none opened. Between them stood one miss turned door which lead below. Would he take it? Anything but to escape those copies of him, those mirrors, those changed foul daemons which couldn't be looked away from. It would be even more unclear as to know. Who was on the other side? By physical appearance, he had known who it was. It was a man who looked exactly like him, a twin or some vile stranger, which couldn't be looked away from. He was a stranger to him, especially since he couldn't even look away from him. There was something about him which couldn't have been trusted, though he couldn't put his hope at it yet. Some power stood there to him. A kind of engulfing blue light which surrounded this man, frighteningly so, pushed forward and snatched at him rabidly in some way which couldn't be explained otherwise. But this creature who looked at him and stood there, below, defying gravity had been his soul. An exact presence which seemed only to go forward as he followed. Like some pup or some tainted thing, he seemed more likely so to be set on him. It was the very reason he followed, even though he had the chance or the risk, or even might face some repugnant deal. It was his soul, so he had believed. But there, as he had went below, something seemed to make him suffer. It was painful at first, the way through which he made it so he couldn't walk any longer. Though that thing had ruined his skin, as each step went forward, his soul departed even farther. One inch of the flame seemed to disappear, his power slowly fading. And it came to be apparent that his layers of skin had reached his muscles, his organs, and then his bones. They couldn't be accounted for, but it seemed then that there wasn't any hope for him to return. At a point in his search, there had only been the fall. It went through as they had gone towards some kind of damnation in order for them to be set free. Both his soul and what had remained of his body had suffered for far too long. In the end, it had mattered even less, for the reason of which he had reached the point where he was, this was to be told in private. It was solid, in terms that his soul had indeed been damned, whilst his body had become a living organ inside the dead man. And that organ, like some morbid hybrid between a heart and a liver, had managed to bring life to the man, making him come forward while tracing some kind of weird side of the road. He would only have this vigor for a short amount of time, in which, whatever he may do, it had to count. It had been brought to fruition, as his desire had come back. There, the dead man threw himself back in the pile, so he may rest, in the last moments of his life with the rest of them. In some kind of disturbed silence and some disappointing end, he lay there like some drunk, foul smelling, rotting, while the pump would reach an end as well. There would be nothing else to pump inside him yet. Some cowardly creature, nothing less. 'It was him, I swear it had been him, and I saw it with his eyes, none other than his.' He pointed at a pair which lay below the crossing. There was some mild dirt covered in the spew left there out of some rotten remains which had been uncounted for the mild array of days which had went by. 'Spring, had it been? I remember when these lands had been clean and untouched by those strangers, long before anyone with the mild interest of trying to profit out of them had even thought of coming here. 'And who might you be then? How come you always appear when there's an outlaw on loose, in the exact proximity and at the precise moment we gather?' The town watch, as it had seemed had always been present there, as had he. It was unclear whether or not they suspected something, but as likely as it had been, no definite proof could be called into question. 'I used to live here, though, you may not be able to remember me. As a matter of fact I don't believe we have met before and I have no desire to make myself be acquainted with you. It's been enough for me to feel rather insulted.' 'You don't seem to understand much, do you? I seem to get at this strange idea, you know? That you may be one of those, outlaws, see?' He pointed at what appeared to be a pair of marks left somewhere on the ground in the distance. Nothing too serious by the looks or the likes of it and by no means could he be accounted or called to some kind of response. He had only seemed to be peculiar enough as to respond. 'I assure you that I've got nothing to do with it.' But he had, oh, how much of it he had. There was a desire he had that he may come forth and renounce himself of the hidden lordship title and have himself be whipped on the streets. The many plots still rested on his lips and there was just that quick incentive for him to act. What will it be? Will you go on and tell them of what you believe? Go on, make a small incision, and make a cut through. That had been the previous night. He had paid a few outlaws to kidnap the daughter of some magister around the town magisterium, where his folk served and where those before them served as well. It was unclear just where this uncertainty went, but why was it that he wanted himself to be around that place? It would be some kind of disgrace to think the least, that he would have himself be seen while he had been licking his lips at the much thought. 'There's nothing which may link me there, look at my soles and listen to the man, he's the one who had a claim over the ownership of the scoundrel's sandals.' 'So you are aware of something then?' Those petty villagers and pushy hooligans had gotten a tiny bit too close. He should've never underestimated them, no, this was a far more deranged thing. He had chosen the flight then, not before a puff of smoke, a black fog which had appeared out of his hand. From a small cut, it turned out that the fog had been his blood and that reaction was only the natural thing to come after coming into contact with the air. Everything afterwards had been pale and blinded, as he hid and ran, waiting for the night. 'I saw him, some nights ago, I swear, I'm still on his track.' This sage, this man who had a small rounded, collar rope with frogs attached to his neck seemed to be having his visions again. Dead eyes started and seemed to grant his visage, every now and then, the piece of some dog's skull rattled as his teeth bit into his own lip. What he might not have seen in the stored memory those dead objects seemed to have no lay in some peculiar thing which couldn't be helped at all. Punished for his lied and strange effect, he had felt himself rather caught into his own lies. There, the stranger, the lord Montequmb, seemed to be resting on the poor lass' hip. She was very much standing there, alive, without a wound on her pretty body. That's where the paleness had been, and that's how they suspected. In his small cover of a comb, he had stored everything he had stolen, everything his men had taken, whilst she, her was the wisest. She had been the most deleted trophy he could inquire of her. For there, in the dark, he had taken off his weird suit off, only to reveal that creature which had hidden inside of him. 'As I have promised to you, she will be yours for this night alone.' Spoke the flaccid skin which had been Montequmb, looking as the repulsing creature which had hid inside of him for so long. He had watched throughout the night how this thing had its way with the woman, locked in a hidden room where none may hear. But one mistake, oh, so, had it been, that he had kept so many jars and so many pieces of the dead inside of it. No one would dare tear any of them apart and care even less for the likes. It wasn't even half of clock that they had arrived. The outlaws had been murdered, the door ripped apart. With one hard blow, he had arrived to a grim end in which this creature seemed to be instantly caught in an array of suffering, caused by the creeping bludgeoning of its skull. Though no man could stare or watch, for they had been far too late. She stood there, lifeless, with no smile but tears which had been wasted out of self-pity and grief. 'Rattle, rattle, snake-battle, rattle, rattle, snake.' Battle. The dawn had come, they fought in pits. Someone watched, as the supreme morbid sight finally came into some swing. The dire hatred, look away, words couldn't describe what was felt. By the on-lookers who had come in terms with their own like, they watched as well as their own men died. 'Fight harder, throw them in the pit, with the snakes as well, tell them of the meat.' By the mid-term point in which the blade had been erected, so had the cage on top been opened for them to eat? The fighting stopped, as suddenly their blades were pulled back by the chains by which they had been held, pulled back into the sudden openings only to reveal the acid in which they would be cleaned. 'Waste no opportunity.' The fat gladiator yelled. His spiked helmet, hair dry, mouth awry, darkened soul, as with which he came to grab a weaker man, and spewed him into the acid flop from which his weapon had been drawn. His shout had been distracting and a few of the other contenders seemed to have turned in order to watch what was going on. The muster and the need, the heed to look at it came. Such a quick tool for the soul, the people watched and screamed and cheered for their favourite contender. He had been liked and watched closely as he had drawn in to sneer and latch onto the desire. He would do no less than what he had been asked to do, fight and fight, even though the rest had been rewarded. 'That's boiled meat, that's edible meat, I tell you. There's no need for every single one of us to fight. Do not make this mistake, for our own sake and yours. Do not forsake us, let us not plead with the likes of men and do it as we did it back then.' He, as an older gladiator knew better, what to expect and what went wrong exactly. It had been clear that there was something he had expected. I no mean sight, by the mere watch, there it was. A past champion had come and signaled his arrival. With one chump of a forehead, he had stricken a blow to the back of the fat man's belly. He couldn't even dare meet the others then, as their sight had been drawn at the masters of the ring. 'Let the games continue. Whether the champion wants to fight or watch the rest will be his decision alone.' 'You heard him, runts, get back at it, eat it, runts, it may be your last meal for as long as I care.' An understanding of the fact had come, as they ate and watched the man who had dared cross the split of the fight. In the crossing of the split, it had been wagered that the likes alone could do nothing but cut and cut until the butcher couldn't do it any longer. Only then would he come, like the embodiment of the arena, a vengeful spirit which arrived to punish those who broke their vowels. This man, who ate with the rest of them, not only had his face covered, just so he would not be seen, but there was something else he hid inside. Beneath that cowl, lay his nigh-naked body, scarred and only then had it been revealed, the blow which had once killed him in his prime. It was a half-near nigh-cut, which deeply enough as to scar tissue and leave a mark which would never go away. And his mouth had been revealed, with his thick and bloody lips, he had bit more than he could chew it seemed, for not only had he eaten with them as well, but he had also been eating human ears. Those who observed immediately looked away, accidentally going as far as to notice that small pieces of what had been the fat man, clearly in a state which couldn't be recovered, had gone missing. Now one said a word to him. But he alone, seemed to have noticed that they figured out something he had hoped they wouldn't even dare to cope with. As he stopped chewing, he turned towards the fat man, turning back only with the break he needed to spit out a few fingers and half-an-eye. In such a terminal as there had been, no one dared look any other way. 'Do you have anything to say for yourself?' This man, who seemed to have taken himself as this spectral thing, the dead empty shell of a forgotten champion now claimed himself as an evil thing which now had come forth. He had been the only one, a single man bearing an axe, a weapon which had been unchained. The rest couldn't have been more gruesome, as he had leaped and started killing the contenders one by one, who had not been allowed or given any means of self-preservation or self-defence. Yet, so long as the crowd had been pleased with this, there would be no stop to the butcher's woe. Many kept on watching as he had killed man after man, the occasional female stolen from the fighting tribe, which had been taken for his own pleasure and defiled there in another gruesome display before he came on top of her and threw her body to the side. He had stood there in the prime of man, killing the lions in the den, killing the morbid twists which had come after until there was no one left to challenge him. There, the pit had finally been battered until all that meat had been grinded, all those bones crushed and until there had been nothing left but a bath made out of the agony felt by the physical embodiments of the souls which had fought there. Only he had laid there supreme, conqueror, master, champion, deity of the arena, bringer of supreme disgust and keeper of woe. The plan has to be enacted, just so they might all die without release. Every living being on the planet, near its core lay there stored, facing one another in the most peculiar way, dreadfully speaking and watching themselves and how they went at it, biting and ripping one another apart. In their arousal, it seemed had wakened just then. Without a way of knowing, there could only be supposed, closely and remotely looked at in some way through which they could be watched. Observation came as quickly as it had been forgotten. Results came mixed. What had been preserved as one clean and pure race seemed to have come out to face severe mutations. Men broke through the tubes and entered a world which had been denied purity. They knew, as the first men who had looked upon their dormant brothers and sisters, had become aware of the failure which had become the world. 'We must preserve them, we must keep them pure, and we must make sure they'll live in world which won't turn them into us.' Though they looked as anything but human, those eighty who had come out of the preservation seemed to have retained their minds. But for how long could it be taken? For how could they be looking at their own reflections and stare? It was a thing which couldn't have been accounted for. The way they looked at one another and much worse than that. 'Don't think it.' The other deformed man turned towards him to look. He had been just as repulsive to behold as the others. More so, this had been his companion, life-time engineer, Mccanaghy. 'We're talking about the sake of a good few billion people, the likes who had repopulated the world and made it in their image.' 'And what do you think they'll make of us once they find out what we are?' 'What we are remains unchanged, our goal remains the same, the preservation and the reformation of the plains. Listen to me, this won't happen in one generation, this won't happen in any less than what you may think of. We need to be certain that there won't be anything less but the complete admission that we may follow the original plan.' 'Yes, yes, I know, I must, we will go forth and do. We have not fought, our ancestors haven't fought for this. What are a few more bodies in the heap when we will be seen as heroes?' There seemed to be an understanding at first, for at least the few weeks to months. It wasn't easy, at that, controlling the machines and activating their primal cores. It's said that the original reactors had been programmed in some way through which they could last the end of mankind. Perhaps they were right in some way, though most of the hard-work had been done. In itself, there were four main factors there, the radioactive pollution which seemed to be slowly killing them. These strange time-bombs, per say, had forced them into a constant growth, which seemed to be less likely and only got stronger as they approached their end. What walked on the streets now seemed to be only those huge bodies, like those of giants, bulking with the terror of muscle and pumping iron. Though most importantly, as it had been noticed, they still retained their mind. It had been all too important, as they chose not to retaliate against those who had been pure but kept their malignant impulse control to the very end. It changed at last, in the last moment, when they had grouped inside an enclosed chamber of their own. This mutation had driven them all mad, and while there could've been a way out for someone who had known the combination and means of entry, they had instead ripped one another apart. But that hadn't been the worst of it, as they had merely continued the effort done by a chosen few. Next to their enclosed chamber, there had been plenty of other similar rooms, filled with bodies. This plague which had caused the mutation seemed to adapt to everything, even the changed which had been stores. Yet, despite it, each chosen generation of forty to eight pioneers had hope. They got through and were relentless in the way they worked, neither case seemed to have attempted to strike or bite or even acknowledge the possibility of there being inevitability. What had been much worse than their progress had been the fact that the chambers which had been built were colossal? Someone had chosen to observe and planned for this disease and degeneration. Of the system, something else which had entailed it was the fact that at the end of it, each chamber had been dragged and pushed forward into some loop which had been thrown beneath the earth, where unmarked graves lay. It was a masterwork, which had only given the impression of infinity of rooms, which had been not only seen, but thought of to be widespread. Regardless of which, they fought, and carried on. And the pit filled and they would be buried even deeper until they had reached it, the final thing which would cure it. But it had come at a price, as the air had suddenly cleaned itself of radiation, in the last moments out there, a final line of code was written. Such a marvelous thing, this filth of a radioactive thing, in a last attempt of survival, it had begun self-cannibalizing itself as well as the plants and wild life which produced the air. There would be no one else evacuated and now, what seemed to be, in that strange, eternally cold place which had come to be the Earth, had been a stalemate. As the tubes they stored them so well, that they produced their own kind of modified air. Like statues in a world of cold, they stood there never to awaken, as the greatest examples of what might've been the human race. It came from there. A voice said it, so it must be true. One can't stop wondering when it's too much. We can't listen to it, can we? It's been so long since I have seen someone, or since I have seen her. There's nothing around this room, it's all too empty. Why are these thoughts forced out of my head? Why can't I concentrate? Am I still able to call myself something near, anything near some living thing? I can't seem to notice anything moving. A few days ago, I had. There were a few small grasshoppers inside my room. But I have even less of a recollection of how they got there. An electric device, that's what it had been. Some of it had kept popping inside the other. What other? Had there been another room other than mine? It had been my purpose ever since to discover what had been there. Past that very door, I have read about it, that peculiar thing there. I could barely see it, but I swear there had been a light coming from somewhere just then. Just at the rims, now I remember. There was that enclosure at the window. Every now and then it would appear, just enough light being shed for me to take something near a choice. It was time again to act, and now, that part of me which had been active in the light had decided it was time to act. I had to do something, it would be impossible for me to act otherwise. I knew it to be kind of true, in some way of manner, but I had known it even since. Before I could even speak, or tell myself, as I have always have, pick a book and read a passage, don't go near that door. It could be bad, worse, you won't be able to return and oh, there's so much here to do. So many books to read, I'm sure you won't be able to read all of them in a single life-time. Just do it, take a leap, don't listen to the voice, and don't listen to it, just get up, get up, get up. The noise started again, something's happening there, on the other side, at least open it, just to see. My feet had been tender from all that sitting but I could walk. The sound of something, of a feeling, something which had the feel of extending appeared in my mind. I walked towards it and opened the door. In came the light, some rat-like coloured hall standing there against the dark room in which I had been. In the distance, there seemed to be some people. Yes, people, I thought I have read about them. I think I was one of those people, not the ones I was looking at but something like them. Similar, was the word. No, I wasn't wearing the same thing as they were, my clothes, my clothes were scummy. They had a smell. They watched. And they watched. And afterwards, there came nothing out of it. Without me waiting, who might look at me in the same way? I wanted them to look at me, for some reason. I wanted them to see me. My face was wet from the crying, but luckily I had been aware. What had been that book I was thinking off? Human interactions. Yes, I know of it and I wanted it so much, I wanted to talk to them, to feel. 'Hi, I'm here.' My mouth opened and I bit something by the side of it. They seemed to be less concerned, even less now that I have somewhat bowed and presented myself. I'm not a child, I'll show them and they'll know it. Just another thing. The door closed behind me as soon as I tried slamming it open. I knew I haven't managed to close it myself, that hadn't been it. I knew it even so, it wasn't right. I think it had done it itself after being made aware of my intention. Or something in terms of it. Well, as I turned, they stopped chatting between one another. It was almost as if they had become aware of my presence for the first time and have refused to do anything else entirely. They wanted to be aware and say something, they enclosed on me as they approached. Testing, that's what followed, that's what I hated. I was dragged and pulled, I felt nasty. My clothes had been ripped off, they had been tipped off my presence and I couldn't even help but pose like some nasty girl. I felt humiliated as the cold water had been showered over me. Nasty people, how they looked behind their similar, similar masks. I cried underneath the water and I knew they only used it to perpetually humiliate me even further. I couldn't help it, shaking that way, curling, being down while they must've smiled behind them. So nasty, I just wanted to be there, alone, so they left. They left me in that room without anything. I missed my books, I missed being alone, being in the dark. I hated seeing, I hated looking at myself there, in that filth, in that shiny, dark reflection. Why did they do this to me? I felt awful then. No one approached, no one came near, and no one cared what I felt. And I couldn't get up from that curled ball I laid in. No, it appeared again. That sound, that swirl, that sharp thing, that metallic, almost magnetically bashed, crackling thing which hadn't stopped since I started looking at myself there, for what I was. Nasty thing, nasty genitals, nasty hair, with a clean face. No one wanted to let me out of it, nobody wanted to open this room, and the only consolation was that small barred hole through which the water drained. The drainage hole, where all the dark had gone, where my dark remained. Are they afraid? It sounded like it, how they chanted those very words which had once brought nothing but destruction. 'They have brought it on themselves, just have a look at them and you will understand. So much of the world their ancestors worked to create, look at it! What lies before you is nothing but a pile of trash, the filth which had been brought by their filth and desire to breed and mixed.'

Those bitter words only made it worse, as he had been reminded of it, through some means which couldn't be explained. It was enough to make him look as cowardly as he had become. When he shouted spineless, the crowd chanted hear hear. It couldn't be listened to, now, of all reason through which one could obey and be nigh-placed near himself. Something here and something there seemed to be happening. As they started bringing the statues which had been raised to signal liberty, they would only bring decay. No one wagered they would degenerate in such a way. That creed and filth, the towers tilted and fell. Buildings couldn't stand erect, no plane flew that day, again would he say. 'You brought this on yourself, filth, no conservation. How could such petty mixes enable themselves as to store what's been created? This is what your kind does, it can only live enough to destroy. Darkened, slanted eyes, soulless creature, of the kind which deserves to die.' And yet, his chants continued, and approached, the point where one would think oneself somewhat paranoid. 'Am I not right, to have stepped up like one of the last vestige, the last pure one?' 'Hear, hear.' Most have yet to obey some kind of despair of their own, through which the madness which had been encountered lasted through some mad times. They looked and burned, and muttered as they ruined paintings, symbols or art, architecture and everything which had been made by man.

Why was that a thing of such a mad and such a disinteresting manner? It couldn't be accounted for, the filthy destruction which had been spread. 'Look at you, no ties to the past, you're not the same ones which have been or have lived or were even remotely of the kin. There's nothing coming out of you, only some strange and filthy repulsive thing, which can't be thought off. Don't look at me, look at your very own selves. Ugly things, look at what beauty had meant, what it used to mean, look at strength.' At which encounter, the man only posed for himself and no one more. Those were dumb animals below, not too hardened by work, as plenty of them were lazy, but still human. If one could call them that. In no way could he stand what had become of the world. It was their fault, through the destruction and through the woe in which no one else had dared to be mesmerized by the likes of living and the dead. No one could forget who this man had been, who had locked himself in the last standing tall building which remained tall. So many of the barbarians, in the wake of their primitive destruction looked at him like some kind of deity or mad, lost and sad ruler. It couldn't have been any other way. He wanted to be like them, at least for one moment, so he wouldn't be forced to give in the weight he carried. So much history, so many achievements, all of which now lived into him. If only he were ever lasting, if only he hadn't been forced to deal with carrying so much. 'No, I won't be driven to this. I will never be like you. Filthy creatures, dark skinned, pox-filled, distasteful mongrels, you're nothing. You'll always be something else, something below the likes of man, below the likes of being human. You may try changing your shape and acquiring our colour, but your filthy bodies only reveal it for all to see.' And it was then that he heard a knock on the last floor, just the one he had managed to block. There wouldn't be any way to hide from it, that strange magnitude of force that made the tower shake for the first time. It felt like being near the sea, where he could only see his body. By some boat, on a river burning, just like his ancestors had died. He could see the calling and dreaded even that one moment where he had considered giving in. 'Why do you desire me so? That even now you may infect me with your like, this strange thing which could only try jumping inside my mind and taking something which isn't yours. I can see it on your faces, those traits had been stolen. But you, pure breeds of the dark are perhaps the worst. Was it not you who started it all? It is your kind which may never be educated or even be forced to be alive. I say this to you, there will be no other man, no other breed which save you or take pity on your kind.' And each knock made the door crumble and had forced itself onto the world. There couldn't be anything but the old age talking from the man, the memory of his children and his wife, all of whom had died. He couldn't help it now, the way through which he had spoken and had made it so they would decipher what he said. That dumb creature hadn't even understood a word, they were clueless. It had been the most insulting thing of all, the way in which he fell, and had never come to see how the last relic of some civilization had faded, through which there could be some mark, the end in some means of getting forth and destroying everything which had remained. It would only mean that there could be some clueless kind of primitive creature which would rule the plane and humanity. Have my very own eyes deceived me? I couldn't help myself but look around, at this palace of glass. They looked at me, the people stuck in the reflections, whose vicious blows against their prisons couldn't have been disturbed or interrupted by any means. Such a dreadful thing, had it been, for far too long neither of them could speak through means which may be even remotely understandable. They couldn't be listened to and I dared not drop my lamp. It had been so hard for I had to stumble in the dark until this point where I would be nigh-close to being there, in the place where it did shatter. No one could stumble on their own, nor would they pay any attention at the likes. But there were cracks, here and there, in places which had been obscured to them. Those were the corners which couldn't have appeared on their side, otherwise, they might've set themselves free from there. For what reason might they be able to struggle in their own likeness? Why was it that they would be less considerate of another and dreadfully be staked at the kind which would only reveal how vile they were? In the wake of their true faces, they brought living people, smaller ones who had to be their very children. Without daring to look away, I watched how they forced themselves onto the sacrifice, burning her and eating burning pieces while staring at me with their shallow eyes. Never had I seen such creatures which were legless and long, elongated and strong, filled with blisters around their mouths. Why, it had been obvious that neither of them would start gloating at how much despair they had caused. It was unnerving to watch, in the wake of something nigh or close to defile my very expectation, I have taken upon myself to stare. What they did next, to get my attention or to get me to stop myself from leaving had been much viler than that. I couldn't look but they had opened themselves in some way as to show that each of them had stored inside their bodies something. My last glance had revealed as much, but as it seemed to be, I had been betrayed by my own curiosity and chose to look there. It was the magnitude of something less familiar and more decrepit than there had ever been. Struck by woe, my eyes had changed. This sight had been defiled by the wretch who had been even less than benign. What they had stored inside were pseudo burnt bodies of the same child which had been growing inside their chests. Each collected a part and it seemed that each of them had dared reconstruct their offspring through some peculiar way or another. But they couldn't have been the same. That one which had burned hadn't been one that had been remade in its own image. He knew, that, despite seeing the fact that it had been alive, each new creature had kept its burn marks. Were they mocking me in such a way that they would choose to give birth to burn victims and crippled creatures? All of the sudden, as if they had heard my thoughts, it had been revealed to me that I had been exposed for what I had been. My guts had been turned as in front of me and on every side, those living creatures, those burn victims started struggling on the ground. In my gust of dead, I had dropped the lamp and seemed to lay in a pseudo-dark. It had taken moments for light to come and it was apparent that they could only produce little which might come unto my side. But in the dark, I was vulnerable for any type of thing that of which, most likely as it had been, was the fact that there wasn't any protection I'd have. And I heard the sound of glass cracking, the dreadful smacking against which I couldn't help myself but give in the strangeness of the happening at hand. They were frugal in means of which they dragged themselves on. I have managed in my stumbling nuisance to go forth and grab the lamp. There, as I have made myself present, again, against the wall, with a lit lamp, I could see only a small area from where I stood. It had the circumference of a large circle but it lay. I saw them, where they have went, through some navel of the pass, inside a place which resembled some fleshy roundness which crept deeper than expected. No less than what had been some magnitude of woe had there been the likes of being strangled by my own kin. Two hands came from a crack, and this distraction ended as the hands went deeper below. What stood behind me, which had made itself be clear had been one of those things, but it bore my very head. It hadn't exactly, as I had managed to breathe hard enough for the reflection to appear, and I have been tricked by the mere mirror which had lain there. Something even more peculiar of the kin seemed to haunt me. That place, which had been an abomination in itself now, lay clear of its own. There was something which had to be done, something worse, much more than it would happen, more so than the distrust they had shown, there came the image, the repulsing image of some twisted deformity given birth by their own kind. Whatever they have done, they all gathered in a large circle and seemed to have deformed their inside offspring's into large tubes which came directly into the ground. Such a ritual seemed to turn glass into skin, a transparent layer which lay as if on muscle which started moving on its own. They wanted to thoroughly to get through to him and push in. They wanted to get in by some means which couldn't be undeniably held. They had formed a bad habit which I myself couldn't shake of regardless of how many times I have tried to. My attempts lay thwarted, I had been vaguely discarded as they took a piece of my back and threw be in the heaping trash where you found me earlier today. I can still remember vaguely, the few hours which passed before you found me. I've been greeted by it. That melodramatic singer of flutes, who came to me in an armless approach, that bipedal walker, whose neck made most of its body, pushing through a few cancerous growths which grew on the heaps which lay nearest to me. His largely vermilion suit lay pigmented with splashes of crimson and of o tempting ochre which distracted me most. The way in which this fiend presented it made me feel unnerved, especially after it had begun its projection in front of me with little consideration for the carrions and crows which had gathered around us. They were laughing at me, mockingly, knowing I would be buried underneath all that trash, soon to be afflicted by a worst affliction it could possibly throw again me. I had little to say as that walking hive revealed, from its epistolary mouths a constant show of ever-present spreading and mixing of the various inorganic materials which it had gathered inside of it. Far too gone in my delusion that I could ever hope to escape this thing, I had no other option but to join it in its made dance, revealing me to him as he watch me become completely encompassed by its sheer will of domination. It looked at me, I think. I couldn't be bothered to check, but I had no intention that this creature had to have had some senses be displayed to me. Otherwise, I could only gather just enough to know that its ill intention would result in me getting plowed underneath a reckless amount of filth-inducing blows. Its large, gangrenous body writhed as its trunk shoved me away from him. From his giant splendor, I could only gather a few plastic bags which had covered it before it submerged below us. He had drawn me in, as curiosity's call could undeniably fall upon me, now, at the direst hour, when I could barely fathom living and breathing through his realm. It was in it, as I have made my way through the mountain of needles and of abandoned prey. The heaps of trash were no more and before I could come in terms of where I had been, I found myself surrounded by grasping, loud-sounding tiny disemboweled part which were not of human-kind, but a similar to the kind of appendage one would find in a dissolving mass or thickets filled with worming cutters brought from the depths of the abyss. Their smell had been tainted, and the deeper I had made it into their folly, the closer I had gotten to become one of them. It was not my choice to be defiled in such a way. By no unfathomable means could I have spared as much as a single thought on giving in. But they had simply attached themselves to my body, like a pair of parasites who had understood what I was there for. I ought to be ashamed for what I felt then, as I was forced to give in and feel my surroundings through them. Long they may be, I felt like no human should be forced to feel, as no insect but a kind of dumbbed troglodyte who had been overwhelmed by the wretched amount of limbs he had attained. They sheer number had not only been distracting, but I felt as if they could turn on me at any moment. For I had no doubt that they were of the same sheet and kin as the strange singer I was trying to chase. And my legs could not give in any sooner than not only had they been struck by a spell of numbness, but I could also feel the sheer amount of muscle and of fat being drawn from them, only to be directed in those inhuman appendages which haunted my body in such an unnatural way. 'I have found you.' MY shout could only serve as my entrance commenced. I had landed inside their lair. Their lair, to be precise about it, I saw them, within my own eyes, the true shades of their kind. Which is to say, they seemed rather different than the way they had been before. No longer had I seen a pink, which had served as a mere reflection of what I had seen outside, but I was met by the likes of a gray, a color that only rivaled the grave. I seemed to have found myself too drawn there, carried only by my new legs, those appendages which started taking me apart. I've lost them to the pulp, to the sickles which had become my bones. Though the walls of their lair were mainly a thick pair of plaster shells they had shed off, I could still find a way to poke inside of them. Alas, before the chase had come to haunt me still, I stared at the walls of the city. I've come to realize that I may have exaggerated a few too many times. Perhaps I should've been honest from the start. 'My perception of time is somewhat slow, I think. Either that of I have suffered a few too many blows than I could possibly count on, regardless of which, the top of the trash heap hadn't been what it seemed. I only referred to it that way in hopes that you would possibly strike this off like some insane encounter with a paranoid man you've found on the streets. I know it might be confusing now, but I know I'm not mad. They made be waiting for them there, prior to our other encounters, I have been stalking them to that point. And I know I've made the right choice here. You'll understand why I'm saying that.' Below the rims of the wall I broke lay the ruins of the old town. Buried underneath the streets. Unaligned mostly to anything of the streets or the homes in there. They didn't follow me for some reason, which I've come to think about for a while. Perhaps they weren't the tormentors I have come to watch and follow. Maybe I had been wrong. But what I was met below, inside that city was that blacksmith I had come to worship now in my dreams. He's joined by his brothers, the vile growing mountains who seem to track me every time I leave my den. Down there, there's food, I think there is. I've been eating something to keep me alive, and them. My limbs are alive after all, and they need the proper sustenance, which I alone could not possibly hope to provide them. I've come to accept that I'm limited, I can only give them so much before I'll grow weak and will need to feed again. I supposed I should tell you about the families there. They're citizens, or they used to be citizens, if one could account for the fact that, I've had my few good shares of them. It's nothing I hold dear, but I'm not ashamed either. 'The blacksmith taught me something. He gave me the instructions needed to build an altar, so I may summon him wherever I may need him be. He was as tall as one of the standing ruins, his head ended on one side. As a matter of fact, his entire body appeared to be curved entirely on one side. He held no hammer but appeared to be proceeding with the battering from one jolting pint of iron which had been a combination of both of his arms. They knocked and produced the most unfathomable noises I could lay my ears against.' This thing shocked me a lot more than I would've ever anticipated. I was brought to an inch of my life, being severed from a stroke just as his graceful voice began addressing me in an utmost compassionate tone. The last survivor of the crash only now came into contact with the repelling dirtor-call. Somewhat caught into the antics, he stood. 'I'm Lt. Carmathy, lost visage of the ship Delta Percent. In need of help, send station supplies before it launches into orbit again.' Short-fuses appeared to be trying themselves at the lacerate-crash. It's been a while since the man came out of his vision enchanter. 'What is he doing again?' 'He's playing with some sort of reality enchanter, I think.' It was a crude attempt at a joke. Of course he wasn't, as only appeared to have forced a piece of teriatric-shard inside his head. From the proceeding damage to his cerebral cortex, the man started hallucinating while going by the rims of the monitors which stood around him. He had been allowed to travel as freely as he might. Eight days. 'I am the Prince All mighty, I am made of cheese buttons; listen to me while I talk.' 'Is he the prince?' 'Could it be?' Asked the second valve, which kept turning by itself. Carmathy walked through it, acquiring at least a few layers of melting skin from the amount of hot steam which was completely expelled out of his body. Man would endure much more than this. It had to be. Otherwise, there'd be no end to the amount of scum which had been completed foiled from his body. From one hallucination he had obtain at least a few holes down the sides of his body as well from around his only ankle-holder. 'He had no feet any longer, he's being dragged away.' 'Is he now?' 'I am, please, help me, I think I'm being taken to the chopping bench. They'll cut me into pieces unless you ought to help me get out of the way.' But none', he would not pay anyone to help him then. Though a few credits could be spared, he had found the book which pushed through him, through the back and into his mouth and started yelling into it, until it had become fat. Metal pronounced itself into a blob which only worked so far as to have him cut. It would be inadmissible, untainted, detained even. Not to push away what had been the manner. Without at least a word from him, his body had become enveloped and turned. No longer would he mourn himself, as he got up, no longer would he be trapped either. 'Where's the culprit?' He asked the valves. None of which were trying too hard to get at him. As a matter of going, to plunge into the rowing beetles which found their way don' the droid-hatch, he looked for a way that he may be. Anything but this weird-looking fat, faltering contortion of metal which pushed itself in the most inaccessible spots. 'Look at me, I wish you paid just enough attention so I may call you by the name. But I cannot spare you of the time, evenly said, that of the green horse-chest, a mere. He who had been given birth by the fragmented horse-ends. They who would switch between themselves only to bear no reason and no rhyme. No kind would be as undeserving as that of ours.' 'Stop intruding in my mind, just tell me where the intruder is or I shall have you.' What he proceeded then would be as unforgivable as one could point out at himself. No longer would be pay the toll, as he leaped about the general zone, starting as he might, unfolding what ought not to be right. He was trying to strangle the valves in a decisive manner. Without a way to know, without the bitterness of thoughts, it would be unacceptable at that. 'The Prince deserves to know and he would have it.' As he twisted and turned, he only came to hurt himself more than it was needed, unnecessarily heeding to the least of tanner's colt. Which was pointed at him, even from times of old. But that weapon can't be there, he thought as he stared at the empty side of the corridor ahead. It didn't belong to this age and time, if anything; a crystal-energy phaser should've been pointed at him. Perhaps I am delusion, he seemed to believe, which scolding that piece which carried itself from his head, inside his hip. As the hole he had created pushed on deeper through his body, his face turned into a contortion of distress. He could only press himself there, as he fell. 'We've done it, finally, he's dead.' Now the valves could turn themselves as the machination of many enfolding and self-holding body cremation remains stopped. It appeared that they held the colt with their teeth from an unnatural angle inside their canine teeth. Weatherly-forlorn, caught by the storm inside the lower levels of the great turbine, this incident would go unheeded. Not only so, but an emergence of space-crystal PR eternal covering foils of acid started approaching the body. In as much as a few hours, they left only the bone-membrane which would be repurposed into many other valves for the usage of killing. What hadn't been known was the fact that underneath the rim of the land, there was that scarcity of repose. They had to keep making bodies like those which had been seen. With the release of the steam, the pressure which kept the stacked corpses in their eternal state ended. Instead they would start forming their wicked combinations of tainted nods. Nine days. 'Have you heard it already?' 'Huh?' 'Another worker managed to get himself injured around the head area. I think this time it's something terminally disgusting. I don't think there's a way for him to survive this one.' 'Slow down' a bit, will ya? I want to know more but I can't keep up with what's happening on the lower dorms.' 'Follow me then, it's better that you see all of this instead pushing it through.' Both of them made their way through. A vision of the paradise emerged from the nearest head. Violins singing, the flutes were ringing as the bells fell. By the hoarder's delight, a few pieces had gathered by the nearest one, intoned as he couldn't even get off the jitter. Druggies gathered in a corner which was thinner. There they'd each put a piece around their throats, all of which now rested. Even bested by the fights against the walls. Every now and then a man would turn and get up, bashing his head against the nearest splatter. 'Another hit, keep at it, we're getting it now!' The best of them could not even fathom going ahead, showing their dead or pushing themselves away. From not a single soul came a word, no uncouth dexterity or severity could be applied to the worst. Four madmen appeared, wearing all pink and orange kinks. In their spades, they bore bare bones from the graves they dug. 'These hands are not ours.' After the statement they showed exactly what they were talking about. It hadn't been a lie. Transplanted to their arms, they used to bear the hands in awe, straddled and captioned with as well as a deciding factor. Less than the benign, thrown and used for cries, they stolid those hands from the colder races, using them to bear the dead which clung, underneath them now, like flat shadow, yet solid and made. Out of the bodies of the dames and the officers, the soldiers of war, crooked and old, it didn't matter who they were. Life was simple afterwards, as they would only have to bring someone now and then into their underground working den. After that, they would simply shove another piece inside their head only to watch them act on their own. An accord came between them as they were peeved by the fact. 'If you are bound to break your skull like that, someone should be paid to collect what has remained of your brain. There's something in it which may be just worth it to explore.' 'What would that be?' 'The visions.' 'I see.' A charm had activated inside their minds. They would see that one who predated them by a long time. 'The Prince, who is he? Why is he lost to us? I cannot help it now. He must be found, or else I think I might lose a piece of myself which belongs to him. My words, oh how I cherished him until the time went on.' 'But you have barely heard off him, stop babbling.' Even they knew when to stop, once they realized at that there wasn't a way out. It was long awaited, the method of uncanny redolence, their missing insignificance which bore nothing but the vileness sprays. Some tingled as he came into their view. That symbol in the small room. A chesterrtee, a metonymy of appliances of metal, organic yet made out of welded iron out of some part which couldn't be touched. It looked fresh yet something was missing, the part which would complete him required all the pieces of living parts belonging to humanity at that. Hands, arms, legs, and missing coronary trapping antennas which would flash and let them know. 'Approach.' The order came onto the screen. Where have they been so far? Already the pieces inside their craniums made their way towards their hips. Dipping even sooner than it had been expected, these ones would be directed to the corner which needed to be cleaned. 'Unleash your hidden potential there. 'How?' 'By choosing your corner of death, I shall make sure that you'll all be easily picked and constructed so you may be able to serve as fuel for my new emerging body.' 'May I see it before I die?' 'It is not a real body, it's immaterial. Yet I need to burn as much as possible in order to make sure it doesn't completely fade away. Must I not be painted by yours truly?' 'I do not see why I should walk away. My life here was great and I have only thought I'd end myself bashing against the nearest wall I could push myself against.' 'Never be you minded of it, now. I think it's important to realize that sooner or later we'll all survive.' 'How?' Again that insolent tone and the mindlessness which would not be easily forgiven, by the means. 'You can survive death by doing what I tell you. As your body shall be broken apart by mere purging flames, I shall find a way to capitulate on the fleeing life-modules which infest these carcasses of yours. Mind you that It's not easy for me to explain my methods, that's why it is highly needed for you to follow.' The heat pressed on too fast. It didn't correspond to the heat that pushed from the other side. Both of them were different in terms of radiance. One could spread; one would be dead, dead, and erected against the battering cage made out of the forming walls around him. A trapped Chanhy would see only the blood left by those hallucinatory things only to learn now that he should've listened to what the monitor told him. 'Obey me and you shall be left to live. Life shall be unchanged, otherwise.' He wouldn't die; he would be the struck by the last realization that the monitor was real. And the only thing which would reside on the other part would not fit him any longer.

Regardless of just how much space there was in his him, they all leaped in and formed an easier piled for him to attach himself to. With those strange antennae, he would begin the attempt towards an established communication, deeply needed for what was to follow. Hollowing during nights, the lights would be over and another period would be done with. Eight-two hours. IT was necessary to believe in terms of the accessories with which one dead man excavated a piece of the past. It would not be possible for it to last in the future.

The thorn of Ihulh

The thorn had been forced by an aurora of the highest kind, which only came by itself, to grow. It had fornicated itself in a most peculiar manner, as it grew not inward for that part of the planet it had fiercely forced itself into but in the most malicious side it could've produced the mass. In its back remained the many protrusions which gave birth to the nimbly taint seen as a cloth-of forms which pushed on and on until out of them came the singularity. Supreme in its sight, the kind of dancers which came out were of no cloth, but a perfidious eel which surrounded them as well as everything, even if it appeared only for the likes of a glance at a time. From the torn came the great eyeless haze of pupils which looked upon the amount of piety they produced. For each flash of light brought them back. Forming realities as it pleased. It was not a biological being by no means, as this had been a great living machine made out of nano-protospheres implanted in the great descendants of the space races which had once inhabited Pluto. From their legacies they gave birth to the knowledge of never-ending sabbatical prophecies which said. As each flash revealed, they would build upon the past, whatever be kind in the future, alas. Many junctions inspired them to commit atrocious factories, which appeared independently in spaces. A judgment had been passed from either, as one could see it a disgrace for the moons which surrounded the torn, which gravitated forth. Each in time, gave life a new meaning, as they would come out not as those planted spheres, but as crackling in fear of what lay inside of them. The worshippers of the torn had the alacrity to be torn apart by their own desire to open him. As they would see, as they would meet, by the enemies inside of them. The very core of their being was an inner-war wrought constantly inside of them, which be powered by as many sourced. The images conjured by those eeling textures spreading sheets, could only make it seem like they were caught inside never-ending storms of misery, which enabled them to bring themselves to deathless gazes, stared and plunges towards their factories. As those were their mighty twins who separated themselves, only so they would seem likely to be exposed to the grasping arms, tarantula-alike in size and batter, though made out of the dust of space, which brought them to the platter of unknown that lay inside of them. In those pocket dimensions there was just enough a time for they to stand. And looking around instead would seem to make this point just too small of a transparent box which never left the galaxy they rested on. But it managed just enough, to conceal a mighty trident which faced the torn. This ever-like invention, a pocket but not a pocket, a black hole but not a hole at all, but a fraction of reality which folded around it, only but a quarter so it wouldn't be noticed by the progenies of the thorn, appeared to aim forth. Others like it spread around, readying themselves to push forth a mass destruction. An action which would be irredeemable to the very dreadful end where either of them could send their regrets in the twisting end of the plane which had become the planet. This evil thorn, as maliciously intent as it had been set forth to convert the space of the galaxy into a plane, straight surface, forcing the frolicking of utmost disdain, feeling no more of its extreme ingratitude and pain. One more moment, let aside. No one would possibly be satisfied living there. As the unnerving reality would strike again, only eighteen times harder. 'I am the Incongruous Mithodark. I have come about to steal your heart.' Spoke the spear, with its friend, the walking progenitor of heart-beats, the fiend with no end in its sight, which brought with it the insufficent malice of the others who tore holes only to bring in the image of the great base of seventeen, for that's where life kept about working so they would be to fight. 'This blunder will make me feel Ill, sir; I seem to have been twisted away by the more capricious heads.' The likes spoke of many deaths. In the other side of galaxy, base had occupied the entirety of emptiness which may have lain there before prior human contact came. As for the time being they had been seen as those who came after and nothing else. For their machines, constructions, buildings and apparatuses, the electric panels and even the long raised interrupters appeared to curve like in a tiny puzzle which came in itself to show only the malady of something which misbehaved. To look from above, one would see almost an abstract painting, of many shafts which shot in one another, of captains who were made of one piece and the dreadful abominations they invited on the deck. A wretched being couldn't have died any further than it would've been implied that it was alive eight decks below them. Stairs led into the ceiling and lead below. Sometimes to other realities as they should know that they looked out not out a visor but through a solemn kind of wicked eye. And that eye protruded itself to the largest of masses. Like cacti pushing tiny spikes which projected the sight ever father away, for these were softened and made to listen and to obey the most malign conversation which would be conveyed by the mouth and reeling blunders, inside the frozen-solid thunders of space. Beyond the barriers the base surrounded itself with, on the special front, on the gone-on worm-like reeling legs it had produced, the base looked like a symbiotic enmity of progenitor machines. Even those metallic parts were fiends themselves which drew forward to a most ecstatic manner. They mouth which extended and grew fed on the electrical power forced by the feeling extrubelance which threw itself forward. But it couldn't be though any longer as a way of pushing onward. Fright had started deceiving so many of them. The image ahead had only been that of a universe which ought to be squared. 'Perhaps we should live in its two dimensional hold. Even though it might be painful, I cannot see the future with any kind of hope. I'm afraid I lack the common sense to feed myself.' 'I have noticed it, dear corporal Iderion. The feeding tubes inside of you make up for the severe insulation of their sights. I feel like we're being constantly watched and guided. We cannot even evaporate our needs to breathe until we shall be employed by them.' And sinned he had no longer, for his alacrity gave in. As a symbol of their understanding, they started pushing in each other's chest the long protruding antler-looking blades. Of course they weren't filled with energy but a kind of unfashionable growing petulance of spreading lights in the form of fewer broken mirrors which joined one another at their wills. In reality, for as much as one could feel himself there, no one but a headless man, could be there amongst them. He noticed the body spread in eighteen sides and appeared to bear the most conspiratorially smile. Not only had he drawn forward, but he shared a look of a postulator fluttering winged menace which spouted a few discs out of its wings. Each disc started spinning and drawing in the slightly deformed corporal, with all of his tubes and all of the strange malignity he bore to himself. He could wait no longer until his turn came. For inside of those discs they all laid. Tens, if not hundreds of civilians who span around a realm so dizzyingly benign that not a single one could mutter what happened around them. It would only be a supreme sign of dismissal to stay. As their protruding factor could not be conveyed by forms, the shades of the insane, the inane actions of the atrocious scavengers came. For him, the butterfly projection of dark, pushed his discs too far apart, being afflicted immediately by their almost gravitational pull, which started taking him apart. No chart for the wicked and no stare would forgive him from the disaster which came. In that almost decent looking platform of the deck, when one should've looked if he was aware of the thing which would've forced him to be dead, he got caught in his own trap. And immediately he got ripped apart to shreds. An agony like his would only force him to be drawn back. For a few moments his pieces and organs, his malicious insecticide filled capricious innards showed signs of coming into life. But it would be unforgivable. It was foreseen that somewhere, in his disks, as soon as they came together to commit the supreme act of self-destruction, there hadn't been a reason for them to spare the captain or anyone as a matter of fact. Their existence ended there, as in a damnatory act so vile, they began imploding, leaving an entire port inside the station completely burn and torn apart. It was a malefic stare which came out of the torn, which saw the evil spread from that point on. Everyone looked, the creatures which had been a part of it, in that castle-like projection, twisted like the cracks piano keys, stripped of the means of melody. And the strings which came out of them pushed onward and extended, barely avoiding the tridents and the other weapons which were pointed at them. No being could deny their concurrent vileness, for as much as they could short forth, they stopped at one point. There, the mighty necromancer emerged out of the dead-point of the universe. Staring at them, he seemed lost. Not only had he been blasted by the full blunt eeling force of the inverted shock, but he had. Not survived. Of course they wouldn't know of the state in which he rested. This being who was in search of his disciple, who wouldn't dare be misdirected. At once he pushed on a hand and started moving his head back and forth. Then he turned towards the station, leaving the ones peering at him with such a feeling of uncomfortable trouble that neither of them could even be likely forgiven for staring for this long. Mistreated by the enemies of righteousness, he started peering in that spot. He recognized his mark made a few runes out of his clenched fist. 'Enter, my servants, I shall give you entry to what you ought to have. This station should be yours, and I shall bring you back.' It was agony at its finest. As beyond the portals emerged not the same being which had been there, but its counterpart, a legless flying bone-like commemorative of woe, which sprang from its back the clouded wings which stringed only the most alarming surfaces it could. A magic as theirs could only defy each other in the long run. For their discs had been cracked and bore a mark of a skull which had been ripped apart by the hand of the necromancer, which had been no made out of paint but of an actual skeleton hand.

He wanted to make sure that those pulled inside the discs and deep down those endless cylindrically-surrounded guttural holes which had been filled by the souls of billions and billions of termite-souls would ever-bite so near the skin and around the edges of the bodies of those trapped in. From above them a giant hand would prevent the disc from falling. Thought this had been a slim thing, only the bottle of the entry in the world below. For underneath it, there would only be the reign of giant-folded bodies which were strapped on top of one another, archived and stored, with one exception. Two giant squared boxes would be placed inside their face and inside their chests. Cities were bred there, and more alike, these discs were mere portals in the realm of the necromancer, he who looked upon the communities and served them with impunity. He who would be cruel and who'd fuel his surroundings with nerve gas, only as a vile one would. It could not be forgiven any longer, the fact that he had served for the few moments which took him to come forth. But as they made their way to replace the survivors of Pluto, he had turned and made a prayer. 'I shall prevent you from falsifying my ends, and I shall prevent you from destroying them. That is my command, may it not be shattered!' Farther than it they set forth. In a more distant place. The disablement of the species had begun. And the only influence that came over them began showing itself then, in the last robust fructification of the lobes. As far and wide as one could look and see, the only entry for the luckless cluster they brought there. For the borough's edge, as long as it would be called to the various intricacies which formed it, eight cocoons opened in the rims of the outer rings that appeared in their surroundings. Soon one ought to have been made aware of the layers of unkindness which encompassed the cocoons. It would be incommensurable, to even fathom looking around at about anything else other than the lack of sympathy they showed underneath their layers. It wouldn't even be necessary to know what secrets they even showed before they could even fathom looking around. I had only been here for eight eons before I came to realize that my mind had been absorbed inside of the cocoons. The least you could do is stare at me, of strange peculiar dangling daemoniac corrupted freaks. Your forms are not only benign but they make me realize that I cannot fathom it. The only thing which kept me going back despite everything I had to go through was the sudden loss of a life I couldn't have fathomed living to. My eyes opened for the first time in the poignant space. And there, in it I saw only the rims of a least forgiving wing that cut through us as soon as it could. We were thrown there, into space, wretched as pieces of us and of our lost white pheromones went to shreds. I was forced to bite my members in order to stay off the pain I've come to feel as soon as they began crushing me by the bits of their soft reeling teeth. It was highly inadmissible, for me to live through it.

Would they not suffer me to even taste myself before I would be devoured? For each time I gave a hint, they released the grasp of their teeth and began saying, in their wicked tongues, let us join you and let us think of this as a dinner in your name. If you won't even allow us to survive how much will it be until we'll be lost as you are? How long will it be until we'll freeze to death because of your ignorance and your lack of self-sacrifice? It was even worse that I started feeling guilty that I hadn't allowed them to do with me as they pleased. It was insufficient, to even admire the fact that they wanted to have me as raw and freezing as I was. But our sudden descent and our trajectory had soon been lost. We were picked up from that worming pair of projecting hills and bitter ills which manifested in the worst possible ways. I could see now that the giant golden, almost spear shaped legs could do nothing but push through us as they had. In at least the lack of an inglorious appearance, I couldn't even fathom trying to look away. What I felt then was the last destruction of anarchy we may have expelled out of our bodies. Or at least mine. I had been aware that, if there was something I couldn't stand pushing myself against, that had been their suffering. The worming, almost lily-padded, mounds started pushing out, trying to pick us one by one before we could even have a chance to get away. It wasn't even likely that we would be allowed to leave any longer, for as soon as we had shown signs, we would get ripped apart and put back together. This was the agony brought by the surgeon of space, the many mounds of which showed us the disease and the dissatisfactory embrace only the stoles of the masses would show. I could not fathom seeing so many other-beings, those mildly shapes crotons of bile, which grew up in their angular, highly plastic forms made for travel. They had their bodies almost set on a plane view, and from them came the push which brought their eyes apart. In the beat of a single heart I could feel their weeping gestures for they hadn't always been that way. On some larger planets, these Unbolts looked stolid, tall, factorial, producers of oil and extractors of other materials which had been hidden underneath the earth. From what could be told, out of their strange advent they had also been wickedly planted in more than a few spots as they kept growing and spreading as far as they could. The change hadn't been graduate, but it had been so. To some obvious descent, their previous forms had been factorial, as they degraded themselves with the digging of materials and other mucous trenches which dug themselves even deeper than it had been necessary for them to lie in. For one deep breath it took, for them to achieve some mastery to their descent. But they had been stopped, and cursed, admits the most deranged. Enough of the observations, they were quickly pulled back and strung to each side to prevent any kind of escape from happening. It would not be admissible by any means for them to be allowed any kind of living. 'Let us leave.' 'Nothing will suffice, until you would've died by our hands. I shall personally have myself been strung if I can kill my sisters and see them wreath in agony.' That mad desire only now came to surface and it had been petty and terrible and dreadful. Without a doubt, there could be nothing coming out of it, no wager, no danger and no way to draw back. From below the rims of their small areas, they would be tickled with such sharpened poles that they could not even wreath themselves back into form. And from their thin insides, there would drop what they had, even as spewed as they were for that. Most incongruous had been the work of the necromancer, of whose fault had result into the creation of this realm. As his endless feud with the throne had managed to destroy the severely crippled layer of the mad universal ecosystem which lay as the base of the strange worlds in which they stood. It was highly unclear whether or not he would be aware. He was in a distance place, looking over the corruption of a base he had come to throw underneath the wonder of his wrongdoing. He was dogged down by other space morbidities, choosing instead to retreat rather than face a fair fight against anyone at that. Within the hands and the reaches of his butterfly-skeletons, he had decided to turn to the realm, as he was mildly and mechanically aware of it and of the limitation they bore. Even in the short time they had been alive, it would be highly unclear as to what would be called great or uneventful. The dread of the masses could not contain him appeal, even if they called to him. 'Do not abandon your servants.' 'They yelled then, being heard in the various evil streams which communicated with him.' It would be hard to know otherwise, just what would happen if they showed just one more symbol of disgust. The digestion and accommodation of the ship-base would soon begin. Its large appendages already started taking on a form which was irredeemable unearthly and unloving. To it, to them, it would seem lost, to creep upon the forms of the least digestive worms. What had been attained by their dreadful appearance had been only that creeping feeling of being stalked, as they had attained not a physical manifestation of dread, but one creeping presence which far surpassed as it had drawn in the likes of evil. And evil it had bore with its many flag as it would draw on forward, in the most peculiar manners, the disturbing appearance of the tanners only leaving a few patches of the leathery skin which had remained on its bare bones. The appendages would be highly irredeemable and likely not to have been distinguished from barren ships abandoned on shore, filled with barnacles and blows to its structural integrity. As the texture spread, the vileness would end only for a tiny gap, in which each one of them would attain godhood. For as well as they pleased themselves to lay upon the nearest stars, they started dragging the station farther away from where it stood. And as it had, half of the universe shook, only revealing that the Thorn was deeply disturbed by it; know that it had been aware. Mightily aware of the false-presence and the threat this station provided. Even as it had, there was still the sign in-between the fashionable lines that it started fading from the known galaxy they were on. Many of the Necromancer's servants gathered on one of the main decks. Some had been caught and had been forced into a mild anagrammatic sight. It shot in a prism which revealed the bars which had been wrought in front of them. None would be allowed to pass onto the other side as the thorn was there. 'Why have my cocoons been destroyed?' Asked the necromancer, with his most loyal molders of moving lands held at bay. It could not even be comprised of his much unsanitary solution less woes. They would dangle and miss their angles as they'd turn. No face would look like its own. And out of one of the secret chambers he had hidden, which were nothing more than holes that were completely covered in dirt, he found one of his most loyal servants. The Imeod-Ahar, who bore only a head tall and a completely thin body which bore the appearance of a single prune that could barely be kept alive. In its magnificence, it had bore some dread, the bitter head being starved of the oxygen and blood it had desired. From one end it bore a too, which speared his head on the sides. From there, it had been crept, brought to live as its charnel-ivory started converting itself into a gut. Only through it could it speak aloud. 'Bear me thought, master, and allow me to address you.' 'What do you wish my dear one? I cannot fathom that you'd look so lifeless to me here in this peaceful paradise I have created. Of the many order I had appointed you all with, why is it that neither of you has even come close to bringing them to completion?' 'We have tried.' Another completely inflated head came out, with its small puckers that replaced the eyes and mouth, the main hairs acting like anchors which grabbed the various pieces of space, enabling them to climb. It felt likely that they'd be alive for much longer than it was needed. Arrogance is unheeded and unnerving. To admit the false doctrine of his power would bring them more suffering than it was needed. This wasn't his land after all, he had stolen it. But every time they indulged his lies and trickery, a piece of their will would begin fading. And so they would end up being buried in dirt made out of their own false thoughts. It was through that way that the necromancer had defeated many of his woes. A universe fallen, another one cullen, until there was naught left to the living. Woe be to those who call, little credence, better to fall than to remember. Better to be buried than to dismantle their master of his powers. 'I must admit that I have seen something I shouldn't have. Some of your servants had tried escaping and hadn't made it out alive.' 'But those were some of the few creatures I have bestowed life upon. I specifically stated you're to be planted in there and assume the mantle of fatherly embraces. How come you failed me now? Can't you see that you've stricken me in my tainted cowl?' Indeed they shared some resentment to what they've done.

Otherwise, the lack of guilt could have easily forced them down on harder mirages. It was time for them to be perpetually pushed onward to a disturbing throng, where they could finally be forced to walk on their own. As dangerous as it sounded, this was the last option either of them could ever fathom thinking about. There were at least a few methods of approaching the neared girde of the impalining legs which would stretch after them if they as much as considered going forth with it. In as much as a single day, he had achieve the concordance of an impossible task, delivering an unstoppable force from which he could barely raise himself from. If one could spar himself of it, that would at least be Darthan. He who hadn't even dared to look around at the world from its conception now raised from his waiting. Picked from a small patch which couldn't even push him past the point of wonder, he gave life to a planetary shaping-extinction which spread like a malady from rock to rock and other life forms which had found themselves going through space until there was nothing for him to pick out from. As the bottom of an idea faded, he woke up from the state of inextinction and began speaking. Ever since he had come from dead, he could not even wonder any longer at the various intricacies of space which had garnered his return from his journey. The necromancer pulled himself away. His big inflated cronies came to him like muddles puddles in set-near plights. It wouldn't even be certain whether or not they were to show any interest in what he was doing. Friend of the enemies, malignant reptile of M'sih came. Robed being worn uncannily in resemblance of the image of one of the lost lords, this creature came straddled by his many legs, and in his grasp there lay a device for metal fornication. A mass of metal twisted and spanned until it could start crushing and digging through a mountain, through rock and even through the hardened fractions of space which flew around them. M'sih drew closer to him and started asking the wronged one what he thought of the puzzle template he had made. All of them had been forced to turn and look at what he had brought from behind his back. Pieces of the most atrocious galaxies somehow had been strapped in his arm, coursing through his veins and pouring in his mind. He would be reckless in as much as a pointed mark, dreadfully aware of the malignities which spared no one of the mission he had attained for himself. 'By the time I shall finish this template, I will become a part of the entire galaxy and I shall remove the thorn myself. That would be my gift for you, necromancer.' 'How do you know of it? Its existence was supposed to be kept at a high secret from those who haven't come into contact with it.' 'I have and for that reason alone, I decided to come forth and throw myself into its gutless piece. Living with them and their various animated pieces had given me a whole new experience that I might be able to carry from this point on. From now I shall be known as a destroyer, a piece which shall corrupt, and fashion itself a self-inflicting blade, which shall slay both the thorn and I. Afterwards, I shall not be brought back, necromancer. Just so you may know that, I've come here only to let you know that there's nothing you may be able to do with the remnants of my body. But it also up to you to repopulate the hole which will be left agape on the other side. Otherwise, I shall bid you fare well, and we shall depart at once.' 'Wait, M'sih, but who are you? You've come upon my plains and have given me no clue and wonder whether or not I ought to know anything about your existence. As a stranger and as an apparition, how am I to trust you to undertake such a quest upon your bare shoulders?’ Even by the way in which his hands were locked, he could see that he hid inside of them just about everything which made him even remotely close to being a living thing. Moreover, he would be too tainted and lack the most important skill in the matter. Mindless tools like he had could not even hope to compete with the size of the thing. ‘This template of yours is only a mockery which will fail. Can’t you see that you weren’t even closely meant to live this way? I can see that you have poisoned your body beyond any comprehension. Perhaps I had known you before this change had happened. I think I would remember someone I left living.’ To which he dared call upon him with a fraction of despair, the reality of who he was. ‘You knew me, but I shall assure you of this much. Not only are you not a necromancer, but somewhere, in the distance, there’s an apprentice who knows your secret just as well.

His decree has managed to send someone down your track, a part of Mongolic hordes, and a lot which shouldn’t even be able to watch beyond their own knots and know it all. There’s something at least which will decide what it to be done with us.’ ‘Claim it then or shut your mouth.’ ‘Necromancer, you are not what you claim to be. A mere conjurer of dark spirits, that’s what you are. A petty threat which cheeped in the strange confines of secret and forbidden reaches which allowed you to call them inside the living bodies of your choosing.’ Not even his servants were aware of it, as the possession had been merely physical not psychical. Weirdly intoned, they retained most of their working minds and even more, they were set to bring the masses from below. ‘We were tricked by you, Conjurer.’ But his tongue was caught off guard, as the masses from below the ground started ripping every piece of land he had attained, growling as they threw their tantrum. Both M’sih and the Conjurer pushed themselves out of the way to avoid being completely overwhelmed by them. It was by pain and by glory that they regained sight to everything which even got close to the matter at hand. ‘They shall carry us back to it, towards the thorn. If by our mere knowledge, we shall feel, do not carry a mere illness to the landless lap that gives our heads.’ Both of them were wildly aware by now. And it was the worst time he could’ve shared this knowledge. But inside both of their skulls, each had a distinct looking lap which poisoned their brains disturbingly benign. It could not be contested, why the wild forms started playing with their minds. Why it could be pushed away, the daring alacrity, the lack of clear vanity. And worst of all, these tiny Laplanders were chewing piece of them, in order to open a gate of proton-radiation which would create an arc of infection that would summon the others inside the other people’s heads. It would not matter if there was a matter of a suffering of words. Increasing exponentially in the rate through which it started chewing through them would only mean that they would be mindless eventually.

Strange

‘We need the head of the runt. I saw him laugh, one queer thing came over this mouth, don’t mind me now but I think we’ve found our perfect head of the pottle.’ ‘That one? But he’s so small, and look where he’s playing, surrounded by a valley of rock-teeth, it may even anger it.’ ‘So what, you couldn’t possibly thing that old thing would start sprouting back to life, do you?’ ‘I can only hope so, perhaps then you will stop playing such a desperate laplandish nose-diver. You always hang with them, and search for the reindeer-hills.’ ‘But I saw them too, they made sinking fields and they were all backless, lack-luster of their private, trying to get away only to be pulled back again, and their tails were giving in smoke. I think their bodies elongated inside the hills and were properly burned by them.’ ‘Why would the Laplanders do such a horrible thing to their herds?’ ‘How am I supposed to now? They’re queer folk after all. Always keeping their distance until someone notices, I think one of them even took so liking to me.’ ‘A Lapp?’ ‘No, one of the reindeers, I they wanted me to burn with them?’ ‘Have they now? And what did you do?’ ‘I joined them, of course, look beneath me and see for yourself.’ His peculiar desert-garbs were taken off; this wasn’t his ecological field of nurture. Perhaps it happened, the thing he claims, as I could not draw my eyes from him. They burned him to a crisp and I can’t even think of the last time I felt something to bitterly crisp as the feeling of a coal-eaten piece of meat. Not from someone I knew so well. And his expression remained unchanged. A happy smile, unnerving even, he wanted to take a bite off my lip and chew it, with some of his charcoal as well. He told me that. ‘Only a piece, I show you mine, why don’t you show me yours?’ The wretch had disgusted me. The mere implications made me draw away from him and take twenty feet at a distance. My flintlock was prepared. ‘You have opted yourself as an unsavory creature. What stopped me from pulling on the trigger and aiming between your two eyes? I could have you as well as I can. Do not tempt me to put on a show for you; otherwise, I’m afraid you won’t meet your friends, the Lapps again.’ ‘But I will.’ Loppol drew his sand garbs back on. He wasn’t bothered at all. ‘What would happen if I shot you? In the middle of nowhere, where you won’t be found by them, or by the creatures you took the antlers from, to which, may I remind you that you’ve ripped them off their heads. Out of your own mouth as well. I wouldn’t be surprised that it had been the right thing as well.’ ‘Well maybe I exaggerated. Perhaps those sinking long bodies of theirs weren’t theirs after all. But the things which attached to them and were eating from inside their strangely made ends.’ ‘And you were planning on telling me that when?’ ‘Obviously you were not prepared; otherwise I think you are a sharp bit tooth of the picker.’ The confusion hasn’t even come yet. He shot him and watched him fall. He hit the grinder like a sack, pushing out of his head, like out of a suit, a smaller piece of a Laplander’s face came out. It came out with something in its back which doused itself with some moisture. The ends of it were something between a mouth which blew a kiss and a deep sea jelly. Cushtell had no intention on killing the Laplander, their paths wouldn’t cross. Why he was rightfully pleased to have gotten freed so many of them from the displeasing pain they had felt there. Before he had another chance to approach, he pulled a stick and started unwrapping Loppol’s body until he had gotten to the crisp side. So many of them had been lost there, now he got it, why so many of them realized the harm of the creatures that went inside their herd, it was them who started the fire and sacrificed those of their ranks. Grimness came, the sun contorted. Its yellow had become a whitish-blue, and on it there was snow. In a way, it had been beautiful then, but then again, he had to eat. With his fashion pole, he went near the broken piece of the frozen water of mirage. There were sea-tomes, who carved their way out far too many times and had ended up either suffocating on starting. Their meat would be spoiled, and they wouldn’t be allowed to be eaten, his plans for tonight foiled. Again, two more tips of his pole entered some unforeseeable entries. It was taken from then there. An eye, almost like the one of a fish bloated his dog. It died there, in front of him. ‘Dord, damn it, dord.’ The fish then went out of its socket and started jerking on the mid-water, past the frozen barrier and back into the midst of his shocking piece of gravel stone. ‘It’s the eight time now.’ But the dog didn’t seem to mind it that well. In total, he had lost an eye, a part of his jaw, but he had gained some things. Indirectly, from the unsulfured, untouched water which had been carried over short periods of time from the depths beneath them, they had given him a piece of the mirage. Inside of him there lay a miniature lake, in which smaller fishes lay. Alarmed by it and seeing it by the hole, Cushtell pushed his arm inside and killed himself. Not in that manner, but the smaller version of himself which lay inside the mutt. The dog immediately barked and attempted to bite his master, only to be met by fallacious stare. 'Off it boy or I'll off you. Don't make me put your down. I've already taken one, I'm not intending on taking you down as well.' He was nigh-desperate for attention. He could almost see it in the mutt's eyes. This wasn't because of the pain, but because, as of lately, Dord had been ignored.

Too much so that he would like to flay him instead and push out of him some of that immaturity, which he'd put aside. Two more anchors, down the rows, two swords tainted as for more than a few moments spent inside his watch resulted him snatching one more time. 'I won't repeat myself boy, you either let me say what I've got to say or I will bash your head in and crack my knuckles.' He released himself from the grasp and only inquired of something even-nigh closer. Being watched by a pair of laps for the last one of their laps, as from beneath them came, the release of their bodies which gave way for them to fade into the night. It was a beautiful image he had the honor to attend, as they floated away towards the likes of an aurora-borealis. Its colors vibrated so evenly that I could not take my eyes away. These laps which looked like frozen pieces of Mars, came to shine red and bring the feeling of a most repelling gaze, as I turned to my surrounding, near the cabin would I go, trying to hide from the cold. It was brought by the terrible ill-mind of Tietrotoroto. They were pieces of his cortex. During the month of April, he had come out of nowhere, almost like a giant abandoned seed. As it planted itself in there, from it came a few repelling arms from the trees and three trepees, which trapped him as the half people came. Oh they had been properly cut in halves. Not only so, but every half appeared to bear a different personality. But I had no doubt that instead of them, they had been replaced with similarly bodies invisible sides. Indeed, only with their help could they walk. And they strolled casually, normally, humane. But they didn't act so. Instead, they tortured the creature until the very point where it had completely expelled everything it had stored inside its head. They were almost crooked looking, in their heads.

Most crumpled and moving into circles. It was not until they had been eaten by the half-headed buffoons that they began jumping at one another instead of behaving. Eaten by themselves, caught by the improper, they had become vile. Emerging now would be the next generation. What had been generated beyond them had been body-hardened fighters who'd only bring the most obscure knowledge with them. They unscrewed some of the pines and implanted on them a piece of the mind. Often now I could see one of them flying in the distance and landing somewhere else.

One of these days they'll get us and my cabin would be ruined. 'How was your day, son?' 'I had to put down my friend, father.' 'And how did that turn out for you?' 'Close the hatch and head back in, father, it is not safe to dwell at this hour. We've spoken about it.' He was resting in a cold coffin, surrounded by the machinery which kept him nigh-sleeping for ages. It's hard to believe that I look older than him now. But the giant blue tube and the small drawn blood and plasma he's been getting from me kept him alive for so long. If only he hadn't been so thoroughly annoying, ever since he found out that he doesn't need to sleep, I've been bothered ever since. I do not intend to end him. But I can see that's he's slowly being bored as well. 'Will you take me down there? By the mirage?' 'Once the cabin is fully build, we'll pass down there where we'll be safe. Could you simply not wait for that, father? I beg of you, just leave me be until the time comes. I need to make so more changes to the design and the wings and the.'

'We're flying now?' 'Only steering the entire cabin down there, in case we approach something we shouldn't. It's highly dangerous down there. I think we should find ourselves swayed in.' 'But I do not understand, son.' 'We got bad eyed, by the fish, now you get it? I cannot be spared another second before I'll waste away. My bones are weary, see? I'm getting older. If I don't succeed in what I'm planning here, neither of us will make it, or the alternative. 'Sleeping with them, that's a good boy.' 'Thank you Trenchcoat.' It was his code name, since the dies had been case and he had lost his hairless hat. It was something he deeply cherished. But I could at once, just look away. I was disturbed by that which called me from there. Not a living thing I wager, but the strange effect I dreaded the most. A spinning sinking point of water or, the drain. My nightmares of the drain only brought me to the point of no return, where I'd be stuck with my father in a box underneath the rim of ceiling of ice, surrounded by nothing and no mass of meat. What would we eat? If not for my strength either, he would have no more transfusions to be kept alive by. As my body trembled, ever so near that shock, I felt like I could die any moment now, out of the wretched point. They wanted, I know. I see them taunting me past the pines. 'I wish I had some more time to spend with my friend. But I always end up shooting them.' 'You're making a habit out of it, aren't you?' 'That I am, Trenchcoat, but I cannot help it, that's how I was made to be. Otherwise, what would people think of me?' 'A good friend and a good son.' 'That's why I love you dad.' A few more ore-spots and I could bring on some more corner supporters. They would be plain enough to keep everything from collapsing. I could almost smell it now, tempted to give in. By the third of the row, I grabbed a pick and my good companion, Dord. He could watch over me in case something went off. It was disgusting, trying to find even a good one which hasn't even been completely covered in the chronic rock-mudds. They were bringing out their worst, noisy ruffians, who hadn't any care for anyone else but themselves. He hadn't been aware of what was going on around him. Far too many crooks were trying to have their way with him. They turned their eyes and only appeared there. As a sign of flattery they taunted him as closely as they could, walking around it over-turned trenchcoats, which went over their heads. Most of them had the awful behavior implanted in their heads. For some reason, they'd get so close as to draw their fingers even deeper inside his head. Nothing was lost or gained by it. He was merely poked. 'Stop it already, this silliness distracts me.' 'That's the point now, can't you see that we're doing it on purpose?' 'I see it now, and you need to stop pestering me, or I shall have to turn and show it through your thick skulls.' 'Not here, they're watching.' They weren't part of the same tribe, it seemed. Rather primitive nonetheless. He held just as much distaste for both of them. Now and again, they'd bring some strange images I could barely break anything apart in their presence. It was a never-ending cycle of them pushing on their charts and their maps onto me. I couldn't be bothered by this, not now. Not while looking into it. I wish there was a better explanation for them being here. A few months ago, by the time they appeared, it seemed like they were fisherman. They gave that impression vaguely, but in this zone there wasn't a way out. All of them caught me off guard. They spread as soon as they found it worth to take off. One curious glance lead to another, at least I could be sure that they weren't trying to cut a piece of my ear or drag around. My coffin waited. It was there, during the conceiving stages of my plan, I could see myself jumping in it and trying to sit near my father. We could both lay there without a chance of getting air. I know I was asking too much now. 'Will you help me break the rocks?' 'I thought you weren't going to ask, let's follow him.' Each of them broke the illusion without a feeling of despair or of the knowledge of the unfair remarks they had on them. It was truly peculiar, seeing their strange black arms, shaded like giant fly-legs, hairiest but less pronounced, getting out. I saw something near the edges of their heads protrude out and they far beneath the coat, as I put it to the mind. And even their metal picks, as strangely strapped with some jointed sharp edges began pushing out. They looked like the satins coming out of their flat fingerless buzzing hands. Something else was the matter. 'I see you're producing that mustard-looking meat cells from inside your hands, if I can even call them that.' 'Do not bother us now. We agreed that we would help you. Is it truly that important for you to comment off our every move?' 'This can't be helped; it's part of who I am. First the coats, now this, I've never seen you this exposed.' 'And you would not like to see us in our worse cases. Otherwise, you'd only scowl and move away. That would be unacceptable, since you're one of the few ones that remained here. Come on now, we're starting to shake.' It was obvious that they were sharing so many things between one another that I couldn't help myself but stare. Even as they were busy exchanging long arms behind their backs, I saw something near-looking to the side of a giant box-cutter they were preparing for themselves. 'Where have you got that from?' 'We were given them by some close friends of ours, don't you mind it now. We've done more than a few arrangements as soon as we came about the multitude of insects we've collected. They're really interested in them, because we have this natural ability.' 'Naturally, as from one son to his many daughters in his ground, we're collecting them, as soon as we can.' 'Will you just tell me? You said I was the only man around here, now there are more?' 'Cushtell, I never said anything about a man. As a matter of fact they're anything but those. I would say they're even close to being some desperate prototype of metal.' 'Yeah, desperate to look like you for some reason, I would even say they're not even that desperate to say it out loud. I saw the way in which they behaved. It's inconspicuous, but I think they adhere to the uncanny voyeurism.' That mere addition had only made Cushtell grind his teeth. He had been plainly and obviously displeased of hearing what their implications were. It was a hard-diamonded miracle that he didn't just leap on them and started blowing and guttering them to a pulp. He had emerged victorious from his previous encounter, but now, he was outnumbered. 'I'll see what you're talking out.' 'We wager, since you're the only one here, who can give him what he wants.' 'And what's his name?' 'Thrutmesh, he's but a mere copy, in reality, he's nothing but a tiny metal can.' 'And in it there are the small engines which keep it flowing and growing and getting as far away as one have to go. If I were to choose something for myself, I'd pick a similar model and ask him to replicate me. I would feel flattered by his jealousy and the harm it would bring to itself.' 'But what is that?' Another one of the miserable's creodonts brought my attention to the sky. It was another assault, or a set of them, which came about in as many rows as possible. Each landed, bland of woe, pushing onwards, scowled of disillusion. It was impossible to watch now. As soon as their pines started floating, they would burst into terrible fires, revealing their planted bombs. 'How did they obtain the blowing fuses and the gunpowder?' 'It's him, isn't it?' They spoke between themselves. It was only known by them, or by their mouths, that one of the delivery androids had made their way here. And his type had been of a unit of the most peculiar manner. A can-replicator, ejector of guts, he didn't know. They didn't know it, but whoever came into contact with it knew that there were just a few choppers which might draw its insides out. 'Should I spare you the voice and might we go ahead and join the worst possible thing now?' 'What was that?' 'Can we start picking the ore for you?' 'May I, good Cushtell?' 'You may, now break it.' Blowing each fuse was a bad sign, as they had enough doubt to share around. I was merely trying to look in any direction I could. The mild image of the olive-units came about his sight. No one felt brave or safe around them, because of their innate ability to attract fingers in. Like strange magnets which opened into wild cutter, they could rip out as many fingers as they could pull it off and draw them in. A mystical force appeared out of the sky. Like an ever-spreading spectrum of colors, which popped with energy and light, from a hole which sucked itself in, there came a single specter that looked vaguely deformed. In as much as one sudden disintegrating nimbus that came out of it, this secret melted in the aurora, changing so violently that it produced a burning sensation in the land of snow. Flattery couldn't be accounted for the feelings they felt. From inside the melancholy of space there appeared, out there the talons of the mage. As peculiar as it seemed, he left one sign in front of his cabin's door. 'I believe that one's for you. Perhaps you should go there, immediately.' 'And I don't?' 'Then don't do it, we'll wait for you to die off here, in the wild, as they're plating pines on your bodies for the rest of our stay. Perhaps if you're lucky enough and you won't die from being impaled, the flames could burn the rest.' 'Very well, but first the ore, I cannot make it without a day's work.' 'A day's work? We've been going at it only for a few minutes now?' 'That's more than enough, don't worry about it too much, you've done enough.' A share of frowns only brought each other to the closest pieces of the ether which planted them in. Their mild amorphiins were drawing in leaving a trail of many long hair-like tingles felt by the parson who touched them. It was a feel of ecstatic which drew itself in. Even more likely had been. The stop, as each stared. No exception was there. It was that malevolent dark fiend, which shall not be looked at for within. Perhaps it was because of it that it had gotten here, but that wasn't for them to know. From its mask-like suppressive stare, there came a grin, as from within it, he spat a few pieces of some wing. Nastily aware, that it had been there for so long, it had come about two more important decisions. Would he eat them now? Or should he wait? He saw Cushtell going by his barracks. This plan of his, on which, of course he had eavesdropped it, fascinated him for the good part of his life. It would be interesting to look otherwise at something which may have been the key to his disgusting real, but for now he waited. Attentive at the closest ways, they started performing for him, as if they were intentionally planning on getting him to pay attention to them. How else would this work if not for the latter? He had appeared in front of them, drawing one tiny vacuole of an olive seed from his mouth and spat it in front of his clot. From inside of it, the force drew their coats in it, adding enough pressure that they would immediately give in and kneel. 'You've submitted easily enough now. I've taken away the gifts which were taken by the new prototype I've brought here to test. It would be impossible for it to be take anywhere else you know?' Pay attention me, I want you to look at me as I speak. But Agamemnon could only stare at the strange fuzzy creatures which prolapsed their many legs around their bodies, adding to an entanglement from which neither of them could get out off. I shall stare even deeper to see. Thought he, as he pushed in, so close to their insides that they were thoroughly exposed. Inside their simple systems, there had been just enough jerky-capoules which grew inside their spheroid antecharms. They weren't living beings, but conjurations, which entered souls made out of tarantulas, which forced growth and contortions. Some traces of working brains animated the pink walls inside of them. No satisfaction could be drawn any longer. They would die of thirst if he wanted to. Even with the snow present, he wanted them to suffer a little. 'Eat the snow, now, I command it.' Brave to the last of sparks, he bent down and ate a few inches of a handful of snow. It felt like he was pushing nails through his large membrane, even with the pain he felt. He wouldn't stop it. The need to stop the thirst was too hard to quench. 'You've proven yourself enough, stop now.' It recoiled and fell to the ground, forced to a seizure. Regardless of the pointed steeping points, where one could lose a few joints, he flew back into inexistence, never to be seen. Cushtell came about inches to where he left in order to see wherever he was getting back at, never to foresee the others. A few minor additions could be placed here and there, just about anywhere, as one could never be too aware of what would work, or who'd be there. But after the door opened, he felt himself nearing someone who had put his father to sleep. He saw the door open and didn't bother to read what had been written on the ground. Instead of it, it wasn't even unruly to think about. 'What have you done?' He attempted to chase the intruder but only ended up following something he couldn't find. Regardless of how hard he tried pursuing it in his own house, he felt like he wasn't even doing anything. Like a strange walking dud, he only came within inches of the floor before realizing that he wasn't there. Always like the tip of a form, the intruder was still there. It waited for one of his exemplary reactions before he could leap again. Otherwise it wouldn't work, he simply couldn't be there. 'Your father is not dead, you needn't worry over that, and I've only made sure to put him to sleep before you entered the house.' The whisper only came by his ear, out of fear of some wild remarks. It wouldn't be even wildly believed at all, the way in which he would shout or fight about for a few more minutes in. 'I had the chance to kill him, you know? But I have prevented myself from doing it. Do you honestly want to know why that is? Out of respect for your family, for which I only have the vague recollection of your lost name. I know you're one of the Di'Dorko, evil men, runaway.' 'Now who are you? Why are you trying so hard to take a jab at me? Revel yourself villain, specter, bastard! Or I shall have you before the last drop falls.' He looked about the roof and noticed one piece of it which lay unfixed. It was a mere trick of the eye, after all, and one could not even know what went on. He would be obscured by the worst sense of implosion his mind could force itself on. After so many drops he should've noticed it. That wasn't water but some of the weird stationary oil which glued the shapes of the wall together. 'Who are you? I won't ask you again, I need not try to explain to you the consequences of intrusion, otherwise, I shall go ahead and make your head pop off.' 'Listen to yourself, threatening me like that. It's mildly interesting to me.' The ray of malign power which inhabited my senses only now came into light. Standing near its speak of effigies, stood the mighty magus Malknir, bearing his chest exposed to the shin-basher of M'drr. It was not by his choice that he was here, caught in a trap which ripped him apart. On the edge of the cuirass-strive, there was only one thing left, the first rim of the lost quip from the lost beyond. His last moments of life had vaguely set him stranded on the lost edge near the entry to the catacomb of Ill'Narak, who had his large skin-devourers plunging towards their destiny. Lackless in wonder, they grew stronger with each blow and each bite, spreading about every side and shaft which is in their reach. They acted like preachers of the noxious nerves which attached themselves to him just so they could keep him alive some more. It was obvious by how their large bodies acted that they started shaking and vibrating and expelling everything out. Their huge suppositions protruded out, these beasts which had the mighty size and strength of orangutans', with their strange fists and penetrating set of claws threw each other around the body of Malknir, drawing together into a living twist. All of them shared the body immediately breaking it apart, seeing pieces of his eyes starting, his nose and weariness bearing him ever so close to a true passing. But he would be kept in that strange twist of blue, from which no hue could be stronger. As the nerves implanted themselves even in their wage, the derange activated and there came the strange invoker of pains. Inside their strange cupolas they had managed to leave just enough of their nerve leashes sitting on the ground, pouring their vile blue liquid out. Power surged and from the dirt there came the first invoked fiend, summoned from within their guts. He bore the resemblance of half an infant, part Malknir, and in-between his guts there shot a spear from within. 'Another one of the dark spears appeared. It's a sign I wager, that someone's bound to find it, besting all of them one and bring the arc which may split us all asunder.' All feared the breaking of their bodies, the loss of half of their homes and even an afterlife which would be at the throngs of the burning side, which would fall back. And the in-between, the kind which shattered their hopes in a never-ending freezing storm which would seep on both sides. Between the three realms, there would be a grand new rebirth, which would only creep the most unnerving ones at bay. It could not be that one would find peace there, but that would be the alternative in any case. Most deranged of places was that decrepit place which bothered all of them, as it surrounded all of their afterlives, as if looking at some globes in the wreckage of lows. For the great bohemian master of thoughts appeared to be resting in his study. He would stare at his device, the melted cups which held the globe and all of their worlds, be it after-life or the other ones at that. No deceiver could be called. It was planned along by him that he would shatter all of them before their insignificant fears and prophecy could take place. And for that reason alone he peered and sneered at a mirror with no reflection. While one armored face came out, he could see just about a few moments in. That inside of it, there was the library of glass. And all the books and notes were made of it, and only they shared a tiny reflection from their covers. 'May I speak to the librarian?' He asked, and from the depths of a crowd of glass-readers, he came. He looked mightily busy and preoccupied by something. It was even now, both of them stood as just about the same level. This strange denigrator of peculiar secret, Echaphiot started at him, wondering whether or not he could rot his needles and his point of glass. If he could smash his animals and kill him last. 'Another threat already? I thought it was settled that we're not going to resist. We're not looking for anything, sir, only for the most capricious mistakes and the worth of our time.' 'I've not come here to threaten you; on the contrary, I've come here to seek some advice.' 'From us? Or me? But what got into you Caphiot? Usually you'd seek to smash us again and again, the shatter us out of some wild amusement before we could put each other together again. There's no hard glass here, only the liquid kind, you know that. We're barely standing together as it is. And every time you step in, we can all feel the thing and the shake. Our likes and mistakes that we feel. Insubordination as well, by the way, have I told you how many assassination attempt I've had placed on me? I cannot even suffer myself, ever since you started talking to me.' 'Enough, librarian, I want to know whether or not I should shatter the globes I've collected. If I choose to do so, I shall find myself destroying and putting an end to far too many lives than it could be acceptable at all.' 'What's stopping you then? I'm sure not a single glass fiend would bat an eye.' 'Not you, but the other ones. You've heard of them. They've found a way to mix themselves with the mirrors; I think they're living in my walls now. I've been warned before to watch over so they may not grow and get a form. I cannot fathom what would happen then. I'm afraid.' It was a dreadful sight which silenced all the readers, even from their mild subvocalisation. He didn't dare look back at them. But he believed that once they mixed with glass, those strange abominations could be too destructive to be left alone. I wish I could find a way to spare myself of all of them. It's unnatural, the way in which they're trying to get to me. But I shall not let them. 'Be weary of what I've got to say. Hear, hear, for I won't repeat myself another time.' It was up to me to try to somehow fix the glass beings by whatever means I found it necessary to do. They hadn't given me the chance to explain before they began retreating in their peculiar holes inside their strange appliances already made me feel as if I had been inert and impossible to master. In my thought rested that strange desire which fashion every member of the occult or of the mad research, in that they wanted to rip be apart. If I were to give them as much as a single fortitude of skin, I'd make it.

Sorrow

I lost everything in my search, everything which even brought me nearer to being considered a man, let alone human. The symbol of the company stood atop the portcullis' leading to the main entrance. All of the cadets, engineers and companions would have to have passed it at one point in their lives. I remember it vividly, the logo being two men shaking hands, represented completely and utterly digital. Unlikely that I could've made something out if I stared. And stared, waiting in the lines. This was the casual circumspection which brought me here before I could properly enroll. Out of the selected few candidates, I was the only one with a half-a-mind to ask for a table, or a brochure. It was the beginning of my indoctrination. I chose to go through. With each page, regardless if it came from the paper or from the weirdly calculated few inches of screen, I could feel my thought being shape in the image I was supposed to fall in. It wasn't likely that I could feel anything immediately, but the change came to me almost introspectable. Lines like these pushed in too far, and I was still a man. No implant and no touch of anything which drew in the non-human behavior. They wanted to push me past the limits of decency. Especially him, the worker from sector B. He was the fourth after the man standing in front of me. I could see vaguely redness to his skin which had been a rash that spread across his body. Blunt to the touch, and lonely, I felt like I could pair myself with him as soon as we checked in. 'Thicket and print, please.' Both were in line and checked, thoroughly, only by a few inches of the printing needles. Shocking tingles went through my thumbs, and I could feel only the slightest trim of blood being taken from me. They were good at storing everything, or anything which made me even remotely work. I had a loss of plasma last time. 'You seem to have a body-defect sir. Do you think we may need to procure you some antibiotics? We'll take it out of your month's salary.' 'I believe I'm fine. I'll bear through it, there's no pain and it doesn't interfere with what I do.' 'And what would that be sir? This file says you're working in a strange sector, a new one. No definitive assignment had been give to you.' 'For the time being, I just have to make sure they're oiled, if you know what I mean. I cannot speak about them here. But they stand the possibility of being too dangerous if there's a leak, or if there's a shortage.' 'There's no need to continue, I think I understood. Permission granted.' I joined the others in the elevator as soon as I had been allowed. Red-rash was still in my vision. For the sake of looking out of place, I put on my sun-blockade and managed to completely enclose my eye-lids. From now on I would pay full attention to him, without being seen. 'Working on that new model again, Korvk?' 'It's never getting easier, I think. They're always trying to drag a few more hours on my back. Sometimes I think they're slowly trying to replace my body with a field of machines and keep only my head in a few of them.' 'Say, if a piece of you is good for one, then a few of them are just as good for many.' The thought of it was at least worth a check. It didn't sound like he was playing with him. There had been some conviction I noticed. 'Don't count my full brain out of it yet, I think it's still well to do, for a few more years at least.' 'But here's the thing Korvk, they have only recently developed signals which would make someone be able to properly function as if he were in a single body with a single brain. And even better, he could be connected with opposite sides and opposites parts of other people's minds as well. Could you imagine all of the sudden gaining the abilities, memories and functions of the best men in their fields?’ ‘And who would get the worst parts of this exchange?’ ‘The sweepers, of course, who else should even deserve those? Alcoholics, druggies, the needles and other plunging men, those dead ends could go away, and the good part of it? No pain, no way of being destroyed, and finally being taken care off by the automatic system and the shocks. Wouldn’t you want to get rid of your depression now? How about, are you happy in your current condition?

Your post maybe, wife?’ ‘I’m doing fairly well. It doesn’t get better than this.’ ‘Surely it doesn’t. In any case, I’ll only leave my card to you, and you and.’ Redrash didn’t pay any attention to the high-foreheaded man. Neither of them cared enough to depart at the next stop. It was a mere matter of paying too much heed to something that didn’t even remotely matter to either of them, the thought exchange. What troubled me in particular was sharing all of my most intrusive memories with another being. All of my personal thoughts and... I started wondering how it might work. What would they imbue the pieces of the brain to keep it working? And how would they have access to all the wide-spread neurons? Not only had I not possible recollection of it, but I could not even be remotely trusted with a single nerve. Next stop broke my lines of thoughts. My first glimpse to the project had been obscured by a giant fenced cylinder in the middle of the room. They had completely circled themselves around it just so the scientists could watch and sneer at each other while it started chumming in. By my choice, I could at least try pacing in a few steps and look around. All those large panels and detectors were something close to a generational leap that no hard-engineer could lay eyes upon without being shocked. Everyone wore gloves there, which only amounted for a few of the shocks which spread at a mid-level, closest to which being an electrical short-circuit which caused it. But it had not taken me another second to look away from the main attraction and feel its pumps going inside. Something was spinning there, somewhere, going deeper then slowly lifting itself up. The display of it shook my body before we were sent back into the rims of the elevator. ‘Back to your posts now, there’s nothing to see here.’ We were being taken care off, made so no questions would be asked. I was sure that I should’ve paid some more attention to them.

One of them had been a recognizable scientist. More so, I was slightly disturbed that this stop had been the high-forehead’s drop, which left me think of the worst possible outcome coming from someone who spoke so jovially of the loss of a man. With only the three of us left, I asked Redrash. ‘Who are you? I haven’t seen you around here before, and I swore I would recognize your face out of a basket.’ ‘I’m not trying to intrude or anything, but, you should leave him be. He’s an old employee, he works on a subsection of B minus.’ ‘But, I’ve never.’ I started a bit too often at both of them, which, in turn promoted both of their stares. Neither of them appeared to give me that easy of a time, despite all of us being clean. Not a single electronic implant or device inserted in our bodies. How far had this got us to? Regardless of the times, I could not fathom getting too far myself without giving in and taking a piece or a shimmer of some device. Anything which would give rise to it, perhaps this would do for now. ‘Do I look like someone looking for trouble? Because I’m not, I’m only trying to stick with my own.’ ‘We’re not your own, whoever those people might be. Unless you want to hang out with the high-forehead that is.’ The similarity of thought almost hit me instantly. I knew Redrash would be something I would like, ever since I laid eyes on him. This was only a matter of me trying to get through to him and wear him down. ‘Perhaps we started.’ Before a word came in, the elevator kicked in and started moving onward instead of going down. I had given in whatever chance went into my head that I might befriend him. This was Jonas’ station after all. Next stop, a single table which prolonged then turned around the second wall. I saw the various machineries he was working on and I wasn't surprised when I saw the tools. Cork-shrews and screwdrivers, hammers and bolt, everything which would've been predominantly last-century. The miasma of air went off, and we were alone again. This unfathomable circumstance was something I could not get away from even if I wanted. He wasn't going to drop it then. 'You were staring at me for a few turns now, is there something you see that insults your sensibilities?' 'I was curious, that's all, and it isn't often that, this happens.' 'An infection due to some materials I had to handle while being unprotected, nothing else. I assure you this is only temporary and we should.' 'We?' He had clearly meant it then, but it was quickly rectified before I could press him on. 'I should be able to get rid of it, as soon as the whole level is clear. We're, as in we and the second team bringing in the toxins should be able to clean everything around the area before any danger of it spreading comes.' 'But there's always the danger, isn't it? It could come out at any moment and just push onward.' 'Your point being?' 'Wouldn't you mind if this information came to other people? I can't stress it just how hard it is to work under the stress of there being a leak.' His palm had been planted just behind my year. I only head a smack on the wet metal. Either water or sweat, it didn't matter yet. It was the first time I had seen him become somewhat aggressive, to the point where he was recklessly trying not to push it too much. Otherwise, I stood the chance of almost losing an ear or some thumb. Hard gloves occupied his hands; I should've known he was an engineer. But why would an engineer work unprotected, it didn't make sense at that deep' a level. 'I need to make it clear now. Look, I'm trying to give you a fair shot, since you've been assigned to some janitor work.' 'I don't work as a.' 'Shut it down now. Don't ask questions, don't pay any attention to what we're doing and don't start spreading word around if you know what's good for you. Word of advice, friend, I seem to understand that no one likes it when word spreads around. Everyone knows what's happening on the lower levels and let me tell you, it gets much worse than this; you wouldn't want to be transferred there. Keep it quiet and you'll be fine. Make more noise and everything will be all right, for either of us.' Just in time, my stop came. I only care for it now, for a way to look outside and see my post. I would gladly go through whatever task was at hand if it meant not having to deal with him again. 'Would you at least give me a sign that you understood?' 'Show it to me?' 'What?' 'I want you to take me to your workstation and show me what's causing this.' 'You're not exactly authorized for entry there, this could lead you into more trouble.' An off-shot reluctance met him then. He would be at least uninterested in continuing with it for as long as he could be there. It wasn't likely that he could continue going one. It was easy enough to look around and notice. He hadn't been given much of an option now. I wanted to think of a better way I could force him to let me follow him. But, strangely, he showed no signs of reluctance. As a matter of fact, he even considered it. 'You may join me then, but you need to keep your key card with you, understood? I should be able to shock it a few times, just so the barrier won't start clicking in. But don't try anything special down there. I know how alarm them and it goes without saying that if you show any sign of doing it, they'll, you know. They drag you down and make sure you never waste any of our time again. Just be careful. Or else you'll know what happens.' I was perturbed by how easily he allowed joining him. As much as I had been pleased by the whole idea of trying to get myself evenly standing, I could not even think of what would happen if I looked around where I wasn't supposed to. Our elevator had its first stop since we were alone. I could not concentrate on anything but him. It was surprising to think about the many times he seemed to have turned while going in. Was he expecting me to run? Perhaps it was something I ought to have thought myself. By now they would start checking in the newcomers. 'Join them, once you're there, scan the keycard and make sure you've got your story straight. You're a trainee, nothing more. You don't know this place or what goes down around here. As a matter of fact, make sure not to mention my name.' 'I wasn't even counting on it, trust me.' His name had only sounded vaguely remote to me. He had only been known as Redrash, nothing more. Anything else already left my mind. 'New? Figures, you're not properly clothed.' As soon as I joined the other newcomers, I've noticed it as well. They interchangeably used the same clothes or pairs of suits similar to mine, while everyone else was wearing some kind of field armor, completely designed to protect their bodies from the outside forces. It was something I may have thought about while being there. Otherwise I couldn't possibly hope to make it. I wasn't a good liar one bit. This barely got me going as soon as I could set myself in. 'Can I at least say something?' Just over my shoulder, he was trying to peer at me. Would he actually know if I said something I shouldn't? What if he found out, or did something to prevent me from going away? It wasn't likely that I could get out now. 'I'm a transfer.' 'One of those, I see. Well, it's great to have you here, come on now; we have a special place for those like you. I hope you don't mind wearing one of the heavy suits, which sectors are you from?' 'I'm some A-alpha; it's just a few levels above.' The tablet had gotten in handy. It served me right and appeared to have lead me to the point where they were working the machines. I think he supposed I was some heavy lifter, because I was given one of the big suits. It was indispensable. Giant claw-attachments seemed to be derailed from a trucking body that pushed onward. I could get used to one of these if it mattered. And with one me, I would be roughly prepared. 'SO, transfer, would you mind giving me your keycard?' 'A moment, please, I seem to recall something. Here, take it. Don't mind it now; I couldn't hope to actually go inside the suit without any kind of confirmation. That would be vastly.' 'Give me the card already.' 'Right, here it is.' He brushed over it, with a tool of precise recognition. A hand-held square, with two jittery clickers propelled themselves to the point of capture. I ought to have looked well into that picture now. I seemed to be happy there. This is the first entry of the Allan'Orach, first citadel of the elder moons. It cannot be stressed enough that its caverounous ships which had been orbiting their rims had done nothing but hinder the lesser migrations around the planet. From atop its highest plains, rested the first enterers who had broken civilisation apart. In their incomplete search for life they had driven countless species to extinction, out of their inability of complete pursuit. It had been unknown whether or not life could grow on the Allan'Orach, or whether or not the planet had been anything but artificial. As it was determined by the Enclave of space in the ancient time when the moons ajorned themselves by the insides of the planet, there had been close to no survivors which haid laid there. When the arrival had reached the point where entry could not be distinguished from invasion, the only living molecules which came into contact with them died. One of the great races had fractioned itself there, at the time of the impact with the grim foreclosure there. Diary of a strangler. Entry from one of the many files lost in the Allan'Orach. There were plenty of stranglers around the rooms about there, still flying through each of their each of their beads and their peerless eyes. None of them had been too busy to expose as much as an I could from their secret services. As you may have thought, I find it quite obvious that they've outdone themselves already. I could see it going on as far as I could see. This would be the best manner of looking into it, as far as I'm concerned. Nothing was easier than seeing the bullets being shot out of a gun. I felt it in my liver as soon as I could. I felt as if everything else had all of the sudden become meaningless to me in some way I could not even fathom to look away from. I have been vaguely disturbed in such a fashion, which shook me immediately, before I could even release my nerve. My surroundings had been completely trampled by what I could see, the walls of deep and fallen crevices only made me think of what might happen to me if I chose to look around and fade. My existence until this point had been pointless as I had no possible recollection of the past and I thought of the worst. I saw the other stranglers and I could think only of them being somehow none of the people I could even stand looking at for too long. They've outsurpassed me beyond content. I felt like I was a stranger to them, an outsider who hadn't found his place into the world yet. And what overcame my sudden feeling of nausea had been the first book I have found talking of me in the past. That's who I was, that's what I was and I found myself reciting so many works speaking in detail of dead men that I couldn't peer anywhere else. I'm the author of the first book. I remember going into detail with it. My hopes could only hope to content so many things, as to what happened in the night of octokha. That's what made me feel like the outsider I have been ever since. My words had always served like some fancy realization that I had been occupying this place in wait for the real me to return. They got me now, I could see in their eyes. If I were to show any weakness, they'd eat me. I was pleasantly surprised that they would fill my veins with yeast. It was dreadful, feeling myself lost for as long as I could help it, I was still somewhat ready to jeopardize my future for the passing of another page. At least one part of my life was gone, and occupied the pages of a trilogy. The next pages had been filled with a few scratches belonging to some unkind fiend. I had to find the culprit. As far as I had been acknowledged in the arts of peering into the past, I found myself cherishing something else. I had the chance to get away, if only I could burn this library down. The journal paused there. There had been some bits of ashes which had been collected from various interesting spots which may have just as well looked like they had been used prior to any kind of malady. I had been at least as surprised as he had been of the fact that neither one of them could look at me and say. Many of the other moons began paying tribute to the citadel. And I could ever-so kindly follow in the vague expression of my fallen friends. They had adapted to the gravitational conditions of far too many worlds and appeared to be drawn in to the most peculiar special institutions belonging to the most deranged of actions. From the vessels which had arrived from the outer depths of space, I noticed that I found myself wretched and peering through the reeds. One of the moons had been pleasantly cleansed and drowned into the cleansing of stars. In its insoluble tasteless sea, I found myself peering in. My thought had been partially disabled. I would look around and see nothing. What have I done? I wondered after each day. What had they put me through? How could I beg for the rafts and for the folly which took me from my own? I was lost in one way I could not recollect no note. Where have I even fathomed. We'll turn around and see for ourselves. If you don't like it, you can take everything you've made and crush it. Walls were broken; I had been mistaken into taking too many things for granted. My mind had been flawed and shone as the outstanding first comers of earth killed the expectations and fell away. As much as I had been reluctant to do so, I put myself into a position from where I could not draw back. My eyes did glitter and I stepped back, looking through it all. Space was a spectacle of cubes. They each stacked upon one another until every piece of it turned to the ones that were modified to deal with the other forms which they surrounded. During the mad creation, they had given birth to some obscure meaningless distance that drew itself onward from the point. First there came the cubes with rounded their edges even so slightly to cover up the oblong planets and their discs and they moons while others took the most bizarre shapes in order to cover up what had remained of the asteroids and the other rocks. In some way, it was to be decided that this fight could only start. Cubes would start paraforming the space. There would no longer be any kind of fallibility of movement into space. They turned into triangular alleles which carried fragments of melting skin within them to the point where the occupation began. Informally pacing around the various succor, there were empty spaces which appeared there. So many wrongs lay there which could not even be erased. Each jerky splendor appeared to bear the same appearance, which may have been tainted and prolonged what was missing. A soul. Everything was soulless, in vain, lost and reciprocated by no mouth and no touch. There was no thirst but a desire for those spaces to be unoccupied. They were merely there, in the empty planes, which lacked in any human touch. No creature, no being, no deity, only some planets remained. Black holes were useless and had no meaning. It was exasperating, even looking as the skin disintegrating appeared to provoke no reaction from itself. Perhaps the world might've had a meaning if it was filled with something else. But it hadn't. Planets would be unable to compete with one another or even give way for something unsimilar to them to survive. It wasn't an option. Barren though it may be, that was the only thing which mattered. Without a way to compete or to push oneself away. No arms would lie there, as there would be no touch. Nothing remained nothing which could be clean, or much worse, the uneven touches which tormented the whims of those who followed their stars. Lights would be the next to go, being restless as the disappearance of other celestial bodies was just as considerate as one would have to pay it to be. And the forms would keep cutting themselves, pushing and drawing until nothing would remain. Peaceful, it might be. But what was the reason behind? None, something perhaps might've caused this. But it didn't matter. A heartbeat might've left no sound in there. This box, this space, this lack of faces which stared at one another while eating at a dinner was severely lacking. Bodies might've expressed something. Someone might even consider thing to be the only alternative, to everything that ever existed. Though it was no defining factor, there wasn't anything remotely close to what it had been felt. Harmony was tainted and stricken by noise. So that had to be removed. Terror and fear were done, as they had laid abandoned no one bothered to push on. Ships had sailed, wars had failed to bring the glory of past days. Children, art, duty, those were gone. And the grip around the locks, emotion, those were difficult to be done again. Even in this constant stream, there was no wind to push on the cold, winter and summer would never get old. Beauty let go and instead of it, there was a canvas which was never to be filled again with anything of value. Who would ever enjoy such a thing now? Of all times and all the places, who would covet over it? It was bleak. There were no words to describe it. No amount of space to fill, yet everything was so widespread that you could fit just about anything in it. And that anything could be multiplied a billion times or a for as long as it would take to satisfy someone. If anyone was even listening to begin with, which had been unnecessary to begin with. Mankind had done so many great things only to end up that way. Destined with failure and overrun by the ambition of a living cucumber, the four wings appeared spinning in their detrimatory hose. Behave, it thought, behave while the vileness comes and passed. It was an utmost detrimental task to undergo now. Goading in its mass of loneliness, the texture was gone and even this creature disappeared. There were men out in space. Suffocating slowly only to be gone away, as the next apparition of came to be slowly, or even remotely trying to pay some attention to itself. 'You're a rube.' The first part of the speech was gone. Words could not echo if there was nothing going against the caverns they would be set on. Against the surfaces which moved but never spared a nerve, one could either bore himself with waiting or go on. 'The first act of the next millennia's had arrived.' A supreme pair of ants had somehow managed to avoid the destruction, by stacking themselves against the cubes. Somehow, only their legs had been completely broadened and completely destroyed. Anything else which had remained would not even dare come as close as they had. It was highly unnecessary and inadmissible. Uncontrollable and even worse, a sign of what was yet to come. Brown carcasses had become white, or partially intangible from a transparency kind of view. Colors would simply not stack up, unable to push away or to even draw from their surroundings. Were those sings of the triangles coming back? Of course no, instead there were distant forms which had been made up out of all the recognizable geometric similarities between them. And each of them had sharp angles and weird surroundings which appeared to give an eye to some recognizable pseudo-arm, a clawing canon and even some long-forgotten relic of some statue holding some torch. But it was highly plastic and only went as far as it came. No one was going to be spared. Not even the ants, as they wouldn't be ants for long. Celestials, even, they had to take the place of the weird ants-beings. Anti-locals, ant-demergers, promulgators of some distasteful kind of bleakness which spread around everywhere. The cycle of filth had come to stagnation. This was the cause of it. And the bleakness spread to everywhere, which meant that it was time for the flood to stop. In various over worlds, it didn't matter. Nothing as long as the great promulgation of the bleakness would drive its way into the nothingness which prevailed. Were the ants happy? How could they? Since the bleakness had this wild effect, which pushed in itself some kind of disturbing looking inglorious lack of empathy which was obligatory for a world to keep on going, this was to be the defining feature it would bear. Ants started drawing in, forming the first physicality, of which existence could be spared. Going around them, there had been the invisible forms, which after a while, join in with the rest. Truly, there hadn't been any escape, from this chaos, from this hellish end, from this purgatory, whatever other place. Yet it was uninhabited by anyone other than the ants. Apparitions wouldn't last for long, and the ants were soulless. Why, they weren't truly alive or there. An essence of the mind imagined them. And that essence had only been the prime thing which had far surpassed humanity, it was their embodiment. The only thing which had somehow managed to get this far, an artificial intelligence of such magnitudes, power and might that had far surpassed the living, the immaterial, and everything even metaphysical. Of its descent nothing had mattered. It was simply there but it wasn't. Stuck somehow, in a kind of shade which the entirety of the unfilled thing cast upon itself. Such a wide and infinite zone which kept expanding brought to itself only that bleakness which it held. Memory was detrimental. Yet it wanted to see a small sphere made out of white ants. For some reason, which wasn't an imitation of human thought, but it had been the only thing which spared it of everything life-worth. It was a pure thought which made it be humane. It didn't matter, for this thing had broken the rules, and it was time for it to die as well. The memory and the projection of white ants would be gone. In any moment now, they would be completely set to lose themselves in that eternal blanket of bleakness which spared no one and nothing. It would spread. Just as it went on, this was the promise that it had been decided that the purity of living, the forms, the malign, the feelings and emotions had been pointless. Nothing would matter as long as there was that threat of destruction. Preservation and sprit was running out of its way to keep spreading into the endless ether, the void, the intertwining meaninglessness which desiderated every concept and idea which was. And this event had gotten no name, it simply was and it would spread. From the mighty words of the defamatory cruelty, the insipid terror and infamy would bring in an open tenderness which would open itself to the nearest holes through which it could crawl. What kind of perilous waves would dare throw themselves at it? It could not be accounted, nor spilled. It wasn't likely that they would be felt. 'The simpletons may now sit at the table and begin eating. You are all allowed to do as you please and make sure that there won't be any dissimilarity in the way you're eating now.'

Plethoria

Eight hundred billion years ago, at the dawn of ill-creation, there rose the first lineage of the Czathr. In his peculiar awakening from the rims of the morbid mass of stroke-hits the previous masses had suffered, a new set of progenitors had awakened from their ill-stricken bodies, rising up from the ashes of N'Dghor, a fallen sentry places by strange satyr deities left behind as well. But by whom, who could leave deities behind? And why were they pointlessly struck by such ignorance and such an easily forgotten magnitude of less approachful space-substance. It bore itself near the planet and started rubbing it until the centrifugal force began pushing onward and twisted the very dust that came from the unnatural stones that twisted around the planet. It was highly inadmissible to look around no. No one had been allowed, at the Czathrs and the satyrs only stood there pointing at the growing abyss. For that came from somewhere underneath their planet and began expanding past a level when it would admissible. It could not be forgiven any longer. This act of aggression coming from the abyss was at least the least acceptable approach. From it there was the taint of space and the malarial promise that came with the treat of being swallowed. 'I shall descent into it and find another world on the other side; as I have seen it in my dream one mad night, come upon me in a apparition of a solemn nightmare, I know that I'm waited there. By the most capricious and dreadful of creatures, which may never be able to set me free? They spoke to me in spectacles of colors and light. And I had been told that I shouldn't deny myself the pleasure of knowing what life should be here, if I were to return. I'll leave as soon as I can and I shall never leave.' He promised and never even succumbed to anything as low as trying to justify what would life be if he had thrown it away. It was interesting, just to watch the fight and flight he had achieved. As his plain legs unfurls, he started diving into the abyss. The other Czathrs looked upon their brother with little dignity as he was completely ripped out to shred out of a complete settlement with the other dark powers which facilitated this disease. 'It will spread to all of us, this need to set ourselves free is contagious, dangerous even. Not a single spasm could be set in order to prevent the other generations from falling into it.' 'So what do you suppose will happen when the abyss with grow enough for us to fall in it? We cannot fight that we cannot touch.' But the Satyrs came in as soon as they heard. Their wicked thoughts could only interpret it in the most fallacious manner. 'What needs not be touched? May we help you, of strange beings, as you are; you seem desperate for affection, perhaps for that reason your bodies are fashioned too sharp for any kind of warmth to be capable of spreading on top of you.' He saw the sudden raise the prisons their bodies were. Each time those in-set barred eyes peered in deeper, spikes started pushing through them, up and down, like tiny sharpens branches which carried on the most inadmissible kind of rage. 'What do you want, intruder? You were abandoned here; this is a mere problem of our own. This land is ours, so it is by our right the we should deal with it however we want it.’ ‘But we live here as well, and we have lived for just enough time to call this our own. And let us not forget that we have conquered you.’ ‘Satyrs conquering us? Do not make us laugh, you haven’t done a thing. Your mere shapes had only came to haunt us when you could, this planet is still ours, even though you might set yourself high and mighty, you’ve done nothing. Lazy to your bones, lacking in touch and yet you mock us all of our own.’ ‘All I need to say is that, unless we cooperate, your incomplete space quarter of skin-stogl, we will all be swallowed and be absorbed into the abyss.’ To which one of them grew forward, like torsion, corking through. A body came, as almost as liquidities strange a contagion, with drew onwards, from both sides, two unwrapped flaps which fell on the nearest floor and revealed a few pieces of bones and a few smaller bodies. All of them had been unrecognizable, but it was about to be revealed that these were the previous inhabitants of the planet. ‘Do they seem familiar to you in any way or shape? Because they are. To us, these were our ancestors, even though their body composition may look a bit too outdated for your high standards and touches of rowing clams?’ Everyone turned as soon as the various ores of clam-metal came out of the abyss. It had been oh, so surprising that no one could even fathom what was going on then. ‘Could this be a present from the other side? Was he actually right and there’s another world out there?’ ‘Don’t go near it, can’t you see that it’s trying to lure us in. Give as much of an inch in and we’ll find ourselves standing in there in the least atrocious manner. We’ll be set for the diseases, unable to stand aside. We’ll be tainted, brought to a bridge to abide their coming end.’ ‘Let us at least try to follow through, for no great life will await us here.’ They spoke and as they had, both the Satyrs and the rest of them decided, that waiting here to die was pointless. Even if it came for all of them to be cruelly slain, what other life would there be? And as an act of disgrace, they all jumped through it, forcing their bodies to be broken apart. Not a single soul survived. Most of the planet’s mass had been absorbed and instead of it, there was only the clam-metal running around the rims of the space-storms which had been the abyss. One touch of the finger and the abyss became a ring. For the supreme anchoring ruler of the galaxy he served in. This Ukiroth appeared to be less demented; he ascended and looked at all of the abysses he created, storming around as rings on his hundreds of fingers. In them there lay, alas, the blasted putrefaction of an old body-system which couldn’t possibly last. He had feared the advent they bore, as underneath them lay some more large tubes that connected to him. And each end bore stranger twisted systems of channels that ended up pushing forward some blowing fat stems. In them he stored all the fat he had taken with the help of the abyss. In mere glances they’d grow and push, then recede until it hadn’t been worth to look back on it. With as much as a disinterested vow, they started releasing waste from the system underneath the trunk of his body. This legless floater waited there. His trunk pushing onward to higher octaves of space, in them, his head could only show himself nearing the point where it had grown to be a quarter of the universe. In which case, his mouth turned into his eyes and the nostril-constellation with the help of which he could breathe stopped being there. In the dying light, he started suffocation, looking for a way out. Anything but to die like that, because of some wildness of space, some arrogance and a disgrace which pointed him to the least concise manner. Sooner than he had come, he lost himself in the midst of the decaying tawny, of lack of credence which was spread. One look away and he’d be dead. A plowing reed of star-dust fiends appeared, and in their presence, he could restlessly stand. ‘Why have I been spared?’ They were sentient and silent; an utmost deadly combination which couldn’t have done anything for him if that was the case. Not only would he admit to himself that he was pointlessly flawed from a special-awareness kind of way, as he would distance himself even farther, destroying a few planets from this oh so overcrowded galaxy, but he also found himself staring in awe. He saw perfection, a golden aura surrounding them in the most peculiar manner. It could stand it no longer, to be forced upon them. I would not even dare look away, to pry upon the unforgiving and the divine. As long as they were there to stay and there fragmented particles of atoms and of dust made it seem as if they would grow to be a planet in disguise. Not only had it been ever-so peculiar to fly within servitude of woes, but one could not suffer himself to live in any other way. We'll open a door for you to the other galaxy. They spoke in his mind. Even his gigantic brain, as many layered and concave as it had been in the grotto his elongated skull had become could not fathom how were they capable of doing it. Theirs was another existence, at a different level which only made things ever so complicated for him. It was indistinguishable whether or not he could think for himself. By no means or manners could they glance at each other's woes. As far as they distinguished themselves from the agony of space, the disgrace would last no longer than it needed. You've destroyed those you found unfit to live and there are others in need of this glorious destruction. Follow us through the ether and through space, just so we may end all the primitive organics. He nodded and still seemed to believe that they were dead. Not for a single second had he questioned why he was the only one who could bear those abyss-rings without falling prey to them. In each sparkle of star-dust, in each atom there had been a world. And in reality, those were their afterlives, in a way. Though they hadn't been completely struck out of live, nor had they been living. When they entered, the Satyrs had been grayed out; they were soulless, walking down like husks underneath the great metallic floor of the furnace above them. And above, the furnace boiled a concoction in a strange system of cauldrons which were yearned in. Czathrs lay beyond the furnace, supplying the cauldrons with the food. Pieces of themselves would be used as far as it would be common for them to spice the food they were cooking. One of the cauldrons had been closely examined. This abyssal death had only feigned their destruction as it seemed. Their results had been somewhat stired as they accidentally mixed something which wasn't supposed to be there at all, the water of Nyfgh with a muck of bone plighted blood. Within it they had given life to a vision in the distant future. The established protection facilia had been encoded in the great android by the name of KRnDrOx. He had been designed as the flag carrier for the Great industry. In the beginning the industry and the corps had been establishing ground-work over the few planets in the nearest galaxy they could provide any kind of facilitated intervention. Various life-forms had their lives completely exchanged for a complete work-diagram completely mirroring Damon diademas in their unique appearance in that corner of their world. Certain features may have been exaggerated in order to promote the alienation of the plain working spaces. Instead of them, one could only deal with the least likely and the least remote atrophies of sinking structures which had radically changed the way life seemed to look from then on. Various other formations stood there, grinding against the celestial bodies of the planetoids which drew in to the diademas, as the workers inside of them had been assigned by the corps to completely draw everything in. One glorious anatomical discrepancy had resulted in the creation of the androids. They birthed humans in the diadema, but that had been sanctioned under the complete words of a pair of divines which found it unsatisfactory any longer, henceforth the alternative. The androids were a mix of results, coming from the complete pouring of metal shrubs which found their way in the biological material. Because of their incessant corrosiveness, they had been given power and sentience. Not only that but in a few good generations, the greatest of them all would even get the chance to come back to their supprelrxories. One had risen over a mound of all the dead pieces they could lay their hands upon. No one should be counted off any longer, for as long as work was needed no one would be spared. 'Any more of these and I shall plainly lose my mind.' Thought KrnDrOx, with his only ability only now being displayed into action, while the other androids could only look at him as if he hadn't even been a model similar to them, rather he looked like the next stage. It only looked that his place wasn't there. He was much longer than them, but that hadn't been a description of his mere physicality. That was only the reassurance of him being so strange, as to deform everything around him. Everything in a ten mile radius appeared to be getting a few inches in height. As one of the first freighters came into notice, he dropped a few miles back and saw it recede. This was the preferred way of landing, as it was made to be the safest on. It wouldn't even be possible to find any other way in, crudity or not, the instructions were there. Inscribed on him back lay every piece and turn put on in great detail. To this one they seemed the text of the device, a whimsical kind of joke put on him to see him suffer. Each word covered an emotion which manifested onto him, anger, fear, and disturbing disgust. And some of them acted as if they had been part of a great arc which spread around to everyone in sight as soon as they could. By no means could it be accepted any longer that they would be aware of it. This sudden incredulity would not work for them. A pair of unsanitary looks brought back the appeal of disturbing tones which had messed with everyone there, as they felt the touch of the disturbing disgust. Inside each of their metal bodies, where they stored their energy shortage perdition tanks, human mouths appeared, with their full-fledged teeth and large pumping veins which infested them with teeth-disease. They grew large and pointed from the front, like ivory tusks which shot and brought only the slimmest of pleasures that they could be caught off guard and forced act like their previous stages of evolution. 'The diadema calls.' An unruly voice peered into them in the most obscure fashion. By no amount of false dexterity could this clarity be set. Most days were simple. One day just passed and they had planed even more mechanic beds of light on their planet. How lucky for them it had been, to have so many workers on the various tops and sides. It wasn't even hidden in disturbing disgust. They were lucky; rather to be set as obscurely hidden underneath each other's resting cabins. For each of them stood on another bed which stood on another bed, so on and so forth until they had encapsulated just about every usable space in the planet. The splendor of it was the fact that between them moved the vile sponge, the essence of space which had acquired, from another dimension, be you minded the essence of some natural spirits that wouldn't have been found here otherwise. Worth was felt that way, even if they had been ripped apart by the process. But enough of the mild castration of the planet's side. They were threatened by the worse kind of unpromising invaders. Ilbord, Humughot and Guenn O'n, who had been the pilgrims of woe. Their melodies brought them home in a time where their human minds had known what art and the craft had been. Ilbord had been the first one to open his mouth as he spoke, untouched. 'I need be reminded of what's it like to feel, to know what the touch of vile feminine thing. Her majesty wishes you to feel the touch of females. Cold creatures, you may be, but even you may come to see that it is not worth living without them near your kind. Come as you might and you'll understand. If not, let me make you more aware of it.' With which, in his power, he brought to them android females, which looked rather swollen to the one spire every single one of them had been welded into. This one pilgrim had a strange interpretation of life, which had cleared everything before going back to the grind. 'Bear me no foreboding for what I've done. I've done it only because I'm blind and I had a dream of you some day in the past.”Yer mouth started at it again. Can’t you see that we’re always getting side-tracked because of you incessant yapping?”And that sting would bear just enough poison to kill a hundred similar beings by the likes of the biological similarities between them. It had been glorious, the limbs being obscured by a sudden burst from one of his chest cavities from which he pushed on a pair of legs. These were longed and appeared to dictate the movement. In some strange turn, his entire body would be entirely carried by them, with the entirety of the strength being as thoroughly pushed as deep inside the muscle mass as possible. It would reign as far as one could know. Dread could be seen in his eyes for as well as he had known that he was looked down upon from below. ‘You were my father’s servant for so a long period of time. What do you think of me now? What do you think of the new lord you’re supposed to serve?’ ‘I don’t feel anything towards you. You’re young and rash, and this is a harsh world which will only get worse for the better part of your life. Without a way for you to return, I don’t think there’s ever going to be an opening for your well-being. You’ll only end up suffering alone in a dark place.’ ‘A case, just like the one my father is in. All those statues and paintings he’s collected serve him nothing. He should’ve cared for something else.’ ‘That’s a conversation between you and him. May I remind you where you are?’ He had come to forget that this wasn’t the city, but the inside of that stanch creature. Relying on nothing else other than his grim sense, he stared cutting the nearest embodiments, seeing them fall to the ground in pairs. ‘They’re falling like weeds; I see that I won’t be challenged here either.’ ‘Perhaps not, but you need to get over yourself faster now, don’t drop your guard.’ It missed just by a few inches, a strike from the entire level came, which pointed itself near his body. If it were for him to stay even as much as a few seconds in a spot, he’d die. Gordo hadn’t realized that the acid they carried, these almost repugnant broad-strokes had the chance to end the line of Di’Dorko. It wasn’t like they could even push onward any longer before they stopped. As strange as it looked, they formed a cubicle below a circling torso which was trapped in-between the anchor of the lower buds it bore. From the cubicle there sprouted long barren finger-like phallic connectors which drew onward until they looked as if they kept the entirety of the being together. Most of the connectors rooted only at the bottom of the being, leaving enough space for the brain mould above the main structure to slowly fall and join it. There it had had fully turned it, starting the final recreation, the complete disgraceful show of wings which set it into flight. From the many puckering vents which jointed from its body, this thing drew and crushed the nearest buildings it could reach. In as quick of a storm’s flash, the old man disappeared, leaving Gordo all alone, clinging on it like some brooding spider, holding onto a bird. Impossibility dictated that this creature shouldn’t have been capable of flight. Nonetheless, it happened, to the push of the obscure, drawing onward to the point where its misundertand had caused the terror of the first flights. All of them followed the first on during the ascent of which none might be able to be forbidden entry into the higher placed of the wired clouds. Each would bring as least the sparrowing amount of cutting and of wreathing as the weather changed into the disturbing manner they saw on top of the Ethr. Eternally caught inside, his legs started pushing on. The purple surrounding it seemed segmented, yet closer in appearance to some poisoned berries which acted out of notice. It could not eve be felt any longer, this sudden blow of wind-spans which pushed from beneath it. No debacle would even force him to endure all that force which may have made him feel the pain of streams, as the various layers of air cut through him like some solemnly caught pig. Four piece of his mouth segment extended forward, right on his trunk, a few inches above one of the poisoned stings. It was the old man again, appearing as a growth akin to some terminal illness. He spoke with him during the spectacle of gusts, the air being denied from the rims of his missing line. 'Are you in need of service? I could keep you company during your fall if you do not mind.' 'I do not wish it now. I will ride with them and see where they shall take me?' 'Well now, don't you suppose it would be time to return before you get lost? Sicily is wide, and they claim to go past the rims of the known sea, into the desert plains and even...' The old was severely interrupted as Gordo started acting with his known condescendence. 'I'm not interested in it. Leave me be, I know you wouldn't possibly understand what life is like for me. As I begin the tender gripe, I wish I would not be denied the satisfaction of following my own path.' 'You're following your own path towards your own destruction and that is no mere joke. I can see that you father would be rather vandalized by it.' 'Let him be. His plans for my future are neither of my concerns. If he wants to toy with someone's future, let him do it on his own.' With which he pushed his chest forward, just so the tip of his blade would push inside the extended face. It drew back in before it could spread; likely it wouldn't have mattered at all since this artificial imbued body was filled with anti-poison eating cherubs. They were dangling as they were attached to his vital organs. Sometimes they'd tickle him more than he could hope to chew. It was a sad sight, looking back at the city for one last time. He had spent his most important days of childhood there. And everything happened so fast and so far that he almost reconsidered turning back, not for his father, not for his memories or the people, but for the likes of the two servants which were missed by him. They did offer their servitude at no price whatsoever. Now, to leave them in such a way would be terrible, for no one would know how to possibly order them around. 'Fetch me this, fetch me that, if only I was there.' If only he had brought some of his sense. But they clasped the planes of air and pulled them into distorted storms. Bitter tongues peeled through, allowing them to enter the center of the great tutelage of the company. These were extractors. This entire invasion was no invasion at all, but another vile plan coming from the industry to obtain as many human beings as possible. Gordo released himself from them and hid behind a pillar made out of stacked wooden containers. They had gathered just a few of them to account for just about everything they could possibly put their hands own. Grubbing just about each corner, this dark spot in the air was invisible from outside. Another sign of their great design. The Great industry reserved the rights of android conversion and for whatever reason they considered this to be the way they could expand their enterprise. It would be disturbing and disgusting, repulsive to be otherwise kept in check. A wreckage of thoughts could only serve as a call-back to all their atrocities. Gordo opened one of the containers only to look at the saddening image of someone who couldn't even bother looking into it. An android was there, ripped apart by rough play. Missing eyes could be carried along, limbs not so much. Jars contained so many of them that only matched for certain models which weren't there. So many missing glances could only mean that somewhere, in a lost space, there were eyeless androids which were forced to work. Underage creations followed through, but they weren't made to look like anything else other than some primitive non-terrestrial walkers. From their previous bodies something was kept, that being their unnecessary spreads of power growth which spread around on an organic track. Inside each inch which drew on, there were tiny bubble and buckles of skin. Piety be called in motion, as they had exposed their inner lingering crass-cones. The cones were constantly pushing away, rubbing as they displayed the look of the insides belonging to an organism which wanted to be shut down. It was kept alive not by the unpowered machines, for obvious reasons but by a force of will. Fragments of dust and mice were its sustenance. From it there was a portending allure which could only serve for, for. Gordo couldn't look at it any longer. It was too much for his senses. Most of that form couldn't be felt but sensed. His nose started picking up the form by the various scents which brushed around him. What he saw down there wasn't the only thing he could point at. Something seriously deranged crossed his mind. A likeness of touches and of mad dances only made him think of worst. The gas was it limbs. The scent of brokenness trampled his knees. He fell as the feeling of ammonia revealed the intermittent olfactory confusion which drew him own to slit a piece of his nostrils. He had to fill them with anything to block the images from manifesting or else it would grow. This trapping curse felt like it had been forced on him by a deity, not by a mere abandonment of broken toys. He could see the entire air-facility be encompassed inside the dreadful thing, unable to reconsider living. It could grow and flash the entirety of this place into nonexistence. It was unexplainable. He drifted as he was forced on his back. He saw only a few broken jars which pushed away, the useless bits, and that organic spacer-like cone. But the scent completed it and threaded to destroy everything. There was nothing beneath this manifestation, which would even beg the question or consideration that it'd live. Living for it meant destruction for all. Destruction for everyone would mean that eventually it would be the only thing living, stuck nonetheless, for there would be no one to breathe in its form. But even there, Gordo, despite his almost amnesiac state, in which he had almost lost his senses, he could feel the scent. A predatory look inhabited the feeling of rough burnt wood. Sharp images of pain entered his mind, the touches of fire left marks of third-degree, first-degree, four-degree burns. Bone showed, he felt the scent of an unnatural kind of disgust. That leaves most of the bottom floor which surrounded every box and everything which had ever been touched by living feet exposed. What he had seen there, was a scent which had been stolen from him as well. It was the feeling of perfume. Women's feet were just about every piece of floor he could lay eyes upon, and that had been all because of him. A scent of planetary-roses inhabited the nearest side he could lay eyes upon. It felt like he could burst a few veins, to bitter the dames as they started soaking in the growth. A white-almost nest-like web-encased, pus-cotton appeared to grow the buds. The mass pushed until they formed a few glowing stalks which begged more of the scent to follow. Dreadfully in awe, the tarnished gnawing presence would bring as much as two enthralling essences of oil. He felt like he was being boiled, burnt, comprised of the smell which left his body forth, as he faced his apparition, torn. It sent him into a strange phase of physicals which brought to him the strangest vision he could look upon. Scents were near; he would know that he could never get near where he had lain before. He saw the road ahead, on a patch of land leading to a single dead tree against a sky of red. A cemetery stood there, with all the singing cherubs stray. The night was starry with limbs of blue, in the distance, hues of yellow tunes. He marked himself unfit to walk there, as he heard the trumpets call, the bitter gongs, which called him near. It would be impossible to stay. To remain would be inaccessible, for as long as he would prey upon his breaking knees, the scent of roses, bitter decrees. Lost for words, cowardly set against the black swords which had been the curtain which fenced the patch, he saw the gates latch. Unable to go anywhere he pushed past his limits, unable to attain the circumstance in which he had walked. 'I am here, you can see me now. I have failed father, know that you will never come upon my body any longer.' He said while the bed of roses had been blown by the wind. Dark as the tree was, it beckoned for him. It was strange, that they'd be there. But as each bed, there was another man. The Courtesan in his armor, the Elegant and the Earl, all of whom were kneeling know, down near the dirt. Would they weep? That'd be uncanny. No valley would turn or dare to spare. A witch was there, drowned in the sea, the wicked head with no unit. A few obscured creatures which may not be named, all of which came here, to watch him lay in dread. 'Bring this to my father if you may. Only that way I'll have known that my life hadn't been in vein.' At which, Gordo had pulled a tooth out of his mouth, his regalia would be stained. He would be in pain but he'd care of nothing any longer, other than the despair he felt for those who'd see him going by the tree. Finally the hole, in which to roll would mean the end to the nightmare, an essence of evil long forlorn. But in the distance, the scent sealed, the plains were lost and the veils of evil closed their mark. Nothing had been gained, nothing was lost, other than a few insignificant creatures soon to be cast out of their plane. It would not suffice to pay anything more than the grind of bores, the evil throngs and the old countenance which had been shown. 'They left, they finally left!' It was the first sign of the victories to come. Unable to bring any other defeat in their ranks, this had been the only solace they found in the clearing of the clouds. But most of all, two people amongst them seemed to search, or to beseech of some word as they said. 'Where is Gordo? Where has our master gone?' Brktich looked everywhere, unable to regain his common sense back, him and Humble amongst the ruins, looking away, for any sign that he may return. 'I am still Humble, yet to think that he has abandoned us so easily.' 'Worry not, brother, as I'm here and I shall keep you company until he comes back. You should've known better than to put your trust in a man like him.' 'Pity me no foolishness, I only want to know, why he has abandoned me. I only wish I could be there, next to him, seeing what he does, crafting a song for him, anything which may last.' 'He would just as soon have forgotten it, know that it doesn't matter that much what you think of him. There's a lot of lost noise I hear.' Brktich couldn't face it. He grabbed Humble immediately and seemed to approach one of the evil decrepit walls he neared himself to. 'I shall tell you something I haven't told anyone about, Humble. Perhaps it's better if I were to show you.' He seemed to pay just a little of a hint, the thing which crept in could not even sour the world. It wasn't honest with what I found. Do not take it as a mean word, as I only tried sparing you of everything which someone of your age ought to have known. It's harrowing, the leash through which one act might matter, but I found it here. 'None the matter, what he had shown seemed to be the last image he had picked from the camera he stole from inside the shop their master broke. 'I accidentally took it, Humble, and I was surprised to see the fiend struck inside of it. Look closely now.' A deformed image could not even be contained any longer by the mere hands it held. For each second spent staring at it gave it enough power to climb through the tunnel it had been wrought it. A giant innards-bum-grub with the soles of its head pushing through came out of his finger. It pushed into the picture and had been eaten by the presence inside the photograph. Two cuts had been made; they pushed through him and seemed to drink out of it like the spring of a fountain. It was hard, waiting for so long. 'If there was a point to my ever-growing presence, I would've ensnared myself to a prick in the tab. But I see it. I simply can't. There's nothing in your hand.' 'Stop averting your eyes from the spot, Humble, this is important, you need to see things as I do and in order for that to happen you need to stare at the picture I have taken. Only that way you'll see.' 'I'll see only what you want me to see. The pain, the pain, I know that you're in pain. But you cannot use that as an excuse to harm those around you. You needn't harm me.' 'I shall do it, because you'll let me, brother. I know you well and I can say with much honesty that you'll never leave my side. As long as I'm here, there's nothing stopping us from drawing on forward.' 'To what?' 'To the picture, I said, look at it.' Its frames started extending until it had covered just about everything else. With its general appearance taken in consideration, one could draw that from the picture there was nothing but a trap in the middle of the woods. Formed for an animal too wide for the taking. What an annoyance that had been. He was there, regardless of the angle. Sides are known. But he was there, just by the trap, between the frames caught off guard. If he had stepped a few more inches forward, he would only have himself to blame for. It couldn't even be considered as they had been. Yelling from below, the echo had been unknown. Humble seemed to spare no moment until he felt the strange isolation, in need of company as he was. It would not be worth it for his time. No dime would matter, not to the mind. 'I see you there. Don't hide from me.' It was him, his brother. Changed a bit, roughened around the face. Scratch that, his entire head appeared to be completely shoved off the way, forced to look out of any feasible look. For one so roughened he bore some marks of a beheaded man around the neck. His face wasn't the one he had been accustomed to seeing, bearing a pair of beady, rocking eyes. A raunchy need had told him as soon as it was time to flee. 'Below you there's a bed of spikes. I know that you can hear me well.' It was Brktich who was still there. The voice didn't actually account for the distance and from the strange movement the lips began perching. 'Dear brother, I am no fighter and I'm frightened by you. It's too dark to see. I can only feel the grey cold winds and the distant breeze which makes the tinge for some fire.' 'Focus on the bed. I know you're trying to look at it and see my face on it, but that isn't me. It is not even remotely so. The picture wants you to believe I'm there with you. Well I cannot draw you out, so I shall ask you for something else at that.' 'What?' 'Please listen to my boding call. I only need you to believe me now, but I only wish for the most precarious assistance you could pass on me. Draw whatever you may use to hold yourself from falling and leap in.' 'Into the spikes?' 'Into the very bed of spikes I told you about. I know it's unexpected.' It was not only so but a strange act, remorseless venture he couldn't even draw him head away. He couldn't even convey the frustration he felt with him. This wasn't the way he had intended trying to serve. But this had to be dealt with before he set forth. 'Do you not trust me?' 'Danger draws near and I fear that I may find myself being trapped in there forever.' 'Trust me, brother, I've been through this and I survived.' 'And who had guided you then?' 'No one.' It was the least amount of certainty he could dare ask for. But he had not even felt anything for it. As a matter of fact, he had been lost for words. Cowering, shaking, and pushing him forth, nearer to the point where it was getting too close for his comfort. It changed, he saw something rummaging, actually rummaging from inside the roughness of that blotch. Had it widened then? Was someone trying to escape from that giant cranium which held that blue spackle of paint on top of it? 'Shall I join you then? In case you die, I promise you brother that I shall take my own life. Then we shall both be able to serve our master, whoever he may be.' 'I do not know about it, I fear death, I fear pain.' 'Leap before the beast can catch you.' 'What if I can't?' But he hadn't waited for long enough to find out or even consider going out of his way then. He simply went and came to know that nothing mattered, yet none would bet. In the large system of the cosmos, none would dare place their cranks or dare watch him at that. Yet he leaped inside and never came back, to pay any kind of attention or any other direction than what it had been needed. Deepening to his feet, growing inside the wrathful heap of dirt, he waited on top, watching the spikes erect themselves farther into the air. It wouldn't even be necessary for him to carry on as he should see. Agony would set him free. For there was blood on each tip he looked about. There were others down there as well, resting in a most peculiar manner, unable to handle themselves for long. Each and last, no one would care, alas for the wretch would not pay. Heed no remorse, as it could not be conveyed. But finally the plummeting dark had come benign, as it had managed to completely cover the hole before going on and getting as far away as it could go. Humble he may be, he heard no voice and there was nothing for him to see. Both of them were at a loss, it couldn't be decided whether or not it would come to pass. 'Poor brother, you have truly put your faith on a liar. Oh, such a naive fiend.' The villain spoke, as he pulled out a pair of damp scissors, cutting the image in halves, waiting for the time for his hands and legs to tire, the thing which he would properly admire.

Para-chamber

I did it. Now that I have found the sorrowing fourth of the tetrahedron belt, I shall manage to craft it one again. With it around my waist I shall be able to remove the waste of poison and the swollen bird I had been infested with. To this Carrion, nothing even remotely near reality could matter, as he was stared at by Cower. He wasn't given much to look forward to. He had managed to crawl so far and kept a steady movement ahead. It was rather uneventful, the way through which they both changed directions, as if it was understood that both of them should see each other's business ahead. But Cower turned and looked back. From his hair, something went off, as if reminded. 'One of my brothers was the scum-snail, or was he the slayers of snail scum? I can't get that right, not anymore. But I think it was important enough for me to keep in mind, wouldn't you say?' 'What did you say?' 'I was tallying about snail-scum, that's all. Have you ever come into contact with snail scum?' 'Perhaps I have.' The strange Carrion pushed the piece under his tattered clothes. He measures him accordingly. 'Are you buried underneath that spot? What did they do to you? Piaff, the scum, I can could see them semblance, now that you mention it. Are we scum-snails you're talking about? Is it a code word, stranger?' 'Well, no, it's well. My brother couldn't have known what you look like, would he now?' 'He would not. In that case, would you happen to be an oratory of his word? Is that snail-scum someone I ought to be afraid of?' 'Only if you're one of them and I don't think you are. You don't strike me as scum.' 'Then you don't know me. What should I call you?' As he approached, he had been slightly hit by a pair of tied rocks which had been strung together just on top of his girth. It wasn't like he actually cared enough to pay attention to some of the younglings. It was wildly accepted that none of them might be hard. Violently, he would turn to his imagination and conjure the most anatomic pulls and the ripping of their. 'Think of something?' 'If you'd want to know that, indeed I am. Privately, if we were in one of my many nests, perhaps then I would've had the chance to share some of my interesting ideas with you but otherwise I'm afraid I cannot keep up with the demand. Let me share with you a secret I have, see these pieces I've collected? The tetrahedron belt had a strange effect on those who come into contact with it. I can see the mantra, the energies floating in the air leading to the other parts I'm in need of. With this I should be able to track it in no time. Unless someone beats me to it, in which case I would have to other option but to join in our hunt. Worry is on your face. Don't make me look at it. Perhaps you should look on another side, for someone softer than I am, otherwise you'll only be disappointed or you might find yourself hurt by me. That's the effect which drove the others away.' He hopped towards the Carrion, rightfully staring at it. A mighty belt rested, with the deepened carving of a special touch. Whoever had to lose a limb for it, he would be in a bad mood after that. It was designed to produce as much hurt as one would have to inflict on an unsuspecting runt in order to obtain what was needed. From him, as well as the others, I would seethe in my spot. 'Well I'm Cower, he said. He's the one you're speaking to. He spoke again, and told his name again.' 'Stop that,

I'm Raraak. I've done a lot of thinking and I should've come directly to you. Follow me, perhaps you will make the others keep their distance for as long as I care to keep them away. 'Do they hate you?' 'Of course, it comes naturally, as one who's much greater than they are. It's pitiful that they're showing me so much arrogance now, when I've shown them nothing but the graces of a kind familiarity. Well, I'm only showing them what they're truly like on the inside. You see, all of them, with no exception are hiding.' 'I can see them, past those plants of pastels, and the colored hems. I think I can see some of them hanging even farther and chanting.' 'Not them, dare you not disturb them. Their chanting comes with a reason. That reason being the unfathomable sign of the leviathan, may he not be spared sight of us in our lowest forms. Listen to me, Cower. You're one who barely arrived, here; I can see it on your glassy eyes. If time says we need to part ways, let me not hinder your stay here with anything but a kind of advice. Stay away from them. Keep your distance, otherwise, you'll stand to lose so much more than what makes you...you. The leviathan is unforgiving, as he has been given birth out of the most atrocious manner, and he bears our agonies and our pains, our history and what makes us carrions out there.' 'But I've heard of him, and I think I've come to know a few of them who told me of him. Who is this leviathan? Is he actually real?' 'As real as your wildest dreams would be if you lay asleep and never came back. I saw him through the night, floating in the strangest circles I could peer in and I felt I saw them for what they are. Carrions which gathered and rounded themselves in order to receive his blessing.' 'Oh, I see, that's interesting. I wish I could see this leviathan.' Raraak only spend a few seconds more trying to explain to him that it hadn't been worth it at all. They could barely see each other eye to eye in the dark as it was. And the others were getting far too suspicious for him to counter them with any command. 'What's going on there?' 'Mind if I pick you up?' 'Go ahead, it won't bother me at all.' They ran afterwards, making their way through their raised huts and tepees, making sure he was cowering while making their way there. It wasn't like they would know, but that's had been it. For as long as either of them was concerned, they would not be able to make their way through unnervingly caught by anything as well as that. 'Aveesh' Aar, come and challenge to a fight, coward!' The voice only he could hear came into light. An interloper had arrived and wanted to engage into a combat with their chief. Was he entirely gone the tray? Could he actually do it again? Unable to count on himself any longer, he went on doing what he had to do. Perrichockl was the forager of spread wings. He collected them from as many butterfly wings. He had only the wickedest thought in his mind. I've defeat you, fiend of the necromancer, oh, how I've dealt so many blow to your legions. I can't even hold my excitement; I ripped out your disks and got you. Haha, he almost let out his laughter. It couldn't have been believed at all. This weird grayish-poe in which he met them, on a flat-land with only a dark mountain in the distance, where a moon was reverse and day came during the night he met them. Their encounter seemed something akin to some surreal dream, in which he flew and in the gaze of the mighty leviathan, of which song he heard, all of his diseases left his body and came forth. As soon as they could attack the nearest defenders, those skeletons started losing their joints and marrows, being unable to deal with the constant attack brought against their back. Knelt completely not by blow, they've been taken down by the perilous malady which hadn't been known by any living thing, for they suffered through it. And the servants yelled. 'Necromancer, mighty necromancer, why have you forsaken us? The disks do not work here. We cannot establish a connection to your world.' 'Let us escape, I beg of thee, necromancer. We only seek to live in the houses you promised for us, nothing more. Do not break your promise to us, for we hadn't broken yours. Else' have you forgotten now that we wasted no time and no disease? No amount of blows was too many, we had spared nothing for you, as I would dare remind you that we traded our lives for you.’ ‘And might I say, that in my life, I’ve been a champion and fighter, now I lay defeat, a mongrel. Where is my justice, necromancer?’ He would feel it, somewhere; somehow, the necromancer would know that he was being cursed by his petty servants, who fell prey to the worst of fighters. Who might’ve he been? Agony came from within, and he stared, only, unaware. Unaware of the fact that he was being choked by the chieftain, pitied on a side, laughed on the other, as they went on with their unholy banter. ‘Told you he wouldn’t last, he’s only been a few minutes here and he’s a goner, let’s prickle another finger, throw another rock in the pile.’ Someone had to collect all the remnants of their banter. And no soon after, one had to look at the most obscure ways of looking in. Their fingers were going after him, drawing deeper into the neck. ‘Are we done here?’ Avesh Aar chose to spare him, seeing how young he had been. Though he had barely been abandoned and allowed a mere second to breathe, he was slightly unnerved by the fact that he could barely stand after such a vestige. It was pitiful in reality, not a display of terror but a laughable thing. ‘Come on, we’ll bandage and rub you off.’ ‘I’ll wager you’ll get some fancy sugar cone to suckle one, come on, smile.’ Their backs parted in the way. But this had served only as a momentary break, as the chief turned to one who seemed to have the nerves to hide something from him. One look was enough, if he had wanted to play it that way, they could have it. He could have him. It was something close to being irredeemable, to the very point of quiet. ‘Now, now, let’s try doing something with this.’ ‘Is this what I think it is?’ ‘Yes, it came from above, I think it’s a sign.’ A strange device in the area stood there. Resting, rounded over, looked after. This crystal contained a few metal arcs which surrounded it, and not only that but a few metal strings which kept it floating. It looked the sole rock which set itself to be broken and made into plenty of smaller ones, jewels of tiny garments used for the queerest designs. One should not look with pity on them. Father on the mountain steps, farther from which world filled with unfathomable peculiar depths; there was still the walk the body had to endure. Though he could not fathom not having a pipe pushing through his end at last, he dealt with it as he could, pushing onward, misunderstood by them. The weird frog-flying cephalopods appeared from their missed looming nodes which had been brought from below. Release from their prisons, it seemed, that they missed their heads for as long as he could wager from within. His reach almost grasped for something, but he had forgotten that he bore no blade any longer. Not that they were ferocious, these were harmless and useless, unable to fight back. If he had willed it, he could’ve simply punched them off his track. I verged my lips just as the chief turned. Fortunately he couldn’t be bothered by my presence by any mean, which gave me the pass I thoroughly needed to get away. Within him out of sight, I finally stepped away and listened to Cower, just as he came out the tatters. ‘Could you tell me about them?’ ‘About who?’ ‘The members of the other tribe, the ones who almost took over you before this.’ ‘This is not the time for me to recall such a long story, plus, there’s danger into saying too much in this short a time. How do you know about it, in any case?’ ‘Some carrion recalled it to me.’ ‘Just how much did he tell you?’ ‘Only the part where the deed was done and when you started looking like this.’ ‘I’ll assume that means that you don’t actually know much at all.’ He couldn’t even start to tell him just how much he had to tell. It would’ve been indistinguishably violent to look at it, by any kind of possible mean. For one, there was this reckless way in which he had the opportunity to tell him everything without sparing a single detail. In itself that was well, as he had studied the old scrolls in his past-lives, which brought him back to the words themselves. ‘My past days as a translator are long gone but I suppose I could make an exception one day if you will it. If we still be' together by the time my mission here is complete and the belt is mine.' 'What are you going to do after you get it?' 'I'll live a normal life, cured of the diseases which consume us all. The others shouldn't be able to find out about it yet, but I have managed to translate one passage about it and because of that, I had been given hope. The art of translation is long-lost and highly forbidden by the chieftains from Delunghee, and Avyan. For much of a good part of my life I had been forbidden to even approach any of the scrolls out of fear that I may be corrupted by it. And I can't even fathom any longer, thinking about a life spent without this.' To each their own but Cower still inquired. He sunk in some less interesting woe, wonderingly peering here and at lo'. 'It's going to be a long way towards the horizon, isn't it?' 'We'll have to traverse the villages, and enter through the river-pass, underneath the trenches.

Afterwards, we shall try to establish contact with one of the high-floater of Yeda in hopes that we could momentarily become one of them and be granted access to their glowing plains in the air.' 'What are those Yedas?' 'How much have you been sheltered now? You have a shortage of knowledge as it is. But perhaps I shall try bringing you back a few years back, if this could explain it.' Back to a time where tribe fought tribe, when the Carrions changed from their peaceful living and their insurmountable ways of picking and storing, there had been war. Times changed us beyond recognition, a reflection of the putrid being almost unnaturally seen even in our young. As the trees around us, the fauna and the plants started dying out, we have been driven out of our homes as well. 'I suppose whoever told you about us, hasn't told you this, has he?' 'Drop by drop, by that's about it, I never even knew you had this effect on your surroundings.' 'Indeed we had.' At least our ancestors had, they wretched everything into a gambit of entry, in search for any home or place of refuge in hopes that we wouldn't become extinct. To even add the insult more power, we had been laughed at and scowled by the others. Our own kin split asunder, by the most wretched enemies we could encounter. 'There was another tribe which paid us mind. Their ill-intentions were clear to us, ravening bitterly in the most repulsive manner of going. We were unprepared, to say the least, forced to kneel and to feel ourselves sway underneath their atrocious hammers, their marks and their shields, their tools and weapons almost drove us to extinction again.' 'Who were they?' 'A secret tribe which hid beneath the mountains under long-passes and their strange house.' 'Were they even a tribe in that case?' 'I do not know, we have never seen something like it prior. Suffice to say, our ancestors had been overwhelmed by them. In their wretched wrath they had charged at us for the longest time someone waged war on our kind. And they were mightily set in awe, tall footed, raw beaked but not like us. Their were shinier, stronger, much thicker and appeared too curved into shells. I doubted that they even had wings, for I saw something close to multiple flaps at their backs, which vaguely resembled them but I had been wrong.' 'How do you know all this?' 'The scrolls granted me a vision of the past. I lived there for some time, though it happened in my mind. It granted me the great ability to foresee a possible past that happened.' 'What do you mean? Is there more than one past?' 'That's only what the scrolls revealed to me. There are as many pasts as there could be, but only one future which cannot be changed. In there's the agony that whatever the past is, there may always be that dark future all would look upon.' And I had seen them war upon us and I had seen our kind almost be driven to extinction. 'But in each case, we survived, and regardless of which one be true, it doesn't matter for our kind. Know that the future cannot be glimpsed at. No possible way lays there, only the arrogance of a mad fool would drive him to that pointless quest.' To which he could only think of the magnitude of it would be. To say the least, it would be interesting to be able to return. If only he could inquire forth, he would be able to see what life had been there. Only his mind could dwell so long. 'Listen to me, this secret tribe, whether or not it had existed, that's irrelevant. What matters is that one of them spoke to me, not as one of his own kin, but as a member of their secret enclave. I was treated like a brother, poked and plunder with them, slept and knew them as my own. You know where this journey of mine had taken me?' Two shakes, even around the rope he was wrapped in.

'To their mystic in the house of Stree, where he lay inside, waiting for me, their blind mystic seemed to be foreboding. My presence there had been long awaited. Despite them living in their houses of wood and of stone, and all that advancement compared to us, I felt like home. I knew that deep inside, they still longed for their strange primalistic lives, to look at the rings of smoke rising above them, peering into the distant vision and trying to get through. Not only that, but I had been surprised that he knew exactly who I was and addressed me by my name. Raraak, he said in private.' As soon as those words were said, I turned around to gaze at them. No one was there; the guards must've taken off when I wasn't even paying attention. The feathers around me, the teeth and nails which resembled mine frightened me to no end; I only came to be aware of something which hadn't been mind. An agony and high distrust, was this a trap? I wondered. But it hadn't so. I hadn't seen them so strangely exposed before. These mystics had a way of revealing just as much as one ought to know. I saw their many weak hands strapped behind, like fluttering exposures which rested on the ground. I thought I had seen it all, until now, before it had been revealed that they had been infested just like us. Theirs acted different compared to our exposure, as I could see almost empty pieces inside a rusted armor be exposed to me. 'For the women it is much worse. They have to deal with it on the inside as opposed to us. For them, this agony is kept in silent and seclusion. And only they might carry their burden of.' 'My son, will he be born that way?' 'I cannot say, only you can know what happened in the past. I cannot tell you anything of the future now.' I nodded in supreme content. This couldn't have been going on for more than a few ends. But those almost formed eyes stretched as far as to look like two blankets of clothes, darkened, drawing inwardly as if it could only breathe through them. Watching them push onward gave me the feeling of a dissatisfaction I could not even start to talk about. It wasn't likely that I would observe it on my first attempt, but he instructed me to kneel. While there, on a levee I could have a good stare through that hole in his chest, I saw what he had so thoroughly protected for so long. It was a promise of the death for all who inhabited the house in which they stood. 'What you have witnessed is the great abomination of Y'k Aaar, in it there's a toxin that will spread and never leave this place at all. I must confess that I hadn't known about the future by any means and that I had been given only the slightest hint from someone before me that I ought to await something. Anything, a sign, our scrolls spoke of it in the past.' 'Your scrolls, may I see them?' He couldn't lift himself, so he assumed a position in which he could point me in the right direction. I saw what he was getting at. As much as I could pay enough attention to it, I stood in awe and rested. I detested being there, and having that strange recollection. But as soon as I saw the scroll, which was more like a navigation map of old, I understood. 'These lands used to be traversable only by water, but a great drought brought these lands to life. Before we came here, driven by the infertility of our fruit-bearings, we were peaceful; we weren't wrought in the likes of warring and of pillaging.' 'What happened? I need to know what drove you to this way of living. I need to know what drove us and them, and...' 'I cannot answer this thing.' The mystic started unshackling his parts. He was truly exposed now and I could see that he was missing the lower side underneath a mark of his belly. Where the fat had grown, there had only been a stump which missed any kind of growth. It pushed onward and came to be, stopped and dropped and missed as soon as he could see. 'You've done this to yourself, haven't you?' 'It was by my choice, that I may live this way and dedicate my life towards the studying of the scrolls. I feel like we're alike in thought. We may be enemies, or we may have been so in our case, but I feel as if you come from a good place. It was your curiosity which brought you here after all. And the same curiosity made me stay.' 'Why would you put yourself through so much suffering? Can't you see that it's not worth it? You're sick and all of them will soon be... What gives you the right to take their lives?' 'The right of prevention that we may not end up like you, in any case, my decision is made and the ropes are all in place for it to happen.' Their lives had been immediately vanquished as he had begun the preparation of decay. As soon as they had reached the point where scoundrelry was no longer permitted, he pushed his mortar and came back to life. No longer would he be permitted to look on that disuse which had filled them on with the veils of unloving. 'What happened then?' Raraak could barely look over his feathers. It was interesting just how unwell he had just been then. If there would be something to be drawn from this, it was his sudden unconsciousness he displayed. He would be angered, as well as he could paint himself with the tenderness this metal head showed him as he stopped inquiring about it and instead drawing near. 'I wish I could tell you but I can't. I've seen so many things happening in front of my eyes. I can't forget them, look at me, I'm old and I'm falling apart. This belt won't give me an eternity, it's only going to give me a few years, through which I'll live without disease or pain. Knowing my tribulations, do you still want to continue on this path?' He dared not look away at the broken surface around them. As soon as it came to me, I lost it. There had been other ventures to track, none of which I had any idea how I might follow in their footsteps. My yearning was for another land. 'One which doesn't exist, I wish I was there, I wish I was in that place instead of being here. But it doesn't exist, I know it doesn't. I tried dreaming but I failed.' The thought processes which happened in his head had been uncorking, clogged and missed. 'I wish there was another way, but I cannot force these emotions out of my mind. There's a queer loss I can't even fathom to push away. I see it there.' Farther than he could even set his mind on, there wasn't even a chance. 'My room, I don't know why I feel it, now of all the times, but I feel like there was an entire world in there. It's been so long since I've been there that I could.' It was another sad emotion which crossed his mind then. For all the niceties and the lack of function he had shown, he couldn't do anything but look back and what he's lost. Tears of oil came off, and all of the sudden, he could only think of his life in the chamber, where he belonged. All of them felt, with their lost head and luckless bodies felt the despair, the lack of glory and the fearlessness of what they lacked. In their minds they could still be there. Walking, stalking, rolling, doing anything, but most importantly, never losing leaving it. Even the broken head felt it, as malfunctioned and caught in its perpetual growth and lack of power. He was there, all of them were there. The bodies which walked and even the original head he had lost, the nameless one who had taken the name Dour. This world was meaningless for them, the woods were sparse and nothing brought them joy. Circuits started popping from the distance, forcing them to communicate between one another just so they could reach a level they might be able to relate to. But it was there. His eyes spoke of the place he belonged to. To which none of them would return. Lost as they were, they would be followed by a head, regardless of which path they took, all of them were cursed never to return. Cheerlessly, the ship which had taken him from home went on with only a destination ahead. 'We need to go now, before I change my mind and look back.' The look shared between Dour and Raraak could only fashion so much between the two of them. No one waited in contemplation, neither of them sneered. Incapable of even producing some second thought about where they ought to go, he asked. 'Am I to abandon the search for the belt?' 'I cannot force you to do it. But it won't make your life any better if you keep going on this journey. Come with me instead. We'll never have to look back, we'll try getting away. If I can leave that place, if I can change.' Each word felt as it was false and artificial. He couldn't even dread doing anything else but what he knew. It was, in a way pathetic, a symphony of lost words. It was a loss now, he accepted like a fool without think of it either. Just as I had. 'We don't have to do this, I may have misspoken. I don't want you to abandon all this work for me, you know?' 'I know, that's why it's my choice. I want to do it as well. There's no allusion here, we're going to leave and never look back.' He truly believed it, as he abandoned that wretched belt and never paid as much as a second thought for what mattered in his life. This stranger could never even fathom carrying himself any further than he should. It was interesting, let alone thought about, or even considered, the way in which he dared speak. Would he tremble or even care? It was necessary to know in order to look ahead. It was so sudden. They left. Both of them never ever looked back at an existence spent in sadness. No one deserved to go through the same thing as they had. It was unnecessary. It was disturbing but it was theirs. A journey neither to be looked at, nor to be forced on, it was their lifeblood and courage which made them feels the warmth of the pack. And in a flash, they were done. In as much as he had been concerned to escape, he had paid no attention, nor the word, they went against the manner and got away. Perhaps the next one might've been luckier than that. It wasn't likely that he wasn't going to end up being the past one in any case. Lour followed, he was lost, the cost for which could not be taken apart. It would take too long until someone could make a distasteful interpretation of the stairs, especially for one like him to prevail and run unto them. Nour rolled away from his chamber. Now, as opposed to the others, he'd be the last one to get out. As soon as he rolled, he heard the way back in snap. Luxuriously entranced, he took it to himself to descend upon a staircase made out of rubbery self-propagating eyes. Each blink would make the few other steps disappear. And each weak had been directed at him. Some kind of sensual feel could be drawn from it, as he would see himself being taken not below but farther above. Towards someone who was waiting for him, the leviathan, who had promised him a refuge on top of is head. Beastly and magnificent as it had been, there wasn't any reason for a dismissal. 'We're going now, aren't we?' It felt likely that they had both seen two versions of the world and had decided that it wasn't worth it to stay. Sooner or later both would be disappointed with what they were. Words were meaningless to the glances they shared between one another. Any other claim would be pointless. Yet they spake of stories as Nour implanted himself into the leviathan's eye. Now he would see what both had the opportunity to be, a fresh glimpse into the oblivion which waited both of them, a sorrow and the bleakness which had been the restlessness of hope which was benign. It was both of their choices to go there, to travel in the space within a pocket of space. Mathematics dictated the meaning of the universe; they had been responsible for this darkness which encompassed everything, for this meaninglessness which could be explained in number. The pyramidal shapes had been replaced by octahedrons, hexagonal prisms and other spheres which were starting to push towards becoming concave. As soon as they were both surrounded, their color and physicality shuddered as it disappeared. But they were still there. As opposed to those who had died, they, of all were somewhat caught into the state of the unforgotten rules. Widened as it pushed itself through the veil, the leviathan suddenly wailed in pain. 'Is there something wrong?' Nour asked, seeing how the texture of its windy corroded skin appeared to its surroundings. But those weren't exactly what to be expected of, as they didn't belong to carrion, but to the pig-wretch which came to be. From every corner, it grew like a cancer. The universe wasn't free any longer; instead it had been a mere lurching mass of vestibules in which one had to wait. A pair of tinder-like eruption remains appeared from the ground, sprouting like white heads, only to bear the heads of the pigs that sang their weedy limbs outside their mouths. By the time they were done spitting their large trotters, it was done. 'Now you are ours, and there can be no escape from this chaos we have wrought. Know that we find both of you to be fascinating and for that reason we decided you're both worth keeping. As our pets, that is.' With a sudden urge to turn starting to completely dismantle both of them; it was obvious that they'd look. And they could only see the meaningless of the lower levels, as they went one adjacent to the other, facing them as they were lowered, to another level and another closer end. They would be stacked as abandoned and unfinished buildings which left just enough spots for as many of the pigs anthills to be stacked one another. It was getting crowded. Yet they spoke of the vileness which inherited as much as a few metallic nets that surrounded the leviathan and the head. 'You brought us hearer, leviathan.' 'Well, well, feel thy blood swell and see how we may peer into your mighty desolation.' In as much as the uncouth, it hadn't been brought back to life. Wordless wonders started flowing through the various airshafts revealing the remains of the humanoids which had crawled through them. Some had made vile attempts to escape from the giant planetary-made piglets which blew their depraved condition. 'Those things, why are you peering at them? It's our food factories, nothing more. We're producing more than one need to wretch himself past the counter. Enough meat is produced out there for a few more generations to be made. Why do you think we're doing this?' 'I cannot possibly know. We're only trying to move ourselves past the throng of the discernible clouds of pig-skin which you're producing.' It was obvious now that they were infesting the air with pig-molecules. Unnervingly caught, brought to the spear at that, there was something more benign in their minds. 'We've done much worse than that. I believe we've also pushed the small phleodyr in them.' A small act of contrivance, as they pushed small metallic traps, claspings spheres which were spindled, carrying the flag of virology in their tiny piglet heads. It was only through them that half of the leviathan had been pulled open to reveal not the insides he would've attained from his conception but the pigs which grew inside of it. 'Have you learned it already? We're spreading now because of you. Turn around and look at them.' The faces of the pigs were no longer similar to one another. Instead, they were growing their beaks and their long-necks. Diseased spread by the time the leviathan realized that the age of boars had come to an end. Instead, the diseased carrions had triumphed, because of him. And all the anthill-like throngs bore themselves winged as they set forth for higher horizons. 'Was this what you have planned all along?' Asked Nour, with as little of a wonder as possible, to which there could be no rewarding word spoken. It inflated some of the unnecessary blotches of skin which fell.

Bringing small piercings nails from plunder, would there be any wonder for each of them to fall on their beds? And as soon as they rested on them, would one have to wonder yet again why they bled? It was unnecessary to even question the flat and empty, lots of springs where the lord were standing upside down, pleading as they looked at the rims of the earth's crown. It stretched around the distance in a row of walking seraphim rows. To them I say stop and they stopped. My control over them was diving. I, as small insect who was stuck upon the ground and could not even dare to fly. There weren't mountains, roads or coasts. Only that flattening woes they spared before they went away. But they weren't lined up entirely as they had; rather, they were widespread around their hands. Whoever tormented those poor things, to wear, could not bother to look out there. But a few inches above their pointy hats, the penetrating succor killed them all as they flew away. No one is allowed flight as long as I say. Like soldier, did they fly? Not a single one alive, but honoring the must and the trust the insect had called. The cherubs followed and from their sudden electrical implosions which had rendered their bodies completely into nothingness, only a few helmets remained on the ground. All of which would be his forts. One small house amidst the cords. There, in the distance it stood. Understood, thought the insect as it slowly made its way. Without an escape, without the means of flight, the family living inside the house couldn't reach the same heights as the malignant celestial bodies which pushed themselves past any achievable height. Rims of space, better than to face, the agony of living as alone. 'My daughter hasn't come home yet. I wonder where she is.' He was almost done unwrapping her mother, by the rims of two hands which had been bold enough to hold just about every other piece of her alive. Strapping by her piles of neck-looking extenders, she seemed to be made out of three main pieces. A main structure, a bolding pair of inter-muscle pieces which looked jerky enough to be flaccidly pushed in every direction and a pair of stopped sticky-looking stumps. Four on each side, never bothering to spread or to move around. The blanket she had been wrapped in was made out of a layer of her own skin, and the two past arms had been used to hold her still while she was coupe to the machine. Pumping into her blood, a desiderated venture, and the stranger would pull from danger, only to believe there was something much nastier hiding inside the tin can inserted in her blind spot. 'Where have I put your head, dear?' It was lost, lost, lost, a long time ago. Misplaced before he could remember, hidden or stolen as she had remained, above the box, with the straggling turbine which forced the pumps even faster. Inside of here there nourished the oil, the bitter foil and coal which forced the blood to most obscure, noises could be heard, in cure. Cure for the way he felt, as he relinquished what he felt for her. 'My dear, where had our daughter gone? I cannot help if I am to find her done with.' Done in such a manner which would render her just as irreconizable as her son and her mother had been, both of them stood around, the fatherly figure being forced one level below the wooden rim of their house. Deeper, but not an attic, he had dug up a hole in which he hid all the members of the village who had been out there for far too long. It was frightening, the fact that there were no windows to look outside. And the only people who came inside had already been in that way, just as his wife. 'I sometimes wonder why I haven't changed.' Below there, he found it while rummaging through the trash he had attained from a time they all searched refuge from the world outside. Each piece of a washing mashing, or some closer, the food deposited had been completely encompassed by them. Of course they didn't need the machines to function. All of them relied on their own bodies as they began melting together. An impasse, he saw. They all started pushing their producing musk outside. As it was decided to be unnecessary for the time, being, where have you been? It asked. 'Above you all, I've been making sure no one would try getting in. But I see that I'm wasting my time trying to communicate with you in any case. For the time being, you have all been wronged by your own selves and the world outside. I can see that your own company put on a bleak appearance over your bodies. This pales in unnatural comparisons to what you are. Can't you see that your skin doesn't even look human any more, than what it had been when you were freshly out of the awe out there?' Responses came in the form of the spreading. Yet salt and sugar kept them in place. For some reason they still hated or seemed to care for their hypertension and the other unrelated disease. But all of them kept those tiny blots which kept beating, for a good reason as well. I could punch them freely and I would get away. I had to know whether or not my daughter was in there, so instead of doing it, I chose to freely enter through their bodies to see what lay there. The first times I had done it was awkward, it felt like a living mashed-sponge fumes, but I had gotten used to the feeling. My eyes had never been bothered by it, mostly because they avoided them. Other parts of me as well. But couldn't you tell? I was already there, making through, a reversal of the stairs making it bloom. And there were giant loops of many light beams which were solid and shot in every direction until the point had been completely locked. Most of them were connected by their flaccidity, which only allowed for a few meters to be taken as the distance approached. Even the stairs were somewhat flawed in terms of just how much of his legs allowed for them to come together. Soon enough, they were of one piece and they were no longer forced to keep themselves attached to it. As opposed to their beams, the ones which came out of them were of an antique bronze. Floating farther allowed him to reminiscence of the inside of each of them and how deep they went. His eyes could still peer into the beam-tunnels, as tiny as they were. Inside of them, they would create the tiniest amount of infested life one could fathom to repel. Deeper into their basin, where the mass had been expanding from within them fought. Each time one of the small insignificant lacquer life-forms won, the others would melt and be destroyed only to be repurposed into another fighter. Symbols and marks were worn on their yellow flags, which had been biological at that. Yet let it be known that the deeper one should go; he would find the place of disillusion. An uncanny paradise of chaos which, deeper by the rims of the beams, where they had completely stretched themselves into wires as they formed an under-torrent city which blocked the rivers of Humount. To each their own. About eight carrying embrace, he found himself being cracked like an egg. Ajamont looked for his daughter torn; he would be taken back into a piece after he'd return with the body of another child. There were other patches of staircases which kept a few other bodies for their return. 'If only I could get the rest of my wife as well, perhaps I would be complete as well. But for now, I shall settle with my daughter.' Cracked and revealed, he was completely pushed inside some strange carapace which held to his entirety, making him seem as lively as he might be. Not to see the signs around, one would have to be cruelly set about the inconspicuous vacuoles, which forced everything in place. This time, the embrace of solid carapaces would give him just enough of the outlandish look for him to shake the very walls. Tall to the regard, brought about the end of words. Days were passing, strays of old. To no content was he met, a deep desire, never to end. An insect was still approaching, thinking, even without seeing. 'Where had he gone? I can feel that you're not around.' Though this would be the last thing which remained, after he'd be dealt with, only the one stolid crackling tuck would stay. 'I am the Iliapochephal. Do not taint my land.' Echoes were sublime. The ground turned to rind, as the entirety of it shook under his gaze. Blue turned to a potato-hue and the disgusting disturbance went unseen. Helmets had become alive, as they were converted into that meat-kind which could be seen on top of the new pharaarachnids which winces at their own bodies, hiding themselves in pockets of dead air. Cold would not behave, there was no weather change. On top of their world, as broken by a bitter old countenance there was that one deciding piece of moon matter, whatever after came. To classify the level or derangement they had been sent into, the rows beneath the caverns below the farthest reaches man had succumbed had become a result of constant abandoned shells, carapaces, husks and even rocks they had abandoned. They've given up morality in exchange for this. A weird lifestyle of socket-exchange, bodies which weren't theirs. Some wore machines, robots, androids, even cyborgs which kept pieces of themselves. Others had deformed animals which were in part human by the mere fact that a symbiosis couldn't be anything but the thing which set them apart from the canon fodder which drew in. A human had become a flat surface as well, on top of a wall. Another one, only a piece of the organs which were swimming in a giant sea near the edges of the shore Ajamont rested near. In that sea there were not only the organs and the better minds, but the machines and the parts which kept them in check as they worked upon themselves, creating a pseudo-artificial puddle in which they evolved. This primordial thing called to him some senses which he didn't know he had attained. And the room near the sea, this short had been hard, almost sculpted, from a dark metallic-looking surface of a deep brown-green which looked like clay instead, if it had been wrought in iron afterwards. He had been completely called in, as they surrendered at a glance. Some weird forms came out, which had taken not only the appearance of bolts and other mechanic holding joints, but some giant bone-like ancestors of primates which only pushed their vividly disturbing appearances aside. One came with a deeply forged hat, which bore a few eyes and a tongue coming out of all of them that stretched around the rims in circle. No specific tongues were needed as the sea translated everything for him. To the initial change observation, he appeared to have noticed another change to the place. 'I haven't been in a long time. Would you happily point me into some direction?' 'Once you've established yourself as someone we can trust, then we'll discuss it.' And he danced for them, edifyingly pushing his knees up and down, well he hadn't any, but his shell was pushed upside down, as he turned and mourned again, for his sweet daughter. 'Let me pass already, I only came here for me, my sweet, sweet daughter.' 'What of your wife, Ajamont?' She had been a tool of the past. It wasn't something which would bring. Breathe through the air as you may. Breathe, deeper than what they want you to say. Restlessly set on the path ahead, look away, a piece of the earth was to fall sooner on your grave. It spoke of the macabre, lost for each step. Spake of the dead, look away at the blue diamonds at the prisms. There in the earth, past the trimmed lands of the spoken-for hounds, I could not rest not rehearse again. Lost for words I should've known she'd be lost. Would she be his if only for a time? He couldn't ask for her then, not likely since he was in doubt. For the girl who was his daughter, he had only one thought left to breathe.

Evil primeval nation

An evil nation had formed their kingdom in the midst of pines. Everything looked so simple, with no human settlement in sight. One of the first self-appointed rulers, evil man of a simple kind of dark breed came to be seen. 'Raise the flags men. Exactly how I told you to.' The animal skin had been spread against two wooden sharpened spikes which had been fashioned out of the stumps belonging to two adjacent trees which had their twin branches ripped off. Spread rightly, it looked like it bore the red symbol of a dying blow made with the help of fresh animal blood. For their name, they had taken it "The red enclave of bloody desperation." "I don't like that name, we should bear something to reflect who we are. And we're no desperate lot!" "Yes just look at us." Sturdy men stood dressed in several suits of fur and chain armor, with trinkets of iron and some lost alloy in the mix. Their helmets were exposed on the top so their hair would grow through it. The sight was uncanny and neither of them could help but expose themselves for what they were, dirty, unwashed, poorly educated, savages, ugly, bearing an arrangement of big moustaches, dark haired, long beard and shaggy teeth of yellow tint. Even their poorly made weapons were more like tools of assassination than what they were intended to be. And that's what they were a nation of assassins.

Using the cheapest tricks, more mobile of fiends couldn't even think of it. Neither of them had been intelligent enough and had chosen the cowardice as their tools of act. "The Infringement of mad laceration." "Too imbecile, who chose you out of the lot?" Savages like them laughed. They didn't take this formation too serious. Every single one of them had been in for their own, bearing teeth which were bloodied and kidnapped prey for their own. Small tents had been poorly made, lying tinted in dirty red. It had come out of the fact that there was some kind of blast from one of the moving forgeries coming from the dark mountain holes. "Council of the blow." "It needs more red to it, isn't that what we're known for?" "The red council of." "Enough whickering about, we got work to do. There are plenty of men which need to be assassinated, rich folk mainly, contactless as usual, unless you count what I say as a contract. In which case, I have plenty of targets which are in need of dying and in need of theft." "Sir, what are we in need for?" "Just about everything you could get your hand on, Skart, their fortune, their weapons, their Goliaths as well." The Goliaths of which they had been spoken of had been giant heads of dark grayish texture which had been hollow inside, bearing no skull or feature but living as floating remnants of their giant bodies. In them there had been the satisfaction only one man could bear being inside. As soon as he'd stepped in it, the skin-head would suddenly shrink and envelop the man, eating a piece of him but sending a part of his mind into their world. On their physical plane there'd be only a dumb, brain damaged and eaten poor soul who's stumble while covered by that peeling layer of falling skin. He wouldn't be able to feed himself or fend off anyone, but at least a piece of his mind was out there. And these Goliaths were looked for obvious reasons. "Where would we place the Goliaths if we got them? I never even saw one for myself." "We'll build a stable for them as soon as we have just enough of them to build one. Those things aren't easy to craft, not with them around." So many of them, all of which had once been bandits, outlaws, cutthroats and plain evil men who found themselves being exiled there, onto that patch of the land, to fend for themselves. Clearly no sane man could care enough for himself to even take a bath. Yet already, Skrrd, Llrk, Brrlk and Flrket were already on their way. It was a good plan so far, they had opened one of the horses and moved inside of it. Such a creature kept living despite being opened and used, bearing its eight legs on each side, twisted and joined in two halves as to lift and drag, lift and drag like some legged forest-crawler on the move... From beneath a pool of liquid acrylic syrup kept dripping from its inside, leaving a trail behind it. They were drenched in it. That had given them a scent which repelled the other inhabitants of the forest which had looked onto them. In all fairness, this valley filled with pines hadn't been a place of expulsion just for the men alone but for the defiant creatures which hadn't found their place in the world. It wasn't even normal, how it acted. Within their sudden grasp of what was going on there, the head of the horse-being opened and from it came a two headed turbine lasher, which bore its long body segmented with hoof-marks all over, which gave it the appearance of being walked upon. It hadn't made their walk any easier since. For each two steps, it would lash and whip itself against a tree, leaving a mark, as if it had to be known that it was there. 'Where does it even get so much of this bath from?' Said Flrket, with a bit of a hunch, just to point it out now. Above them, the ribcage shook, with its many organs trying to dance from one direction to another, flying out of order as they passed one another in their tiny space. Another set of moving bones had to act like preserving casts. It didn't matter, but look at that. Llrk pulled a piece and fashioned himself a small knife out of it. 'You should do the same as I have.' It was over the wooden bridge they brought that fiend to an end, thriving onto its last tints of meat and delightful feel before they threw its carcass away. Before it fell down there, it couldn't be forgotten. The sacrifice deserved something, especially since it got stuck on one of the many raised stone edges, from the posts whence it may never free itself from. 'Long thee be, Nyoa. Stay there and live for the rest of your natural span and may it be that we shall never meet again.' With which, they left one another and stepped in, step after step, going in the midst of the road, picking up a pair of wilder corpses before striding on foot towards the city of Yuonomar. The way ahead had made them weary of the road. It hadn't been easy trying to avoid any kind of night watch which raised the chance of them being caught at any hour. Something incredibly terrible happened. On their way, a man had stepped up to them on the trail of many leafed red wires caught in the turn of dust. Before the town, there stood this high crevice of stone which had constantly blown waves of dust across the flat plains. What had been endured now was the fact that the many wild plants had taken the appearance of twisted barb wires, not sharp to the touch but long and weedy enough to hide anyone while keeping them out of sight. On the brown floor, they looked like black and orange stripped barbs which shot out of the ground and into the tiny walls which had been formed out of tiny protrusions of stone. 'He's going to yell for help.' Skrrd said, with his nose pointing, dangling bone standing near a ring which held a bunch of black drake skins. He had just acquired it after killing one of their children and skinning their eyelids. Those were the dangerous parts after all. Poisonous toxins emulated from the body as soon as he had killed it, but luckily neither of them had been affected by the loss of limbs which occurred soon after. Another side effect would've been the losing of eyesight and the transformation into a crippled man which would've packed himself in a tinier shell before he got covered by a transparent veil he produced from the empty holes he bore, leaving himself exposed from another reptile-like creature to come forth. Brllk, seemed rather set on the fact that this made had a big backpack which held something of value. The sight of silver and of gold shone in his eyes. Only the thought of leaping and eating his ears could come. He wanted him to bleed out of them. 'Give it to me, I want it, I want that pack.' 'No noise yet, or the only silver you'll see will be dirty iron at the prison's grates.' 'But what if I want something to do with it?' 'You'll have to settle down then. No more being anxious, do you understand? We'll offer him something in exchange. I've got a feeling about him that he's just as deranged.' 'Stay back now.' He barked at the assassins. Without prior knowledge about what they were, having to judge them only by their ugly clothes, he had come to the conclusion that they were bandits. It didn't help at all that they were looking behind him that way. If they find out they're only painted imitations, they'll kill me. He had to have thought it out loud, because as soon as it passed, he noticed them whispering to one another just then. 'I think I see some movement there, should I check?' One tiny mace placed in the reach of his hand came down and knocked some sense into the wooden fence which had been stranded on top of dead pests. It had been a long road with many corpses placed adjacent to them. Inside them, there was this constant growth which would occur from time to time. If someone hadn't pushed the sharp ends of the fence's leg deeper into them, sooner or later they'd escape. And it would be dangerous to let them go. Bone wasn't supposed to grow and sometimes men carried stories about bone becoming flesh as well. Flesh spread and grew on just about everything before the immediate castration of the nearest snots. There were twenty deranged seekers out there, which were looking for those patched bones, colored in many hues of thermal stone. One would have to be mad to collect them after hearing the stories but they were out there. Farther away than this small confrontation and sudden awareness of a watch, they stood on lands, they grew as tall as plants and spires, darkly standing with their shadows bouncing and prodding around. Such fashioned homes were used by faceless wizards who stole their own heads and placed them on top of theirs. Afterwards, as they would get reanimated, there'd be no discussion of what happened or how they got there. In obscure holds they formed their cities and had planned that their malefic visage would force all of those planed bones to grow. If only they weren't under constant pressure, they would have their way. 'We'll get it somehow, someday, trust me. I'll have made my own city like that, one of dark wizards, blind and filled with the taste of floating dark bridges. They will be ruled by our kind and at every step they'll take we shall look down on them.' 'Enough already get back to your speech after we'll have gone on with the plan. Can't you see that we're not going to achieve anything as long as you're yapping your mouth? That head you have acquired for yourself is a hindrance.' And it was, standing on top of his bald spot, covered by the same long robe which was held by a small pair of empty fists which had revealed a cut, a single metal drop leaving it, from which the robe wrapped itself against two ends. It was obvious that there had been some insertions from the back of his head to that one implanted. No magic exists here, that's what they say. No one to be bothered by it, no one to lay blame on another being if he had found it wrong. This world was for the bastard, theirs was for the wrong. 'I'll trade you something from my pack.' Said the scoundrel, while met by the assassins, he revealed that he himself was no man. He pulled the head out of his place and revealed a metal cap which had been inserted inside that entry of his. An arrow flew through his back, breaking the device and whatever had been in it. Every assassin then understood what had to be done. Each of them had to spread in whichever direction they could force their tiny feet on. 'There, damn rascals, they're up to it again.' 'Who, what? Where are you looking for them?' High weeds of tall grass had been pushing and drawing to the side of itself. It wasn't obvious at first but one could cut a just about half of the weeds and find nothing in there. They kept growing from within their ground picks. 'I can't see a damn thing out there. They must've escaped when we weren't paying any attention.' 'So, what are we planning on doing now?' 'Return to the patrol, that's the only thing we could do. If they're there by midnight, let them be, but they should find themselves back on the road if they know what's best for them.' Suddenly they scurried like rats. Farther, by the gates of Yuonomar, there stood one of them, crawling beneath. There had been just enough space for the desperate to come in. It's been a few hours in which they each tried stumbling towards their goal as best they could. Wearing the skin which wasn't his helped him crawl underneath the most distinct of creatures. It was him, now under the name of Hollmark, who had taken the insides of the mad horse-like creation. As much as he had cared to show himself around there, he entered through the bowels and found himself standing in front of the very main raised ramps which lead to the greater part of the city, where the upper folk laid. There were many raised ramps which were conjoined and connected every part either by tall towers which connected every single other one, or the stairs. It was night and it was easier to crawl. He would have to find this man he picked for himself, for which he only had a face on it and a name. "Crator. Curator." Something in the veins of it. The name wasn't as important as he seemed to find himself drawn to the worst parts of it. Where the scum lay, there he went. A small pair of huts were filled together and left with only one door to get through. From it, two men had been dragged outside and beaten by a bigger one.

He fancied himself a tiny suit of leather on his overalls, which had been made out of some plate or chain-mailed. That would have to be ignored for now. I came here with a reason, don't let them see me yet. He drew his ugly hat neater underneath his face, covering his nose and eyes, pushing in what appeared to be the deeper cries from the distance. His ears followed, then his petty glasses. Black and rounded, held by a trickle of an iron wire. No more would he care, and there, he entered, again. Someone strangers looked and blinked an eye as if they knew who he was. Had he been a regular, he would've been seen as trustworthy. But he wasn't such a thing, there had been eight times he had been kicked out because of some attempts. It was clear that this time he wouldn't even care. A jumble of words could be called into play. More than deranged, as he had been seen, there had been less than fewer things now to play with. A lady at the fashioned bar, out of wood and tar, standing by the guard he hired, a big man with muscle's woe, bearing a metal bastion of a hammer's blow. There were some people he knew and other's that didn't return his favor. It was clear that at least someone was to be deranged, that evil one, who stood alone at the back of a plate. He had ordered living chicks and he was standing himself by eating their heads. Only their short-lived screeched had been heard but the two of them already established a connection by having their presences acknowledged. Within him there came this need to brush past the others. "Greetings dark wizard, what information do you bear on you?" The head on top hadn't been any less disturbing than the facelessness underneath it. That had been something to be looked after. No one trusted this warlock, this evil man, this person. "Last devices, we're selling the last part of this tiny cutter of toes." By the counter they had already started the auction and they were selling a machine of which the sole function was what it said it did. From it there had been a bunch of spider-legs popping, not made out of metal, but conjoined and grown there. They would have to be dealt with separately, as from now on; they fed through the tiny hairs growing on their many legs. Liquid could be spread and pushed inside those things, but they never specified what it was. Neither had been that, the fact that it pushed egg sacks out of them at times, creating those flat beings, which would replace the next generation of device holders. "You're looking for someone to slay." "How did you know that warlock? Tell me or I shall make you suffer until you expose yourself and your sources." "I know what you are, everyone does. Your clothes aren't hiding anything, just looked at yourself. It's way too clear from where you came from." "And what of it then?" "I have no intention of repealing you now. We both know it'd be better for both of us to keep a distance and never come into contact with anyone untrustworthy, that's why I decided to reveal what I know." "I'm listening then." "This Curator you're looking for, I could point you in the right direction for now. For a small price, we shall make a great deal." "It never goes well with your kin. Why should I trust you that you'll keep your side of the bargain?" "One exchange of his heart and we shall strike the deal." "You want me to abandon the others you say?" "Not two, not three, not four hearts but one. It is yours who shall take the head of the Curator. My second head had sight, he was a servant after all. I could tell you of everything he has, from his chambers to his stables." "We needed stables, for the Goliaths. Isn't that what master said? But those aren't our stables. We could still get them. 'What can you tell me?' Snicking in wasn't going to be easy, especially since getting through those ramps would leave one rather exposed to everything up there in the watch towers. And they would be rather merciless against me. First, there was need for a distraction. No one expects fire unless there's sign of a fight, and since he knew just well, as a warlock would or a dark wizard at that, he confessed he had been rather pleased by the idea. There had been some conjuration or the spilling of valuable fluid from behind the back of his neck, which spread that much needed flammable exploit which would be immediately picked on from. Small bursts erupted and unless water buckets were brought, the fire could spread just around town in less than expected. But if there was something to him, that had been the fact that they would look upon themselves wretched, because they helped the scum. In the boarding of the tower, this Hollmark came, and brushed himself just by the gate as the guards just went in rows. A long way laid for him to climb after, just immediately as he entered and came to the surprise, he had been met by the quickened charge of a wolf. That rabid creature hadn't been aware of the tiny knife this man bore, being met around his neck, his body got thrown against the door. Alarmed by a knock behind, some wanted to check while others did not. He had been gone from the first area but three of them found the dog. It barked no longer, he was seen before. 'It's that dirty thief and scoundrel, get him, don't let him get away!' Screams had reached and bounced against the many walls inside, the brushing of his body as he passed on each room inside the tower had only made it harder for them to follow. He wanted them to; they had to see him go. It was part of it for as much as he hoped they would alert the other ones. Behind him, he had picked on the sliding tools. As the warlock had told him, the wizard below, he would use those metal clappers to hold himself by the metal wire which connected the watcher's vigils. That way he could traverse throughout town without being able to get caught. Obviously he couldn't be immediately pushed down or dragged for as long as there was power in him, he wouldn't despair. No more would he run, now it was the time. At the last moment he was met in the room belonging to the captain, in whose weapons stored armor galore, glory to the great axe which stood there in prime and glory. He wanted it, but it would be too heavy as well as hard to attain. Not likely to be caught by it, he wanted to be seen by just as many eyes. Before he could draw a blade, or make it for the dagger on the table, the pin of the halberd or the beer mug, Hollmark leaped and just then slit his throat and ran away. As the guards approached the last fierce sight emerged. They saw him draw and slide and get through that metal wire to the other side. He had traversed the first one before arrows could even come to land. They drew back knowingly. 'Don't shoot, you know what'll happen if you do. You'll only make it worse. We know where he's going, it must be there.' Why, this had been the mark of an assassin, the executioner who came. And only one prime target could remain, unless the captain but he had just been advanced in rank. They had no quarrel with him, clearly he had been only a distraction or some petty target. 'He will be in the courtyard of the Curator, that's where the wires lead to.' 'But they weren't supposed to lower themselves that way. Someone must've rearranged them.' He had been there, leaping after the fence into the grand entry to his citadel. That place was raised as if for war. It had been forged to withstand a siege of the kind which would draw in for months. And the ones left in charge hadn't noticed him yet. Four great rows of raised ore-like sculptured structured spines came out from every side. From each of them spread lobe-like patterned walls which gave the impression that those weird things grew on top of each other, having been given birth than being sculpted. What that lead to have been the main structure which stood like some kind of ziggurat, adorned with the many drawn in metal hinged which connected it to the walls. Every few feet there had been a delimitation of squared rings which surrounded the structure, which moved and appeared to be runed. Only the casts of human skulls lay as runes in each ring, without a mention that each of them had been distinct from one another. Somehow, Hollmark hadn't realized that this was no simple man. This Curator was too dangerous to be confronted. Even his servants hadn't been alive, as they were structures which took on the shape of what they came into contact with, most recently being some men. It couldn't be appalled by the fact that there was something inside of them which helped make the distinction between their kin. He would have to look for another way in. And that hadn't been easy, though he had found a secret hole, hidden within a show of many hounds. He heard them but saw them not, anywhere as a matter of fact. They were just dead echoes which followed as he fell. A stroll through the sledge had come and he was there indeed, if alive at all. Torches lit this sanctuary inside, revealing the fact that the main structure hadn't been the entire citadel he owned but a tombstone per say. Large bodies stood there. Not giant, no colossus anywhere to be seen, only the damaged bodies of twice a human length and size, servants which wouldn't die. Startled by the sudden awareness, as one of them had been made aware of his presence, he stopped. The servant lifted himself on two feet. Without having seen much of the architecture of the place, he only drew the conclusion that he'd face something there or naught at all. 'Intruders aren't welcome here.' A piece of his skull was missing, leaving only two thirds which encompassed his mouth. The head must've been gigantic as well, most likely, something affected their growth in the same way the Goliaths had grown theirs. 'I'm not intruder, only a friend of the lord who owns this place. He's the one who invited me here in the first place.' 'I do not believe you.' Said the statue-like centurion, that's what he looked like. An armored figure, with no way of being there at all, bearing a kilt which had been leashed with some golden bands and chains, his shield was placed below him resting as he continued to provoke the little guy. The colors he bore were light grey nearing a green hue, with dark shapes embed on a loath chest, pauldrons with two anchored heavy neatly-placed pads. But his skin neared a blue shade, barely visible, his lips were purple, but obscured by this indistinguishable nuance which distracted anyone watching from knowing whether or not he had been alive. An arrogance made him be aware of what had been inside of him. That postulating stuffing which preserved the vestige he wore. It wasn't certain who he was or why he was there, as this was no mere soldier or watch. He had a nameplate on his chest which had the name. 'Gaius.' 'That would be my name, but I suppose it won't matter if you know it. My duty here is to provide you with a fair warning leave this place and don't return. The others won't be so kind as to entertain any kind of discussion or trickery. You may find yourself crushed underneath the banter.' 'But what if I was actually invited here by the lord of this place? Would he not be offended if he were to find out that his guest had been crushed?' 'Do you even know the name of the one who resides here?' 'Yes, he's the Curator.' 'An admirable attempt, but that's not his name, but the tile he bears.' He bent over and mere squeezed his head off. It immediately popped off without a question, just like the dark wizard predicted, but obviously hadn't told him at all. The others were on their way now, some had scurried in like a bunch of misplaced rats, going their weary crevices and passages in stone. Handiwork couldn't be denied now, as each one of them had carried some insatiable mean of murder. They spread in different directions, taking heed to make sure they were each getting a neat head start. With their weapons drawn, each of them managed to fling the weapon of choice, a beheaded goat-potyr, and the blade of a gentleman with no eyes. Farther way in a land unlike this, he had been speaking with his bodiless goats at noon. Floating as they were, their lack of bodies served as a warning to the cluster of curses which inhabited the lands. But those were no goats, just shape shifters which had taken on the appearance of them. Why, their bodies appeared to be blades and various other sharp tools which would be used for torture. Revealed, as their true forms showed, they were made of one body which they all shared. On it, the heads of frogs, goats, dogs and utmost respectable felines rested. It was a body of a large magnitude of long hordes of heads which could only be seen as shapes which tried escaping from the sack in which they had been set. Every now and then, one of these outside heads would bark or make their specific sound to push them back. Now, obviously, one of those heads had been taken. It was precious after all, as it seemed to be the body of an overlord, which governed over its many pest-like servants which couldn't be mistaken for anything else than the defiling stuff of evil. It reigned. But this weapon had been forged and cursed. And every now and then, it would become a smaller body which had exited through the goat's eyes and mouth and ears, as a symbol that it hadn't forgotten what it was and that it would never be able to outdo itself again. Another reality connected the heads. Though their deaths could be reckoned with, it looked like there was a chance that afterlife for them would be the place where they showed themselves to be pure again. A furry goat-head would be a great worm out there. And from its weird squid eyes, there'd be a song which would revive the heedless sleepers from underneath the stony steps under which they hide. It was known that the lord of that afterlife had brought one of the most devastating punishments there were. The worm could be dragged back into life and forced to become another pest, another animal, in the body of which it could come. A majestic dread had been. That in was no goat that thing. There were no goat, but these things which had been spiked in the shape of some sea-drivel had been given that name. It was majestically unnerving to be looked down upon, with its sea-ears, sea-horns, sea-eyes and a will that never dies. It carried on knowing that it could extend its life. By now he had chosen onto himself to overcome death and become part of his arm. He extended from the neck in the back until he had become that, the wum he had desired to be. As the guards chased the assassin, they stopped and began being dizzy from the song it produced. That song had no effect on him, as he was spared. Both of them were aware that this alliance had to be carried with. But the man who had collected the heads? Where was it? Who was he if not the one dark wizard who had grown his maze-like tower into a plummeting lake, drowning himself as the goats drew in from their place? Agony couldn't be spared and he suffered in the last moments of life. A trifling thing had it been that it had survived for so long outside the place. But a curse it was, near the bottom of the lake, where the spirit of the wizard dwell, with the spirit of his second implanted head and the spirits of the drowned sailors and pirates with which he dwelled. Agony again was promising as this fool of an assassin found himself near the same hole. Somewhat he leaped over the wall and he had been chased by look-alikes made out of some made stone. 'You'll never catch us.' But the song was ineffective. Neither of them had been verged to fall to slumber and it went down as it had. There was something pointless in that moment, the cruel woe for which he fell. How could it be that he found himself down there, with a singing little goat, instead of having half-a-sense for himself, it became more clear that nothing else could be had but that certain angst and anxiety which bothered him to no end. It had been aroused by the many lights and the waking of so many centurions he couldn't count that he chose instead to set forth. Nothing could be questioned any longer, without the trace of evil and of paranoia. No, without out there would be wrong in the world. He wanted to somehow escape the place. In his mind, he could only think of a way through which he may make amends for what he's done. And even that crustacean goat stopped singing, as it turned to shaking. Both were met by no way to run, a tight tunnel which lead in front of a big hall towards which the walls converged and which appeared to share a similar design on each side. In the middle there were the stairs. If he could make it there in time, but the question couldn't be called. Not while it moved. One of the other assassins spans and ended up leaping off his head. 'We'll meet on the other side.' While being chased, as if that hadn't been enough, there hadn't been anything but the weird manipulation, the courage of looking as the mad insemination which had waited on the other side. The previous scene couldn't be seen but merely thought off then. It couldn't have been thought as anything else but that supposed death of his colleague. It didn't matter. This' what he discovered. In front of them, the bridge which connected four sides at each end stood above the army which resided underneath the chapel. In it there stood a bumping spot of white formations which spread in every direction, had the texture of many tiny egg-like sacks which would resemble fish-offspring's trying to get out. From it, in the back of that lord, it attempted to form his mad wings out of their own children. Within each bump, there sprouted a few as well as there could be implied. There was that desire to be told and held accountable for their sake. But this adorned man, who stood in the same shape of the centurions but whole looked upon the intruder. Curator, he'd been called, lifeless but stone. In his back, popping eggs sprouted more from their own insides. He had found a way to get his own living eggs to impregnate themselves into growing. No life could get out of them any longer and he would achieve flight. He blinked, and made it so he would aware that he wasn't a statue.

This assassin had been watched. Looking around, he saw the four chambers through which the bridges lead, including the one behind him after the stairs. It was such a peculiar design, this tomb of his. Slightly denivelated and pushed forward rather than there being unity. To him, it almost felt like this moved. And he saw then, the wheels on the sides, it did move. 'What are you hiding underneath this place? The hole above should've aligned with the top of your open chapel.' And it looked like only the roof and four pointing legs surrounded the sack-birther and the seat in which the curator stood. 'I am giving you a chance to live for a shorter period of time than your pathetic life allows. Leave this place and don't return. My centurions might turn a blind eye now, but they won't unless I have called for them to do so.' It took him a moment to realize just how hopeless it had been. Without question, there couldn't have been a worse thing. They were aware of it, and let it sink. The body of his fellow assassin and his smashed head of a goat had been thrown below. Neither of them had ever found the remains of the other man they had lost. Which only lead to that one thing which was uncontrollably set off instead of watching anything else? It was by those means that they might be able to get away. They could've used the chance to evade in a small slither of a stone. He saw it, just a few feet away, if he had stepped on it, he would've fell through the floor. If he had survived the fall, he might've had the chance to be on his way and escape. But both were dead and only one of them remained. This curator had him stare. 'My people wouldn't forgive me if I had returned empty handed.' And to show that he had meant it, he took a few steps forward, shaking without a doubt. It was clear what he wanted to do. 'You intrigue me, small fly. Perhaps this is how you want to die? At the hands of the Curator?' 'That is your name, is it not?' 'A title, but it is close enough. Say, I enjoy a gamble, a play of words, a jumble and riddles and any kind of game of worth. With that said, guess my name.' 'Would you be the Sphinx now?' 'Oh, but you have been lectured on the past. You look unwell and dirty, a scrant. How is that you know of such things?' 'I have come from a noble family, oh, Curator. Don't be surprised if I may have been able to brush past your guards. As each of them tried to crush me, I have avoided their strike and come through as easily as I could do for myself. Through my studies, I have learned how to prevent any kind of harm, any kind of rancid thing which may come upon me then, anything of the matter. Worry not, as I won't slave myself past it. They shall torment me no longer, these thoughts which haunt me.' 'I have grown weary of your need to stall. Say what you want then, we shall play no games. If I deem your request worthy, I may either free you, proceed to go on with you or I shall make you suffer.' It had been rather grand, the solace of the evil nation. They crafted for themselves carpets which had been placed below and they cut the trees and made for themselves tiny houses and homes, a village into the wretch of the place that had been. 'Well, by now they should've returned.' 'They're dead, I know. It's what I expected it to end like. We have too many mouths to feed and this is the only way to actually clear them off.' 'Are you sure there won't be any unwanted attention being drawn to us?' 'From whom?' 'From us.' One of the warlocks said. A hand of men who had been around the place had taken looks at them.

These strange darkly coated wizards who let their top heads do the talking for them. It was surprising how they made it this far. 'We were promised a good deal if we looked out that they may be killed as clean and quick as possible without traces being left. And I have personally gone through a lot of trouble to curse the mind of many of the witnesses out there.' 'Why you tiny two headed cheating bastard.' It was twenty years ago. That thing, it looked so distant now. But they managed to build their twin cervixes which had been laid around their greater town. It had been surrounded by a forest not of trees or oaks but of those wizardly towers which had been planted and allowed growth. What they had achieved then was a complete alteration at a level which may be unmet. 'How may I serve, young assassin?' This one shopkeeper sharpened his blade and came to his senses. Obviously distressed by what was going on in there, he couldn't help himself while looking at the many blades and spears in display. The tiny daggers and poisoned arrows looked maliciously appealing. 'May I have a single arrow?' 'No, leave.' 'But I have come with pay, I have the means to buy at least a good chunk of your ware, see?' This young brute took out his bag and revealed a wealthy enough stack which had been hidden from sight. 'What are you up to? Trying to trick me or something? I don't take kind to those who'd pull me off me trousers.' Not with what he had been hiding behind him.

It was the actual body of the shopkeeper, as his was a replica face. It had taken him a while to grow it but he had done it nonetheless. Somehow obvious, if not, the growth had been a practically hard process to be called. By the face which had been delivered, just two weeks prior, he had been but a tiny worm which had been electing on the blood still left on the meaty side of that weird shaped face which got ripped off someone's skull. Though it was weak to the touch, he had managed to take a tiny bite off the vendor's finger. It felt like a sting, dismissed as no less but the happening of clumsiness. Though this was fine to notice, how this tiny ringed one came off the ground, crawled away and began growing. With enough of his blood, there'd be enough information to fully grow him. And when it happened they met. 'What's this?' 'I am now you and I have come to take your place.' 'What?' His throat had been slit and cushioned to block the sound and make as muffled of a noise as he fell on the floor. There came a knee which only added to the injury he felt as well as a kick to the back of his ribs when he was on the floor. Afterwards he stomped the back of his neck, while he was still kicking, and pulled him by the hair to force the bleeding of the throat to occur more so-likely. 'Now I am you, and it is I who should be in charge of the store. And I have only you to take for.' He spoke to the flayed face. It answered. 'You are welcome, I have provided you with a means of escape from your condition. Now I only ask for you to grant me freedom so I may crawl again and reach the fields of Thousogour.'Fine.'With his free hand he slapped the case open, breaking it and spreading the ashes. A fire had been made which had to be promptly stamped. It had been a mistake, using his hand for it, which had promptly become some weird twist of finger and of worm-growths. Small burn marks lay on top of it as well, white-sored. But the young assassin who had come in missed just about everything. No one mentioned anything else. They had all been too cruel for those types of things. 'What do you want then? What do you actually want? Not just an arrow, I hope, unless you came here only to show what you made.' 'No, no, but I came here to make fine purchases. Like that blade over there.' 'It's far too heavy for you, who's going to carry it you? Are you aware of the policy? No taking back of stolen good.' 'They're stolen? All of them? But I thought this was an honorable place.' In the short span of time he had been alive, he never would've expected someone as backwards as this short spy. His eyes were narrower and he couldn't see properly. For his very attempt looked like it wasn't going well. Blasted flayed mask still kept on dragging along, pushing through and ignoring everything which happened there. 'Can I at least focus on the merchandise?' 'Do what you want, you're not obliged to purchase anything you don't want.' It was copulating. Three more flayed faces emerged. One of them clawed its way to the back of the vendor he had killed, trying to take away his mask and push it out from him. His brown stalkish clothes prevented the rest from being taken, the main thing which impeded it being the cap. On the other side of the street there was the Posionery. It was they called it in those days. They had the front of the shop strayed in a coat of anti-venom pesticide. There wasn't anything like it, to the point of there not being any way to decide whether or not it was safe to touch. 'No one entered yet. Hey, can you hear me up there?' Klone yelled up the small shaft which entered through the ceiling. He had been heard just well enough then. 'Is the mixing going as planned?' 'Give me a moment to check.' He had looked in the barrels where all the poison mixing was being done. There were extra strains of extractions from the common roach and the rats which had been caught. It couldn't be believed at all. It was undoubtedly peculiar then. A stroke of misbehavior seemed to be for the kin. No one dared look at their own. Those heads which hanged on top of the ceiling kept leaking inside the barrels. It was a fascinating process which couldn't be described as anything else at all, but the desire of some vague calculation. They were matching the exact needed amount which would fall inside the poisoned substance, which had been combined with the thing which dripped from the last floor above him. 'Are the bodies breaking apart?' 'I think they are. Let me see, yes, I think they're breaking apart just well.' Without a way of consideration, or some malignance, they had perfect the process of disease to an extreme which couldn't even be seen as anything less of an imperfection. It was evenly said, that the dead carried the potency of the poison which had been used on them while they had been alive. Combined with the bodies, it had been right. 'Well, the bodies are doing great, they're pilled and rotting and bloating the substance in which they're slowly melting. We shall have a new charge of their essence soon enough.' They collected them separately and stored them into bottles. By the looks of it, they had long tubes and valves which turned and twisted as soon as the process had begun. It was seen as nothing less than a way of preventing any contamination and the sudden venomification of the toxins. Why, if the ritual had been wrongfully placed, then, the poison would be filled with some sort of distaste. It would fill anything up to a curve. No one would dare move while it happened. Some past assistants had been lost at the time when some mixing happened during the ritual. The incense combined with the many placed runes were meant to be mixed with the poison, the essence and the solid remains of various insects to create some powerful kind of ailment which would be attached to any kind of surface. Anyone who'd step on it as a mere kind of mischance would find themselves afflicted by their clothes. It would first be absorbed by the fabric, afterwards, it would change to enter the skin and work its way layer after layer until it would have poisoned the victim's organs as well as their minds. None of that would be caught by eye at first and in the end, the poison would find a way into the sewers, living there for the rest of its life. What would keep it alive would be the constant hunt of the rats which would come as soon as it would sharpen itself like some kind of spear and run through it at last. Some rats survived, carrying only a tiny bit of it with the help of the fleas, as it was close to being harmless to the rodents in small amounts, but not to men. They were deadly to them. The most high-profiled targets were them after all. It was for that reason that at the highest levels they hired women to do the work and the mixing. The essence acted in the same manner. But no woman would be trained in the ritual which was needed for the creation to occur. But had the venomification been? A strange process indeed, which would force the poison to become some kind of venom which would be immediately absorbed by the first man who came into contact with it, who would in turn develop a sack in which it would be stored, just above the lungs. What had been ever so deadly was the fact that, as it had already been implied, they would have to insert it by biting. And self-biting occurred evenly often to no contrary belief. No amount of interest faded by the fact that the victims would sometimes try having their teeth pulled out in order to prevent themselves from being bitten. But that didn't work either, as the glands had still developed and they would constantly be drinking their own venom, which would have such a wild concentration that it would melt through living tissue and find its way into the bloodstream if it were for it to be ingested. No one was safe from danger, though that had been a means of living. Of course it had been him, the same annoyance of an assassin who had been here before. This time, it looked like he actually came with a bunch of small blades and an arrow. One of them, a single arrow, no more than one, had he lost the others? "Say, have you lost something on the way here?" "I suppose I have. My time, I thought this was an honorable shop in which I came." "It is?" "Why yes, only the most elite of assassins are welcomed here, are they not?" "Are they?" This hadn't been a pleasure. Business went slow when they had to walk or go by carriage for entire months during their assassination runs. And in the meantime, they were stuck with people like him. It wasn't getting any better at all. No one wanted him to be near them. He had a weird appeal and a strange way of negotiation, if there had been one at all. Without a way to look back, he asked for it. "An essence, please." "How do you know about the essences, you pesky rat? I've seen you before, going around and trying to outdo us over with your selling of wares and, damn you." It was hard to keep his face straight, especially when he was annoyed by this poor excuse of an assassin. Obviously this knucklehead hadn't done anything even closely regarding to some kill, otherwise he would've done something by now. There were no other influences then, only this thing. He didn't have the scent of any beverage, though each time he had come in here, he smelled like it. "Very well then, one that's been properly dealt with should be just about." "No, I want a pure one, from the top." "Listen you damn... Listen very carefully, I don't know what type of game you think you're hinting at but I'm not going to sell you one. It's far too dangerous, especially in the hands of someone like you." "What, you don't trust me?" "Yes, yes, I've heard that before, same lines, multiple times, always trying to get through with something, one way or another. Don't try putting yourself on the top just yet, it won't end up well for either of us. If there's a leak, that will reflect upon our shop and ours alone." And there was the other thing. He looked sometimes from the corners. It hadn't made any sense, but he materialized from the corners, a figure with a skull-helmet on top of his metal graves and banded armor, which had the heat shape of some broken anvil. By the time they had established what was going on then, it was clear enough that there was some way to push through the veils of their hidden hold. This was no assassin, he had been the image of destruction which had been widely spread. Once it had been reported that it opened his head to reveal a wager of fire which lay inside. By the time it would stop, this tormented face of many melted alloys revealed itself as some kind of grasping hand. His insides felt like a place where the souls went and suffered for what they've done. It was no coincidence that it had appeared here and now. 'Fine, we'll strike a deal, this is the amount of coins.' 'Cut it by eighty thirds.' 'That's not how it works, I cannot give you for any less, especially for such a pure dose.' 'But I want it, I need it for my project.' 'What would that project be now? It can't be replicated. That's not how it works either.' 'Then you have nothing to fear from me.' He didn't know what he was getting in. He would kill himself and a few people around him. They couldn't sell it, though there were no laws preventing any kind of immoral action, he was far too dangerous to be trusted with even the slimiest dose. But how? How would he be tricked? If there was any kind of poison or toxin or. Wait, he had kept the venom somewhere in here. Not the kind which had resulted from a misused ritual but from the other direction. At least, to be sure, there were a few indications which could be had. This danger could only risk itself there, this had to be done. He had to get rid of this dumb cretin somehow. 'Here, purest of the lot. Wait, before I give it to you, know that you have to be made aware of the dangers which lay in this bottle. If you are prick your finger, expose your skin, move it, rub it, sniff it, lick it, or any kind of appliance of any type of surface which may come into contact with you, this will rot your skin and inner organs. Though it may take its time, this will be agonizing, as you will eventually suffer through it.' 'So I'm supposed to simply put this on?' 'No, you will die agonizingly slow until it exits your body. In the rare case that you may survive, it will take a lot of willpower, which I doubt you may possess to get back on your feet. This isn't a joke, this is incredibly dangerous and the consequences are far too outrageous to be simply brushed over.' 'Fine, fine, just give it to me. I shall make do with it.' The trade had been done, one poison bottle exchanged masters. He left as soon as he had come to his senses and got ready to apply. First there'd be the arrow, then the short daggers. It was hard, keeping them that way, but he had previously applied some ailment on the metal. Though this process would take a long time, he would eventually create a resin out of the melting pot of metal, the ailment and the toxin, which will be melted together at the forgery to create a metal star. It was a dangerous time to way in his hiding spot. He had dug a hole underneath one of the normal buildings where people where and there he culminated his doings. By no ethereal means could be waiting any longer and possess any difference in thought. It couldn't even be right from the start.

They were trying to look at it that way, by means of disillusion. His friends, a few heads he had stolen from a battlefield. They were cherished as assassination targets when in reality, they had been laymen. But it was more important that they didn't look like them, they looked like wealthy people by appearance, so why would it matter if they wore robes of rags? 'I need to be careful with you, sharp ones. If I were to prick my finger now, straight into your sharp angles, I would simply have to.' A few assassins had been bored. They were running around a spring when they had stumbled upon an entry underneath. 'Look, I see a secret passage, what do you think may be there?' 'There's only one way to find out, isn't there?' And down the gulp they went, straight down the throat like a bunch of animals which went over themselves, trying to get in each other's ways. 'There's a giant barrel here, and a door, what now? How did they manage to carve an entire cave?" "Shut yer mouth before you give us away, look, I think I hear someone coming." From the other side came the armor thug. He had been hugely-bulked, his eyes were pinned and on top of his head, over the black mask there was the skull of a thorax. Giant and reptile-like, it was even less remotely apt to some kind of influence. This thug looked the type of a heavy drinker. "So, what do you possess?" "What would that be stranger?" "What do you have on you? For the pass." "That's ridiculous, we don't have to pay for a thing. We just arrived here." "No money, no pass. No pass, you leave, by yourselves or by me." He straddled one of his arms by the side and started flexing. The armor around it appeared to be strained by the mere display of force. But what had given them the impression of him being threatening was the fact that he had a big head behind his back which pushed a smaller one out of its mouth which pushed a tongue which went in a maze-like complexion of steel. It turned into an eel-like process of spreading some static shock against the air, which bounced and appeared to make some connections now and then. "Look at this, I have made some arrangement that I would get a new experimental toy every time some trouble-maker stumbled down here. This is a selective tool exchange workshop, yea, I like that. You come near me, I break your nose. Make a move, I break the opposite, down there. Now that we understand one another." And as he said, he made sure to flicker his weapon that it may bounce up and down until the tongue regained its steadiness and reformed into a blade. Neither of them could look away. They each picked up a small sack and threw it into his hand. "Right this way, gentle scum. Right this way." It was vaguely looking like a trash hole. That used to be a standing table and those broken chairs used to be whole. Not a single drop of the oil came from above. More interestingly, this was a display which showed just enough of what was needed to complain. Eight doors, each wall being occupied. For now they were merely in the longue and it looked as if someone had trashed it. Despite every assassin being forced to wear their formal apparel, there was a thin and tall man who sat in corner, drinking for his pipe. He filled it with the drops of black scum which dripped from above them. Less plausible than it appeared in their eyes, this stranger offered them something, a much prized coin. "Welcome, to the real inner-working of our Enclave." "Has a name been settled on already?" "No, but it's still something we're working on. Plyeoris, that's my name. I am a master. That's simply what I am. Don't try arguing with me." With a flicker of the tongue, he revealed the small needle he had sipped in from his pipe. After that, he showed them a haystack of needles which had been hidden in it. He spat it at one of them, inches below his eye. It hit, landed but didn't fall deep. The three of them almost got into a defensive position but before they could take out a small dagger or any kind of blade, this man threw it at them, the tiny needles, which fell like some freckles of space. "Too slow, I could already see myself cutting through all of you and leave you bleeding down the side. It's not safe, you know that. There's a clock tower down there. And in it, there lives another master assassin. Just like I am." Plyeoris didn't even look like he drew that blade. A long, sharp rapier stood in his hand. Clearly caught by this, he reeled in and drew closer. He wanted to cut deeper, much deeper than what was expected of him. "Fine, there, see that door over there? It's open. The workshop is a facade, I think you're worthy of looked away. Let me just knock this many times." Of course neither of these troglodytes paid any attention there. It was less important and the pace had been skewed. But they were drawn in by the sight of the jewels. They saw down there, through the stair, an opening, through which they ran, leaped and almost fell through. "Watch your step by the way, there's a dead fall just below. Many a luck for you, strangers." A full view of this multi-placed spanned dimensional cascade resonated as they looked upon the rooted tandems of hardened wires which were placed down there just a tad above the buildings. IT wasn't a city, those constructions had been stolen. Utmost likely from the assassinated targets which were in no need of them any longer. Not that it mattered. It looked insufficiently vague whether or not someone could hold them apart. From one side and the other, they noticed just how much wealth there was down there, but on top of each house, finally they pointed and saw. 'The bodies, look, they killed entire families and their hounds and the Goliaths are there as well. All of them impaled on dark wood and raven homes, what's going on in here?' 'Don't let your tongue get out of the way just yet, we need to know how we may be able to prevent our fall.' 'We could last through the fall if we pay just enough attention and grab a hold as soon as we hit the rope.' 'Fine, but our deaths will all be on you, understood?' 'I certainly have. Now let's make it before it's getting late.' They got caught in this state of affairs and fell. Now that the ground was safe to be stepped on they latched on the metal strings and held just in time so they would prevent the fall. The three of them had been greeted by some stares by the looks of it. On the contrary, it couldn't have been enough, the amount of time which had been spent at that moment when everyone simply looked out of place. As they were greeted by these strangers, they paid a special kind of attention to how they dealt with their horses. It was an important detail and quite a sight to focus on for as long as they were there. Without proper commitment, they couldn't pay any other interest to what was right. In front of their eyes, there was this decisive interest, which was inheritably bad. 'Get out of my face you scherzo!' A four headed spike helmeted creep came out of one of the lamp smoke shader. As the door blasted behind him there came the trail of white smoke. It but through the air with a flicker of the eye, but he saw it then. One of the assassins noticed the strange man who had been hiding inside the blinks. The same armor matched what they had been talking about, with little in mind to their own needs. It bled the question, who was that warrior who hid himself. 'I will tear your body apart unless you give me what's mine, do you hear?' 'What's mine is mine, now get out of the way.' Without a second in mind, they turned towards the fight and watched. As the two of them had been caught by their belts and wrapped around one another, they fought not with blades but with broken bottles, trying to chop at each other's neck before anything could be had. It was unnerving at last, watching how there wasn't any chance to get away from it. A sense of danger permitted one to draw away and spread himself as fast as he would need to in order to avoid the capture. 'Do not be distracted yet. They won't covet what's needed of me to creep.' With that he chopped about one fifth and revealed the bleeding wound which held no red blood but black. He bathed in it and appeared to have achieved his reward. They clapped and looked as the man disappeared in the night. It had always been like that, down here, fighting occurring, stabbings, and assassinations between cowardly strangers. 'Newcomers, if I were you, I'd stay as far away from them as I could. They're not worthy of your time. Listen to me.' 'Who are you?' A red robe, scarce of fingers which lit fires appeared, like some magician, fire breather, obscure redeemer of the flame. It wasn't likely that he had any association with the warlocks but this young looking, long hated red dressed magus, who had himself presented by a bow appeared to be rather well behaved. 'I am Floor, of the flames. They call me that, you know? Around here and just about every place I appear at. Most think I'm a legend because I was born with the unique ability to produce fire at the tips of my missing fingers. So I have made it my task to make as many flames as I could so I may impress as many people as I might. In my quest, none may suffer any addiction to my fire. Know that I shall act as cold as I have to if you develop some kinship towards me. My soul is lonely like a red wolf, a lone one that's misunderstood.’ ‘I’m Drelk, these are Stellkrn and Krong. We are mighty assassins.’ ‘I figure.’ ‘As I was saying, we have come forth here in seek of a new adventure in the confines of our city.’ Drelk made sure to look around. No one was paying any attention to them any longer, instead they resumed whatever they were doing prior to the fight. It wasn’t that often that he would see something like this going on but he figured as much. ‘Listen, I only want to do something here, an interesting thought. But I want to purchase something.’ ‘That’s what every newcomer wants, every single time. If only someone came as an explorer or a victim of some loss of space. But no, they all come here looking for a tool or weapon or anything useful.’ ‘And why wouldn’t we?’ Ask Krong, as he made himself taller, as if to appear like he was strong. ‘Why, I’d say I’m trying something of the kind myself, with better tools and better weapons.’ ‘No excuse here. I understand that you come from a city of warmongers. And this is the Black Market after all.’ This was a dangerous thing which made all three of them leapt to their senses. They may not have realized prior to the reveal but this was nothing to be taken lightly. In the market they sold parts, living pieces kept alive by powerful chemicals. And weapons which would misfire, various dusts of addiction and even some sharper tools which sometimes cut through the arm of the wielder, by accident, or course of action. ‘Give me a few pebbles of tapeworm infestation. I need them to be tinier than usual, even though they’re slow, I know, I’m aware of the time they’re in need of to grow, but I’ll handle it no matter what. It couldn’t be any better any longer. They’ll be here sooner or later.’ Another shady fellow spoke, exchanged and left out of sight. If everyone above was untrustworthy, they were the epitome of it here. ‘So, what’s there to do around here?’ ‘Just the same, go there, on that small land pile of drudge, see that house? It stands just high standing enough for you to lose yourself there before the sand waves comes.’ ‘Sand-wave, what sand-wave?’ ‘Young assassins, you didn’t know? We’re moving underneath the other operational base in the desert of Ahl’ Bhaaln. So seek some kind of protection while we’re at it, otherwise, you may get lost amongst the waves.’ It was thorough enough a message that they’d understand. The magus already took an effort to go into hiding before he could be drawn to it. ‘We have to make it to it in time, come on.’ Outside, there were just enough of the ones who return to make it in time for the harvest of the bodies. They brought them in piles, thousands of bodies which carried inside their pockets gold, jewels, red eyes, and even the sight of the golden touch, a pair of golden hands which rubbed on, giving them the temporary appearance of gold as they sparkled in the air. With each passing shimmer of dutiful golden particle, it had been revealed that they didn’t actually care much about what was going on there. They were inside, those hidden jewels which had been collected throughout their raids. In a particular assassination, there was Giovalta, who had come into the sight of high-lights. A pair of chains held the city above the outer rims of the grand garden before the Cathedral of Llay. It was by their sight that they couldn’t be anything but fooled by it. ‘I am going to care about something here. Don’t worry about it, I shall pay you thrice as much as I had the last time, just let me in.’ ‘Would that be a promise now? Because you crossed me too many times for me to forget, and see what they did to me?’ This poor sod was missing pieces of his irises, which had been removed and replaced by a whiter gaze belonging to some quiet torture. He had been placed on the torture table for too many hours to count. There, his body was whipped and hit by flaming glass which had been torn apart so he could get cut by it. And his skin had been drawn inside a bottle, as he had become skinless and forcefully dragged into a bath of salt. Afterwards, they threw some toxin into the bottle and by the time their strange chemical mixing ended, he had been given it back. ‘Ready to talk now? Say, where have you acquired these golden coins from? These were brought from the Andalusians. You lowly sod couldn't have obtained them without a theft or by, getting someone in.' 'My good master, no, I have done no such thing. I am a good servant, I have never, and I would never.' 'Silence! These coins speak for themselves now. Look what it happens when they enter into contact with fire.' The inquisitor of no remorse threw the coins and from their sprouted scornful shades of scorpion tails which who inside the metal cage in which the fire had been encapsulated. For a short time they tried escaping and moving with their insides revealed. Some pucker lay inside, pick, like a bunch of crisis crossed pink fleshy toes which flung themselves towards one another in a moist attempt of preservation. 'Not only a liar but in contract with the assassins? I see how it is. You must be one of their many agents, whom had snicked inside and appears to have thought him all too mighty to be caught. Bring the torture bell now.' 'I am not with them, I swear, I have been given these coins from someone in the market.' An inquisitive hand raised itself and made sign for him to stop. His red and gold rimmed overalls shook as he drew closer. His nasty snucker jolted as his dark moustache convulsed. 'Who gave them to you?' He had been dragged towards it and in a single swipe of a needle's play, as if he were caught in the play, he pointed at the man he had the vaguest idea that he may overact and save him. And as they made their way towards him, luck stroke him as one previous assassin stood upon one corner of the roof. After seeing what had happened, he prepared an arrow and pointed at the sod. It was a mere moment when he thought it through. Such an entry could've made it so he would be caught in the one open window in which he could try to make for an escape. Instead of it, he stood still. Those assassins never struck him as being even decently well in the head, but this one did. He wasn't short, he was thin and tall. He understood what was going on. And that's the only important manner which came, as the arrow flew through the merchant's head. 'Get down, now, there's a murderer amongst us. Look out, look out, he's somewhere near.' They looked at the wooden domed buildings but they were too wide spread for anyone to be seen. And it was a long distance from which he shot the arrow, enough that it could've recoiled to some interesting gaze. It glazed the small tent in which the merchant stood as it went through his head. 'It was a close thing but I think I owe it to your people, Giovalta. They got me into trouble and it was them who got me out of it. Now they think I'm trustworthy enough to care for them as they share some secrets with me. Don't take it too personal but I have noticed that lately you've been as cold and as pushed away from me as they all been then.' 'I was only trying to watch out for myself, that's all, nothing personal or anything, it's just that there's a mole and we're all being too paranoid about it.' 'Greetings, how many I be of service?' 'I am trying to get a nasty liquorish rum bottle that I may use to drown my sorrows before I end my life.' 'Good choice, sir, how much would that be though?' 'What? You're the one supposed to set the price, not I. What trickery is this? Am I supposed to give you the lowest price so I would be backstabbed?' 'How would that fair me, sir? You're already on your way to the one of your destinations. They say they will spread your body in halves, and then ask each half to go in a separate plane of torture.' 'No good end?' 'Not for us, good man, you're an assassin. I'm only being ironic here, as you'll suffer for an eternity, either here or there. But half of your mind will at least be lost so you'll only halve your problems as well. At least, let's hope one of your halves doesn't become childish, we wouldn't want a child to suffer such a fate now would be? Just in case, are you sure you wouldn't like to purchase a service? We could simply have someone bash the side of your head and everywhere around, just so you could forget most of your life events. That's the only considerate way, you know?' 'You cannot control me into doing that. I will not hurt myself.' 'Changed your mind then?' 'Very well, I will still take the rum, just give it to me and I'll do something with it. Just don't try scamming me out of it. I'll take what you say into consideration and be weary of my drinking habits.' 'Will you now?' 'No, I have decided I will slit my throat with the bottle. And as I bleed I'll shove it at the side of my head until there'll be no child of mine.' 'Great choice sir, here's your order. That'll be. You left.' 'An assassin, a thief and a dead end, of course I should've realized it. But pay no attention to it now, we'll make certain of what's going to happen next.' 'Here's the deal. Somewhere in this hiding den, there's a thief. I want to pay you to kill him before he kills himself. No word to the other assassins, but I want a return and interest to what he owes me.' 'What interest would that be? We don't deal with that thing here, scum merchant.' 'I'll give you a part of what you make.' 'And if I decide to keep everything to myself?' 'Then you'll have no booze, and you'll have to find out that you'll be dealing with the kind of bootlegger.' The very thought of it didn't fare well. Though this city, which had been rather well-protected behind the sanctuary of the Cathedral, it still had a tiny pocket where assassins met. Like some inner-branch, solitary from the nation. Yet they kept in contact and appeared to deflect themselves by mere signs of communication from time to time. Of the bootleggers, it was enough to know that they shoved fingers and nails inside their bottles. So either way he looked at it he would be screwed over. In reality, this liquor store wasn't any different than theirs, with the only exception being the obvious restriction of the materials which entered his merchandise. 'It's a deal then, but say, what does that fellow look like?' Tall, shady-skinned, large nosed, wearing glasses and a robe that either engulfs him in the shadows or hides the inner countenance of blue and white, or some kind of decently classed noble. He wasn't dumb, but there was this tiny thing which made him think. 'Oh no, I may have sent you too quick, haven't I? That son of a...' It was by that realization that the alcohol in his blood supply went to his very head. Disturbingly thought, he had looked at it as some kind of weird way through which he had been tricked. That damned assassin purchased a contract on himself, that quickly and efficiently. And much worse, over a bottle of rum. Only one thing could be done, just so they wouldn't find out and turn his reputation into a bleak remorse. 'Here's your pay, kill the assassin which had went rogue. He'll be buffed and heavy, almost green skinned from a skin condition and ugly faced as well. He has some scars on his face and other than that, I don't think he's well known.' 'Right, would that be all?' 'Yes, make it as quickly as possible.' 'Understood.' They shook on it, but he became paranoid already. His only good will-like advantage was the fact that only assassins came down there, which only made him more paranoid. What were those impulses which came onto him? 'Another contract, yes, he looks pale, thin, blond, quick and nimble, he must be slain before he makes a move on someone of importance which needs to be avoided.' 'Kill those birds, they might look, they won't be missed, those blue ones, they can have their memories pulled out from their heads, right, do it, do it quick and hide the evidence.' 'The two of you won't have a normal contract, instead of killing you will break as many stuff around and make as much of a chaos as you can.' 'Don't kill, cut around their knees, just laymen, they're dangerous, they're going to find out about our hiding place. I'll pay you in bottles and refills.' 'Kill dogs, cats, kill everything which moves but not people, around the mark where there's noise, just do it.' 'This one and this one and this one and...' He had to resupply. Before his rashness came to add up to anything of worth, he had realized it again. 'What have I done?' The city was filled with people and amongst them there were many killers, bruisers, thugs and hired hands which received contracts to do a lot of harm. He had even hired some of them to sell some bottles which tiny pieces of metal inside of them. 'What have I done?' By the light of the street, at the tips of their feet, it had become clear, at last that there was going to be trouble ahead. 'I must get into the right mood before I start cutting and battering my head.' The voice had been just loud enough to wake the cattle, the ox, the children who were napping away near the door and even the old ones who were able to walk no more. He looked around in his cabin. No one was there. This house had been in ruin for as long as he had not only moved in it but ever since he killed the old couple which used to live here. Both of them were old and lost. Now they were truly lost, without a chance of coming back. Their corpses had been hidden away with the help of trickery, no mistake should be drawn there. He over-did it as well. 'Aye, I've done some terrible thing that would put any other hand of the blade, or anyone from the Nation's stomachs inwards. Dangerous times lay ahead and sooner or later, I won't be able to help it if I'll be dead. Who shall sing my name? Some might say, who will remember me if I don't even have a family name? No descendants and what of my legacy?' Poor skill, mostly slobs, every now and then he would get some easy lord or noble which would be ruined by his incompetence. Instead of thinking of his failures, he had finally thought of what was right, the need of drawing farther away from the sight. 'I still remember the two of you. What I may have lacked in wits, and though I may have been sloppy, I made up in torture and butchery.' The pair of the old woman and the man had been cut in hundreds of thin slices which had been cleaned and hidden inside the floor boarding, beneath the frame of the walls, the drawers, the carpets, inside the hay stacks which they had. 'You know, I should've interrogated both of you.' 'Why haven't you?' He turned his gaze above at the one wooden bar which separated the view of the roof. I wasn't one to complain but this had been it, the chance to do it. 'My damn drunken mind must be at fault again, I've been clumsy haven't I?' 'Amongst other things, you were.' This other one was fully dressed had a cloyidian crossbow aimed at me. It had two living solidified crevice turners who shot their innards at one another creating a living mechanism which worked as a way of self-incarceration. It would jolt, aim and launch what seemed to be a twin-curved blade, which paled in comparison with what it had been coated in. 'That's the essence, isn't it? I can feel it even now, pure and unadulterated essence and you've fed it to the two of them.' Each of them had been allowed to keep a wing. They bore heads which looked like that of men, preferably the ones who may have created or given them life in the first place. Now it was obvious enough that there wasn't any moment for him to reconsider it. 'I wish I could see your face and spit on it. You won't have the satisfaction of knowing that I'll be dead, now while I still have.' 'Not a single move now.' That's it, just get into position, with a bit of luck you could pierce my heart and spare me of the essence. It was subtle, they had played well in this duel of theirs, that's what it had to be called. Otherwise, there might be a second chance of getting back at him. 'See me for what I am, won't you? I'm a sick person.' 'We all are, that's what got us into the trade, remember? There's no redemption for us. After you die, I'll release the hatch you've been working on for your secret escape and reveal the rats, which shall go ahead and eat your body.' 'Why are you telling me this now? I could've tried making an escape only to be eaten alive by them.' 'I'm giving you a chance that's all. Either way, you won't be able to lay a finger on me. So, hear me now, old and retired, you don't wear the attire which is of the proper use of the dead. If you don't make an effort now, you'll look mightily bad for a corpse, and you're not that uneven looking yourself. Let me be clear, you'll die, but I'm giving you a chance to do it by your own hand. Whether you want to suffer or to be quick about it, that'll be up to you. I'm only here to collect what's mine.' But what if it was a bluff? Was there even enough time for that secret passage to be discovered? What about the number of rats? It was unclear just how much of an influence was there and how much had been made up. 'Well, let's go ahead then and choose, shall we?' Another step and a hit against the wall, this was turning into a sting. A wager on the adjacent streets came, nearing his ears. 'There's something over there, look.' 'Look, that's the house we're supposed to enter before the sand storm comes. Who do you think lives there?' Only the two of them remained. A giant cartwheel which had been spikes, as well as the piece of the cart which accompanied it fell one of them. He died immediately, leaving not a single shimmer in the moonlight. They had one of those, but it was a giant moving iris which moves across the underside of the reverse valley which had been placed on top of them. It glew with blue, a light of yellow hue which shot just enough glances for them to see what was going on around them. 'Unexpectedly said, I wasn't expecting myself to actually come.' Said the Magus. He looked around to see whether or not he had been followed as well. It never hurt to worry about being seen or followed around those parts. 'Say, tiny fellows, do you mind if I follow you for a while? I can't seem to find myself in the company of some people around here and you look like a fun bunch, I'd say. Where have the others went?' Despite numerous attempts to look around, he could only come to a single conclusion. 'They're dead.' Floor was surprised at the tone he had displayed. It was likely that he had been shaken by it, but even if he had been merely shocked by the fact, it would've communicated to him a lot more about his character. But this was a spineless cutthroat, he needn't forget. 'It happens often around these parts. Honestly, I don't think this is going to be a great idea any longer. The two of us should look for a way to return, perhaps we could look for some shack or I could dig a hole for you to hide in.' 'No, I have set my mind on it already and I shall not leave. Look at me, I bear the marks of a murderer. I cannot and will not stray for my path no matter how many lives are taken in my name. Don't be reckless, and leave if you want to, but I shall be on my way. Whether or not I live is irrelevant to me.' 'Oh you poor soul, you don't understand, this isn't worth it.' 'I will descend through it and fill my dreadful heart with hope that I may crawl and crush and dedicate myself to some way of cutting, smashing and acquiring something of my own.' This little scour of tiny daggers had something in his mind. At least he aimed high enough that he would be looking for a way out. 'But wait, there could be some way for you to seriously fall under some torture or under the likes of being stricken by blows, flayed alive, munched or any other kind of proximity.' 'I will fight through it and see that I may never be killed.' 'Don't just go through it like that. At least let me accompany you to your grave. My shield burns deep, but I may be able to survive if any blow falls down upon.' 'May I have that shield?' 'No, you may not.' 'Is there some kind of restriction to it which prevents you from sharing it?' 'That is correct, it may be, by a blast that you'll get burned and I won't like that. It leaves a charred spot which can be tracked down back to me, which is something I cannot be forced to deal with.' 'Then you lead the way.' 'Not a chance, I'm not impermeable to damage, so I can still be afflicted by whichever malady may fall upon me from the poisonous arrows. Careful now!' The Magus pulled him over just before a bunch of barrels fell from the top of the building. Someone didn't have it in for them, especially for the one who was helping the young slither. He slipped on the knee of a man. 'Someone died here.' 'Here and just about everywhere you lay eyes upon.' The barrels rolled and managed to come over one of the bodies which rested underneath the grim side of the hill. It wasn't the right solution now but it'd have to do. Without the clear intervention, he would've ended up being just another dead man. 'Now, let's settle some basic rules just so we can be sure you won't die off the first moment you're on your own.' 'So you're not coming with me?' 'During my second reconsideration, I have decided that the best course of action would be that I should only escort you to the door.'What was behind it? He hadn't seen the Magus then, as he suddenly burst in flames and disappeared after the few steps which came over him.'I shall do my best to avenge my brothers and see who the master of this hold is.'He had been ungraciously on-set to kill and smash the lurker and beat him to a crisp or an inch of his life at least. Two words of the malign appeared and he fell on his face flat. Best attempts end up this way, in rounded circles, past the four rooms, the stairs leading to the above chamber where a secret had been guarded. Four, which was said, four complete recreations of supreme bodies stood there, encased in a medicated glass case which grew on them and held them captive. A piece of their lower body was missing, or most of it at a matter of fact. Only their arms stood strong and big bulked bodies, as they were recreations of the one which had given them the gift of rapid underground movement. The Curator would've been displeased by it, by these feeble attempts to recreate his body from various studies which had been kept in secret from common knowledge.'I have taken the name of the Curator, you see? I have decided to take it upon myself as my desire to draw in the knowledge he had attained to myself. But I had been disappointed by the studies and the notes which put him in the worst of lights. Oh, he had been dreadfully strong but he was no master. He was merely a watcher put in place who had stumbled on one of the secrets of the supreme design. And iron thing. With it, his masters found a way to perverse the form of the ones touched by objects imbued by the design, after coming into contact with the first insignificant being in its most unnatural state. For the Curator, it had been a sack of eggs. That alone had been a result of his failure to stand watch. During it, one spider managed to crawl on top of the ceiling and drop one of those magnificent things below.'Now that I think about it, we never found out what his name had been. A curious thing, I'd say. We should've pressed the lowlives which came into contact with him, but that would've been too much to ask out of them. We got only some pieces of their brains out of the extraction, and only one of them had survived for long enough to deliver the proper papers. Regardless of it. I've spent quite some time telling you this, if you don't mind, I do enjoy the occasional company, but most of them seem to be quiet for far too long.'The assassin hadn't noticed it but he didn't fall by chance. A small string of silver stood there, past his foot. His dance had been stopped and a tiny silver needle pierced his spine, leaving him adjacently paralyzed.'I'll ask for someone to come and keep you alive. Don't worry; it's only going to be by fluids. As long as you're not moving, you should be kept indefinitely alive, once your liquids are exchanged with it. Not much of a talker? That's because of the venom in the silver needle. It should wear off in a few hours, I think.'The Curator returned to his side-project. He left for too long and it happened again. Many of the prototype-like bodies were mistuned, de-aligned wore eyes and faces spread across their bodies which acted like some kind of pools in which giant heads swam, which looked mechanically abhorrent and felt likely to be hot to the touch.'What have I done now?'He questioned himself as the glass turned to iron and hid them from him. 'This will take hours at best, unless they decide to give it a rest and allow me to study them. Make sure you note this, my dead disciples.' 'Curator, will there be supper later?' 'Of course, of course, there's no need to be jovial yet. One of you will die later. I have seen in the future.' Out of the eighteen students, he looked bizarrely approachable. This younger robed, flat nose, stubby chunk who was the only one to have grabbed a piece of the leg-throne for his research, even his tablet on which he wrote was made out of the incest committed by the comers from Llobe. There was a cruel history of acts which shouldn't be discussed in any other place than private. He had been thought the ways of the arcane, through which he poured his very sight and eyes into reminiscing essences inside a few bottles. At times he'd share but none would dare ask why this had been so. It was just one of the few secrets which had been shared by the Curator, though he may have been only a servant, though he only served his purpose to a point, his knowledge still ended up being useful to them. No longer would it be possible to abuse their own ends until it had become possible again, to walk in the steps of a few defilers of eighteen paths of knowledge. 'Seven of them will be found at the lower levels. I want you to be here. Do not approach them, for I am weary of trying to protect you from the meddling approach of those vile buffoons. I will make it so we'll have trashed them until they will have reached the state where their lives may never resurface from their wicked pile.' 'But isn't the lower level dangerous for us?

Aren't we at risk of falling through and ending up in the same way as they had?' 'As a student you shall be stumped unless you heed my command and do as I say. Do not question me by any means. I know the path towards enlightenment and if I dare say you are to risk your pitiful lives down there, then you shall do as I please.' 'As you say grand teacher.' 'Your word is our command, master.' 'It shall breed inside your heeding command, your voice shall bring terror.' They spoke as they made their way, unable to control themselves from that maddening approach of vileness. It couldn't be questioned any longer, they were trying to force themselves to stop, in order to prevent this quest for life-yielding, from which they couldn't go back. It had been a lie. Where they ended up standing on was a round disk held by chains, which they fell upon, or had been thrown by force by their necromantic ruler. His disciples only stood there, being looked down upon as he refused to cater their need and as he ignored their pleas for any kind of redemption. No more daring, as they tried, they looked out there. It was just as it had been described, a few holes in the distance which lead towards the outside world. Some figures stood in their frames but it was ever so thorough and obvious that it wasn't meant to serve any purpose. They approached as if for supper, revealing the fact that those tiny holes were no holes at all, but mere results of a trick of the distance which tricked the sight. It would be uncommon to admit the fear, but this held no means for them to look for a way out. As they approached, giant hands grabbed one of the disciples, then another one, followed by a crunch and a jerk. Neither of them had been spared from the feeding hour. Undoubtedly called forth, he had been pleased to find out that the results were just as he had intended them to be. But that had only been one of the tame experiments. Some were too dreaded even for him, to the very point where he dared not look in any other manner of looking. The vileness couldn't have been believed. It was an inopportune talon which made it way through the top and made another hole through the floor. 'They become restless again, I can't believe just how much hunger so many of them could display. Sooner or later, they would have to be released again.' But there were no beasts down there, and he himself had little idea of the fact that the room itself had tricked him, oh, master of the arcane into believing that he had trapped the most horrendous of monstrosities. In reality, this plane and circular dwelling ended up into a prison with only a few chained starved brood-getters standing at opposite ends. Now they were the ones who were fed, with the remains of the disciples. Their bodies had been encompassed by their rabidly growing hair which was promoted by the cannibalism which was forced on them. Nails became sharper, eyes wider, their faces and skulls drew to more aerial shapes and it seemed as if their chains allowed just enough movement for them to raise and fight from time to time. And they were rough with one another, to a point, yet never had one of their own been killed and eaten. Only the weaklings from above which had been tricked and abused by the room. It had done a proper job, as it came to protecting its children. The sweat of the top of its rocks fell, keeping them sustained enough that they may suck the remains dry, keeping them alive. 'Another, another, need to take their red meat away, listen, brothers. Share their bones with me so I may make tools. We can escape.' 'Anything but this, I cannot stand the growing silence, I need noise.' 'Noise, noise, make noise before I stop enduring.' Each of them grabbed a piece of a rock and started bashing the walls and their chains, some used their metal whips over the lack of hindsight to make some dents and bring through some of the dead lookers. 'Now, bring forth the pile so I may work my due.' He leaped on the pile which had been made out of their saved bones and danced around them wildly forlorn, bringing some bier of wretch, using his hair finally to bring them close together and to make what would appear to be a ladder. 'We'll have to sacrifice as much as we can in order to make it over. I'll need more of your donations if we're going to make it through.' As they gathered, no longer caught in by the turmoil of their ends, he began the sermon. Their prayers would be attained in the form of work as they hands began rubbing and peeling around their scalps in order to get as many knots as possible. 'How many do we need?' 'As many as we can enough to fill the entire prison with them, for as high as we can rise until we reach the way out.' 'Our chains will still get in the way.' 'So be it, se that crack inside the wall there? We'll simply catch them between the sides and crush them as thoroughly as possible. It is worth at least an attempt of ours. Otherwise, we'll be caught here for crimes which we haven't even committed.' 'They are trying to force us to become rabid and pin us against one another.' 'They are, sure they are, why else would they throw that live food if not for us to start taking a liking to live-meat? And when they'll stop sending us morsels?' 'I suppose I won't have a chance but to gouge on you.' Without shame, that one had been, without no concern of his safety, he outed himself out. What a stranger. He was brooding now, clean. He lost most of his hair now, resting on his bent knees, squatting over a pool of blood which wasn't his. Some time ago he had acquired this blade of bone, or he fashioned himself one. Regardless of what it had been, there was a clear distinction between them. He wanted to cut as deeply as he could and not stop until he was the only one there. They couldn't concentrate on anything else other than the sharpness of his blade. When will he attack? How soon will it be? Neither of them noticed but he had almost eaten through his bindings. Most dangerous of hunter, he showed himself as he had been the worthy successor of the malign. I looked into his eyes and saw the living meat. They were inside his pupils, falling in, trying to grab onto anything they could just so they would not fall into that crater. Without a word to rest they had given themselves one good deal of pain. It had been almost ritualistic. Anything to distract him from trying to prey on them. While lifting one side of their bodies completely, including their arms and legs, they revealed a good side of their chests. They would scratch deeply until just enough fluid had been lost, enough to be obvious that they gave in to him. 'Abashura, Abashura, Abashura.' He yelled the name of scum, which he puked out. Whatever he had digested fell under the wicked name of Abashura, Abahura, food of the damned. As soon as he was done, they forced themselves to regurgitate their insides as a sign of their power, filling the scent of their prison with that of sulphur. The Curator had been made aware of the unsettling scent of scum which had come there. Without looking away, he turned from the melting prisons of those half-watchers and went on his way towards the sight. He saw the hole and felt the scent as soon as the odor assailed his senses. Something vaguely could be heard, which ended up being far more frightening than anything he had known before. 'If they're capable of speech, what else might be on their minds? Will I suffer their influence to spread?' He wondered just what would he be forced to do as soon as they were made aware of who the benefactor was. They would start demeaning of him so that he would bring the masses. Who would trust him afterwards? As soon as he would take one or two or twenty missing killers, how many of them would be sent to claim his life? It wasn't safe. 'Wait, wait, I can explain. My name is Nero. The two of you have no need to kill one another.' The man who had begun it all was met by another foe who found himself brushing past the door. He had his blade ready, prepared, unable to come in terms with his bloodthirst. It was confusing now, especially since he disregarded Nero and focused on the other one instead. 'Drop the knives, you won't be able to make it before my crossbow.' 'What of your target then? Will you allow him to escape in that case? I saw the type of crossbow you use, I know it takes a long time to reload. By the time you could load another arrow, I will have glazed both knees and one of your eyes.' Everyone dies in this scenario, not because he coated his knives as well, but because they were underneath a bed of dormant explosives. Nero didn't think this through. It was long planned before this, that if the man didn't call him as a target, he would have to drink himself down with poison, until they went off. He had never lost his charm and it only appeared that he came to be good enough to tie a rope and hide it in the floorboards. 'Can I say at least explain myself now? Look, I was planning to do this all along. I have this root I was meant to eat before going to sleep.' Both of the murderers looked at him triumphantly. But this had stopped being about him, as his assassin was another target. Just what kind of play was this? This big bear of a man, hairy by his chin, double slit around his anchor came nearer to me. 'Wait, this wasn't the deal.' No shot yet, but they were both carefully approached by a severe care. If only she were to drop of tiny pebble to distract them. His hideout was carefully surrounded. He was so empty, after so much drinking, he felt full but as swollen as one could count. They were still there. Trying to get out, the slices of his victims tried pulling out while they were distracted by one another and only he could fathom the guilt. It had become a dance from which neither one of them could actually escape. Two more murderers came in, one who leapt into the window frame and one who dropped from above the roof, gliding in with a few tiles underneath him. They took a few bits of the brunt gunpowder which lay in the explosives. Meat became well done. In a few moments, one of them would notice and strike for a smoke. One of them had to be a heavy smoker, the profession alone asked for it. Otherwise he would've doubted them as being murderers and more like. A stop beneath the spread of the great Cathedral came as soon as the chanting stopped. It had been spared of the great curse of being stolen and deposited beneath the depths, where its apostles and holy men would've found their end. By far, if there was anyone deserving of salvation, it would be them. Only a slither of an earth shake came, and that had been as short lived as they could spare themselves of the heathens who hid beneath rocks. Their songs continued and raised themselves in the might of the sun. As one beam came over and revealed a few bodies of the saints which rested on their chosen spots. For no assassin nor vile thing dared approach it from within. It was the right time for a funeral to be had, and there was one deserving of it who would not give in for the likes of ancient ritual nor foreboding approaches which would make one forget. Either they would be aware of it or they already forgot of the old couple stored there. They stood out now, like slices, ready to burst. By the time they realized they spent too much time at each other's throats, the target had already finished a few bottles he had on him, raising up one tiny blunder of a tinderbox. Before he laid the fire for one last throw, he started a riot which would end up in smoke. An arrow was shot, a spray of knives, poison thrown and a man charged into a wall. The entire house shook from its foundation by their runt alone, and before long they stopped, no one dead, not yet. Much more, the sheets of skin drew back in, still lit, whilst realizing that the thing which had stopped every single one of them was the apparition of the grey moths, which floated in their sacks, with little piety and no interest in anyone else but their own. 'What are you trying to do now?' 'I'm trying to crush your head against the wall, why won't you show a little less resistance and make my life easier?' But he had exposed himself, especially his back. It was dangerous, too much for his comfort to be attained. It saddened him, to think that he would go so soon. 'You've missed, you whore, I know who you are now, oh, If you survive, I'll make sure to make your live a living torment.' 'As if you would even get past me. No, you won't, once you realize that I hadn't been aiming for you.' 'It's too late for that, I expected you to spray the floor, that's why I brought this.' She took the opportunity to reload, the others waited, looking both ahead and above. This big burly man threw a bottle right on the spot where the arrow had landed. A puff emerged, revealing some kind of precious sedimentary gas which spread around in a more precarious manner. It had been rightly so that he boasted of it. 'An anti-toxin, this one should make sure that unless you aim directly for one of us, you'll.' Stop like she did then. A pair of many forged iron pricks may near her neck. They looked like stalactites for certain, in their most erupting of forms. It wasn't to be asked for yet. 'What? She's supposed to be my target.' 'Not anymore, and unless you haven't noticed it, both you and this fellow are supposed to be mine.' 'Come on already, gut pop off, come on, just take off and burn. Take light, he prayed, take light so I would not have to live through this debacle. Soon, more lower-classed killers came. As a matter of fact, they all looked more like thugs than the so-called murderers one should expect out of it. Shall I take my own life or wait? Just one way through and I could see an opening. It was so close to a way in, beneath the floor, under the house, and under the road where he had planted the entire explosive just in case. He wanted to be there, in order to witness the explosion in its prime. Out of this one there'd be no escape. No way out for him to get through the scent of ammonium which had scourged him. 'Obvious we can resolve this as adults. I think we've been setup by the damned liquor owner.' 'That bastard! Corncrop Agust, that runt will have to pay for his trickery.' 'Yes, turn your back and make sure you won't live through that. There's no need for everyone in this room to escape. After all, your lives are meaningless, they're worth nothing. Petty brawlers, drunkards and weak fighters, that's what you are. I've seen enough to judge that neither of you are worth living. I have set a vow to slit all of your throats.' 'I will kill you before you even lay hands on me.' But they turned towards the one window which gave them the only sight they needed be. Past the standing grit of the houses, far above the mountain range on which it stood placed, lay the church. And in the flare which came from the might of light, there sprang the church bells which looked down upon them. The house no longer stood in the light. It had turned as brim as it would by dark. Night had come, but there would be something in sight. One trained to kill, he was. Named after a house of lust. He had the appeal, the derangement of one who trashed and who'd crush his, his head. He started picking up an axe and opened it. Someone waited for him inside, someone who had lost his interest into trying to feign his own death. Now, as the assassin stumbled, this Obolov came to the standards and revealed the many skulls which came to see. Some served as symbols, many got crushed, but most importantly, they started spinning around him, drawing in the blood and brain particles until he couldn't stand any longer. A body had been formed in the most deranged way possible, giving in to the unfathomable idea that there was an innate way to which he wanted to eat himself in front of the new-comer. It was indescribable, the feeling of the repulse he had felt, the immediate connection being wretched, fading from the only meaningful aspiration which came to him. This wretch turned bone into bronze and as the heat came into the light he revealed the great defiled. Shoroth, of the grandee bronze-malevolence, who formed his statues, on the side, which served as weird gates for his fleeing numbed clubs. He had been strewn on by bronze-wrapping coats which held his numbed body from falling apart. A poison came into his lungs, iron, from the heaviness of the air. 'Detractor, why have you called me here? Can't you see that I can't breathe? I'm a mere stranger to your ways, know that I will fail in my efforts to hide from the other elemental lord who might call upon my heart of old.' To which, revealed, he pulled a giant living heart, in which he hid his many spoils. There were eight or ten kidnapped dark haired, dark eyed filthy, smelling wenches he had taken for himself. In their sweat, they basked and gave in to the fact that they were used for the satisfaction alone kept him alive. Something happened in-between his lips, which had been just as suddenly shown as soon as Obolov came in to see what had been part of it. 'May I take one for myself? You've hid into my brain after all.' 'Well, maybe just one, but know that they're nasty. If I ever considered taking one of these broads as my wife, I might've fallen to dread a long time ago, at that. But you may take one for your carnal pleasures. I've got nothing against it.' So it seemed that he considered simply taking her by the most vicious forms he saw in there. And quite a few of them were necessarily drawing onto him. He wanted to grab and never let go. But those were merely their bodies, as their faces were rather antagonizing repulsive. Their full lips formed into snarls, which was disturbing in itself, their paleness showed something happening there, but above the lip, that curled tip brought another disgusting thing to his mind. 'Were they always so repulsive?' 'But I haven't changed a thing, why, I've killed their husbands, who showed no fight and took them for my own. Though I must admit that they have repulsed me for the longest time, their voices were filled with some degenerate speech, but that was done for. As I have filled them entirely to the point of.' 'I do not want them. I think I've made my mind. They look as if they're too repulsive, too disgusting, please, take them away.' 'As you wish, but know that eventually my heart will break their bodies apart and they will die. Do you wish to take that risk and allow their executions to go on?' 'Do you not know in the head of whom you were residing?' He had considered inspecting who he was knotting about, this one was disturbingly squared off, dark, a stranger, a defiler, one who served as a mere distraction. 'I got no reason to keep you alive then.' With a snap, Obolov fell to his knees and died, in an instant. As that happened, he basked in lust and gave in to that. It was in his utmost clear desire to do it that he made himself be nervous, curling to the defiance. Obolov came back up, despite being given the ultimatum of death itself. He was stuck looking in both directions, trying to see where he had gone. It was a quick realization which put him on the right path, of course, he had been gone for a few days. To which no one bothered to pick up his body. Instead they abandoned him in the most repulsive manner. In that dump he found himself, a corner of the city where the hounds hid and came about to eat. He was the prey, the disturbed one who couldn't help but mend his wounds and lick himself as they began their dance of agonizing seclusion. Each hound took a piece of him and ran away to their hiding spots. They would stay there and drinking, unable to eat any longer. For, they didn't know that whatever they were eating ultimately lead to some growth which couldn't be stopped or delayed. Pieces of themselves grew inside their heads, giving them the heads up to freeing their souls from the bonds which held them on the ground. Stalks which were part houndish, flayed within the likes of the assassin, given a portion of Shoroth's mind as he came alive in them, even by little turned them into symbols of the malign. Afterwards they only flew from sight and came to be alive when it was needed. At the same time their hearts died, the mind of murder came, and they would slay again, regardless of what it took. During the night, it'd be perfection and only the mad would know where to take direction. Why not attack other murderers, the scoundrel and the scum? It was the only logical way to which one could contemplate. Tormenting gaze, one would have to be amazed, by the eight executioners who remained. While the others died, they reigned and cried their shallow voices damaged by the slaying, and beheading of Kryosies. For him to mend something close to his swollen bed, on which he shattered, the only trusting bond which mattered. A king, to his jester, the one who had cut him the most, inside the stand where they cut for the king, choppers, cutters, beheaders. In their wake of, they gathered a round sprout the bay where they needed to bring the cheater back to dust. He had achieved a little shout, to which he couldn't be heard at all. Beyond the rim of his neck, on a whim, there laid some little slit, at his throat, to which a blade of teeth rested within, trapped as a means of unrest. They were going to tear him apart, rip him as a part of the secret passing sound which came after he had been ripped apart, humiliated by the nature of the execution which was to come. 'I'll do it, my lords, I will give my life rightfully, even if it means being taken apart before the execution could even refrain itself from starting.' His pupils pale, that of the fish's sorrow, which were bound to look for no tomorrow, other than the dread and the defiance brought by the thought he had when met by his maker. He was quintessentially forgiven by the great marching white robes ghoulish figures in the sky. Their whitish crowns were unruly to the fact that they still found a satisfaction to looking down upon him again. 'You've betrayed a fellow king, we see.' 'Why should we judge thee worthy?' The gaze of the executioners blasted his surroundings, he couldn't force himself to stand. He couldn't force his change of a belief as the priest of Khitoly came. 'Repent all of your filthy heathenistic blasphemies.' 'Never, I will never give in.' 'Heathen, pagan, monster, know that you will be frozen cold and lay there in an empty casket, headless to watch as the shock snatched you back into awareness. Before the fire storms will swing and bring only the utmost pure conflagration.' 'Boring. Boring, boring, boring, boring, why won't you leave me to my kings?' 'There's only one king which was to be decided, that you would serve him with your presence undivided. Cruel thing, you are, snare of a mighty taken cretin, bringer of unmoving blades. Cheating scum, you scoundrel will suffer now.' With the blunt end of the axe, he shoved it in his arm, drawing away from a fantastic sight, of the purity of light. The day was still long, the crowd of peasants cheered as they would see another execution from within. A daring sight, the might of ropes, which only brought him, so much hope, that he would finally die as quickly as to be pardoned again. 'We won't forget thing, even if you are to be allowed to come into our kingdom, vile one. We saw so many acts of blunt violence that it is only for them that we decided to allow you entry, if all.' He knew that a sacrilege such as regicide would be permitted, one of cutting, or bashing, but not of poisoning. Cowardice such as the adulterous act had almost deeply jeopardized his entry into their wretched realm where the scoffs of clouds only gave them something to look forward as they marched towards it. A weapon came unnaturally so, to his mind, this act of infanticide he had been asked to commit was close to the utmost undecipherable things he had gone forth with. 'I am a trained killer, for the man. But I was asked to mask myself and come within reach of his son.' The assassination of the next prince in line had went sweetly and precise. But he had fallen in love with her, that of which he killed her son. Unaware of it, that was slim, but she'd been slaughtered just as well as him. Or might he escape? Might I be free? I wonder. This scoundrel had some tricks left, though for now he deflected of the deprave act he's had to deal with. His obsession of collecting heads, to which he'd wrap them around his blade, a mighty peculiar was of assassination came, not to mention as wildly regretful he had been, that he had wasted so much time within his desire of shock. 'That's Nicholas.' He spoke the words, and with a crackle, both of them faced, though one had a knife stricken just above the spot, where his hair had ended, brought to death, unable to be fed any longer by the required manner of specific blunder. No wonder that it might just be one who'd be faced with a choice to be. Out there in the wild, free from the sake of. 'Wake up, prisoner, you're being mesmerized again by dreams. We've been brought here to chop you apart.' 'In pieces, in pieces, he man means. I will rip your thorax and rip out your spine.' 'And if you don't die quickly from the first strikes, we'll make sure that you'll bleed slowly before giving in the final blow. You'll suffer for the wrongs, the death of the queen, or worse.' 'But I have spared her, I swear, that was not my act.' To which an apple came into his face, his mouth grasp as he watched it turned, a second mouth appearing inside of speak only of the ill. 'Now we'll die, joyfully alive, until brought to the sad conclusion, runt, you will suffer for as long as you might, defied and gotten rid off like some wild luggage, rummaging through bodies which may not suffice.' He looked in part, the peasants couldn't be told apart, he was been stricken from that head blow, ever so hard that he couldn't remember what it was like to be alive, in any case. A second chance would be too much to ask for, especially after using his one moment of freedom to spit in one of their faces. To be called in thought, the dread did not defile their curiosity, as if to know, how close he had been to the throne. Even now, while in danger, he fantasized of the wager he had to endure, with himself and everyone else. They cut him like a pig, while reminiscing, chopped and butchered. Now a piece of him lay here, one there, a few of them just about everywhere else. If one could pull just enough of them to fling them to their respective sides, he would know what he endured. Much worse, what he ought to endure on the stairway leading the veils of mist. The dark stationary metallic winged statues which delivered him to the entrance stopped. With the doors locked, there'd be no way out. Not for him, the pristine, a vile thing, from within. He looked and asked. 'Why is my body down here with me? It shouldn't be here.' 'You care now for a disabled body? What kind of man are you? What kind of slayer, killer, criminal, destroyer?' 'I'm not, it stops here. No more listing of the titles. I had it with you now. Call me what I am.' 'Very well, Deadman, that's what you are. Do you see how useless they have become?' All of his weapons, to which collections he could never even dare to admit, he had a few too many, all broken from the failed attempts. Too much force had been employed an agony from within. The thin reeds of the morbid could never have been given, strayed. A bitter end. He couldn't fashion himself a better blade, so he took the small head and looked at it again. 'Shrunken head, I knew it. I thought I misremember bearing a skull.' 'No, that wasn't it, if I recall correctly.' The broken body said, he found himself there, now it all made sense. 'Where is my love?' 'You mean her? Don't you remember? She had been taken away from you, I believe she shared the same fate, but, since the two of us are here and enough time has passed, I could share something with you now.' There was almost a grin on that face, before he saw it suddenly get cut out of nowhere into many more sheets of skin and of the insides. It was too fragmented for a voice to be heard, but he did well to cull it in his mind. 'The executioners were all members of the Enclave, indeed they were, brothers you'd call them if you just knew them enough. Some even recognized you, some even remembered the most important rule. Never submit and never betray the Enclave, as they might destroy you in your entirety if you were to speak again. And kill in their name despite no contract being called. This was your own fault and because of you, now I must burn.' 'Why? How did this happen? Were they instructed to chop and to incinerate what had been left of me?' 'Much worse than that, the two of you had been presented as a couple and hidden in house.'The memory was verdant, and it had been an utmost server malignant practice of trickery and deception, to carry a box with had two human beings cut in just thick enough slabs that they'd be unable to fit anywhere without falling apart. It was part of the contract, to make this an utmost exceptional trick. 'Let me tell you, the body reflects, it's like a foam filled with a solid memory which resists through the utmost harder ends.' 'Who arranged the assassination, there must be some dunce who might've spared some information or said a name.' 'Nothing about it, but if I may be pleased, I'll tell you again and again. That they had mistreated us so unlike a petty creature that we ought to turn around and simply haunt them.' But that would be pointless, for it knew just enough. Of the few moments in that lodge house, grand as it were, empty for the longest time. It lay like a decoy, placed in the city just to be mesmerized and taken for one in which a family lived. The deception had begun then, when the first two joints of the faction had been instructed not to kill but use their minds instead. 'Listen now and obey, we must plan for something better now, so do not make a mistake, Cjoldarr and Dunom, I have an utmost trust that you will be able to reconstruct these bodies now. Even if they're not perfect, I expect them to be stitched and made to look as natural as they can.' It didn't look like an easy task. As soon as the casket had been opened and pulled from the box, the stench also came out. One grand amount of fruits had been laid just about every spot inside of it, to the point where no one might've dared, if one were sane, to humbly attend to the reconstruction of the queen and her concubine. By now they understood what the stakes were, and just how hard it was going to be. 'Half a day, that's about as much as you'll be given. Don't disappoint me now or I shall make sure that your nest task will be to clean the remains of a decaying pin.' By which, they started, many inches departed as they started separating the two of them apart. 'Which one is his and which one is hers?' 'Does it matter that much? Both of them are dead, it shouldn't count what we do with them. But, Cjoldarr, would you mind it if I were to touch something here and there just for a few minutes?' 'No messing with the goods, perhaps after we're done showing him how great the reconstruction was, but until then, not.' The voice of the great Pt Pt Phelmark called. He had been a statue underneath one of the most distant hidden holds which lay inside that which could not even be conveyed by the words of the uncanny. In him there was still the need of fight. 'Do you expect me to believe you? I can't honestly say when was the last time you said anything which wasn't a lie.' 'Believe what you might but I can only say this, the truth is still out there, lost in a way you wouldn't possibly hope to understand.' One assassin by the name of the K'ther came into view. He came on a strange mare which had a carpet straddled by its hunching back. What had been prolonged on the sides? It was long and bore the marks of disintegrating eyes which had single shingle of a blade. It wasn't likely for him to try doing that. No question asked. There was one thing which had been. He had followed his need to draw on forward, meeting Le'benine, a warrior of Thy, cruiser and courier, wearer of the blade. At once he leaped, unable to contain himself, K'ther leaped and revealed from within his play the act which couldn't even be conveyed by there meekness of shoulders that couldn't hold his strength apart. Handing a few fingers on the ground turned the adjacent area into an empty cage-like set of bars which spread from his arm and continued going deeper into awe. The pipes which had been formed appeared to grow forth, until they had spread across his body, leaving hollow spots and bars of skin and bone in which he held his organs. Moreover, his fingers followed through, until they hadn't been anything to behold but his play of ground contortions. But what he had revealed, other than this sudden change in his body was the fact that the rest of his body turned into a lump. He had become a tree and stood there, slowly pushing an eternal furthering prison through which his organs kept piling into one of the distant corners underneath the ground. They webbed each other in their way to escape just so this assassin could weep further away. 'But what is this? Coward!' The warrior of Thy shouted as his blade only recoiled upon a fully destined blow against what he had done. It was impossible to quantify what went wrong. He wasn't strong; he wasn't going to appeal to anyone in the matter. It was only by mere chance that he had even come in terms with himself, the way he had been deceived only allowed him to recede into the last corners of the understanding, to which another warrior saw an entry. 'Entranced are you?' It was one terrible blow which followed and struck him in the back. He fell, almost, if it weren't for the entanglement he had come upon, he would've fallen dead. Claim my body, he thought. But he wouldn't give in; for he had hidden the illness he had drawn from touching the pipes. Slowly he felt his bone and fingers twist in that unparalleled illusion. A play for word, cowardly swords weren't meant to come to blows. He knew there'd be no chance. A dangling delight came into their fight, if only he could touch him, then he could become one of those accursed trees. It would be impossible. Crackling his teeth, he turned, hiding his arm underneath one of his most obvious forms, to which he couldn't even doubt himself any longer. Pushing on, he felt the pain. His chest was burning as the change began near his ribs. Unnaturally contorted, it only seemed that he could lose more than he had wagered for. 'I shall get you, fiend. You cowardly thing.' But where he expected a warrior, he had been met by a foul wretch. It was the same assassin, the murderer, who seemed to bear his body made of dirt. Underneath him there lay a slightly jerky sack which dragged itself beneath the ground, pushing forth bile as he began reconstructing himself on a different note. Part of his brain went out and shot into the ground, revealing that this creature made out of dirt had only been himself, and yet the progenitor. It could only slowly give birth to himself when needed. Otherwise, this mindless dirt construct would stand and dance, and wildly glance at them. Irredeemable glances only pounced as he willed. Strung by the heels, he pushed in a peerless glaze. No phrase could do justice to what he's done. In a moment he was there and then he was gone. Before my hand could touch in, so I could pay him with the same disease, he appeared to be done with the birth process, even if it had failed from within. 'You killed yourself by giving birth to a stillborn. What a joke you've been. A pitiful creature, irresolute and painlessly dumb, this is what you deserve-' His mouth twisted. Finally he had seen it act in action. It wasn't the disease, but the poison which had been carried along them. Decrepit and lost, he put his ear at the cost of hearing what happened underneath the mass of the tree. While his ear changed and had become a piece which wouldn't get away, he had finally heard the sounds of a feline. In its glory he had known what that meant. The warrior had lost his head. Thus ended another confrontation beneath the foes. And underneath the rims, a pocket full of earth seemed to have stored a good piece of half-a-brain and some organs which would come back again. Eight pipes joined for legs, and from on top came one digestive coil which brought it back to the nerves. It moved, and touched. To bitterly snatch and peer inside the dying refuge it had held, this time it was much closer to the rail system he held up so high above him and above the others. Terminally ill, this one had done an act which chilled even the warmest of conditions. Attrition would bring on the bile. And finally it had joined him, the head and the rest of the body which fell through the cracks as he could tell nothing else which needed to be heard any longer. A disposition could be much maintained, if one could even think clearly, as well as show his well-being to the being who watched. 'Stop there, you needle-cradle. I want to taste a piece of the brain, or I shall not be convinced that I had done my part.' 'Show yourself then.' Out of the ground bolder, came the slightly turn carapace which held the many numbed legless luger, this half-machine of many beings pushed on a body which was close to looking paramedical, yet squared. He hadn't any sharp angles, but appeared to bear a pair of fat bellies at each corner, which dragged on the sides, below his girth and through his giant leg-pushing torn-legs. Eight pairs of those legs were his, but the other which looked as if they had been tied to his mechanical spikes ones belonged to his victims. Each of his steps managed to bury them deeper inside the ground. And it would be invasive to ask him, especially since he appeared to push on a pair of green eyes which turned to blue and red and a bitter dead-cold which fashioned him sooner. 'Why are they talking? Legs aren't supposed to talk.' 'I'm pushing them back to life. With each step, their bodies almost turn back from the dead, screaming and acting as if they're being brought back. Yet they're returning back to their realms dissatisfied once they realize that nothing changes.' 'You're a deranged creature.' From one of its fat bellies there pushed a contortion which almost took the shape of a less-shaped talon. It did not belong to him. It was only one creature which had used him for travel. By the time he had completely got out, the rest of the many thoraxes which had been attached to it became apparent. Clustered and stuck together, they wore tibias which looked like widespread loins. It was obvious that many of them weren't even attached for a reason but they clustered in order to plant their seeds inside the great talon. And it spoke in an almost defining tone. 'Wear me and I shall make you the last one to see the future. We shall outbreed humanity and give live to a planetary-extinction reality defying beings that shall rive the likes of gods themselves.' 'I see that I do not have another choice but to do it. This will be my only chance to recover after having a piece of myself lost.' They joined together and started molding into a perfect being, under the gaze of the watcher. He had been likely to be set apart from the indistinguishable abominations which even drew close to banishing the likes of relatable immunity and a reality which paled in comparison to what ought to be given life to. A flawed creature emerged from their sudden unity. A talon emerged, filled in its entirety with a kind of fatness which could have only been brought by the sudden regurgitation and re-swallowing of dirt-encompassed organs. In a way they liquefied and pushed the scales the talon had, drawing in the pipes yet given them a life of their own. They grew like spear and seemed to have turned into a circle which encompassed it entirely.

Disciple of evil

One should be aware that it's never easy to kill a prey which is bound to kill you sooner or later. Do not stare in its eyes, or you may see the same reflection you can be sure you're seeing. It was an exaggeration, a method of trying to out anything even remotely right into this world. For example, look at them. Tiny people, they are not aware of the fact that they'll die. 'I am Sorko di' Dorko. I have witnessed the conclusion of my family life.' He was one of the first to bear witness of his heritage and bring forth the seed of evil into existence. Thought it was a mere possession over his soul, you should be made aware of its significance. Over the seaside, the line of di' Dorko has lived countless generations bending the lives of mere mortals over their abilities to directly affect their destinies. Beneath them and their likes lay a fortune unlike any other, spoils of blood diamonds, golden crucifixes, and the balls of a yak. The line started with its founder, Glaucoma di' Dorko who was visited one night by an eyeless man who was missing his lower jaw and who was wearing only his spatters on his feet, a cloak and a dangling. 'I have brought to you what you asked of me. Exactly twenty feet in the right condition and I've also managed to make sure they're all properly cut.' 'That's not what I asked of you and not here, meet my by the docks you foul old geezer, we don't do business in the open.' He turned, opened a piece of the street in half, and then went inside an empty plot of high Saturn fever. With every step, it seemed like a piece of his disappeared, but he could see the trail of multiple feet going down at one through multiple planetoid haste of the skin. It became a light orange and as it had, Di'Dorko saw the bodies of the killed women he had taken the feet from. 'You mad man, the deal was that you were supposed to kill no women.' It was vile, just how clean they were. As a matter of fact, they looked alive. 'And you're cheating me out of life as well. How dare you? Miscreant vile thing, you petty little poor sob!' The gap inside the street closed in and he had followed the old way. By taking the route en foot, he came to the docks and merged with one of the coming birds. It entered him from the side and appeared to carry eight different eggs which hatched inside his neck, head, toes, liver, both of his lungs and one of his hearts. Each of them bore a different hatch which couldn't have manifested entirely. Instead he bore the look of a half-bird which only came in the form of a hunchback behind him and a few claws which pushed through his body, covered by a flexible layer of skin. What came out of him now was a scent which would all so often manifested into a liquid beneath him which came out as sweat. It was highly concentrated. So much that it forced itself through the various appearing ivory nostrils which came from beneath him. Now Di'Dorko looked surprised, or he faked it well. He had expected himself to act up after being met by this sight. 'You placed them all in a row. Why? Do you not realize you'll draw too much attention to us?' The birds finally managed to get out of him as it continued flying over. It was something which flew over his head. People were working but no one paid enough attention. There was a cruiser planted just by them, to which they paid little to no attention whatsoever. It couldn't be accompanied by a second verse of the words he read on the paper he carried with him. 'I seem to recall these exchanged words. Bring me twenty feet and I will pay you in a bit of misguided clumsiness at the life of a man of your choosing.' The terms still rang in his head. A contract which defiled even his expectations. He pulled from his pocket a rink with a skull on it. He had his eyes on it for a long time before he had decided to treat himself and buy it. With a flicker of the tongue, he placed on his index finger. It looked like it was swelling. The old man was displeased with him ignoring him in a most disrespectful manner. 'Man's word is worth a lot on these parts, especially that of a Di'Dorko. Glaucoma, will you not do me the favor and repay me for my trouble?' 'I'll keep my word, if you tell me now, what.' He took another second to pull another one of his rings, this one had the symbol of a propagated fist being swallowed by a mouth in the shape of an eye. 'What are you intending to do with those living victims?' 'I shall devour each of them and grow with their help of their malignity.' 'May I watch?' 'Only after you will have paid me.' 'Who will it be?' 'Someone from the cruiser, I want him dead, but I am too frail and dumb-struck to do it on my own.' 'How about I take the feet, carry on this, then I shall make sure he won't draw another breathe from the same air for as long as we live in exchange for you showing me your intention.' 'It is a deal then.' He came closer and slowly took the feet to my face. In my young days I had been viril and unafraid of any act of vileness. My tongued came into contact with as many of them which in turn establish some degeneration of the spectacle their dance of solitude had been. They flew into the distance, forming wild circles which opened the ways for him to step. 'One of the Under-don beasts, it is for him alone that I have promised this side of Sicily. In it let him have his joy.' Obviously unquestioned by it, he had appeared to be somewhat drawn to look at how many legs it sprouted through. They weren't legs. 'Those aren't legs.' 'They are, but they're not solid. Their curse is one eternal woe of never being able to set their feet on the ground. I can see how it looks like. But do not worry, the fish should drink from the Under-don's state and push it in without daring to give in. If they won't grow and change, they'll at least, know, float on top of their basins for the fishermen to merely pick up from.' 'Why have you done this? You'll disturb everything.' 'It's none of my business to explain why or what for, now follow me.' They didn't exchange a single word as they approached the cruiser. It couldn't be questioned whether or not someone were to take initiative, he'd see. 'Death to Di'Dorko, death to the villain!' It was no simple man who bedraggled a hook towards him. But he didn't resist. He waited for the hook to be thoroughly planted in his shoulder as he stopped. 'Glaucoma, you're hurt, get away from him!' Fear, so this one was still human, despite everything he had done. It was the second time he showed some concern towards another being. 'I can feel no pain, now leave before I get annoyed.' The man simply went away and had never been seen. Mercy, considered a sign of weakness in any other case now went away. It was fascinating just how simply he could look away and show no shame. The old man simply couldn't believe his eyes, looking at the metal tip pushing through the shoulder blade. 'Aren't you going to pull that out?' 'Worry about yourself now and our deal. I think I'll deal with some pain.' It was easier to commence now, trodden through the plank which lead to the cruiser. At its top, there lay the fourth-squared head of the base which lead inside the cruiser. Inside of it therein had been greeted by grunts and by looks which couldn't be helped in any other way, but to push it out them. 'Not from around here, are you?' 'I need not be from here, I'm not a worker.' 'But with that thing inside of you, I think you are.' 'Have you not figured it out by now? Why I'm of the line of Di'Dorko. Need I explain more of it or shall I and my friend be granted passage?' 'Why should I? You're asking as if your name should mean something.' 'My family owns the docks.' 'And we own the Cruiser. How does that figure your full entry on our ship? It's not like you could find something to do around here.' 'Oh, but I think I'll see.' This man had been a man only to the eight thirds of his chest, from where he sprouted in a pendulum-like area where his limbs shot, his head bit torn and pushed through the second pair of legs and voricules which grayed out the plume-like look his skin had. It was obvious that his was a constant suffering. He turned then, pulled a piece of the wall, drawing it open like a door, entering his torture chamber. It was not a pleasant look. 'I am Captain Lleeyiathur.' Both of them heard his name and turned immediately drawing as far away from the sight. A weird design lay in that cruiser. A piece of it, which was reveal by the sudden entry looked as if it was been carved out of eight rooms which had only remained in part, broken yet still attached to the walls, the stairs which had been fragmented around them, and the pressure bulkhead. It was not that type of cruiser one might expect. An experimental sound barrier lay below, but it didn't block the sound. It trapped it inside small area which propelled it against various spins around the magnificent nests the sound-spatters created. They stood there bearing the perfect and simplest of pork-ears. Inside of them lay tiny half-spades which would hold at least twenty of the ears in a row. The sound-spatters stood tall, to nine feet of long, constantly pulled colorations of burnt skin. It was through that burnt skin they manifested, like some simple shapes which wrapped their skin around the spades, dancing with the macabre in front of their court of song. The captain had arrived just in time to hear their new tune. He would listen to the constants screams of the dying creatures which had stored inside their ears the sound of the last moments they were alive. And their coming into life as well as their half-spirits who haunted their newly formed self-originated descendants. Something they even tortured their younger selves to create even more of that postulant sound which made them so bitterly afraid of being there. It would be an act of life taking followed by another and another in a chain of killings which resulted in a perfect song which would be harvested by the song-spatters. Leeyiathur had taken this refuge to escape from reality and his responsibilities. He felt calm after hearing so many shouts going in his ears. Constantly, vulgarly, tainted, but it would feel normal after a few hours when he'd stop bleeding. This mere shout had a magnificent effect. It tore his entire body apart and reconstructed it at an immaterial level. The reason for that was the fact that, upon combining the multiple sound-waves of the same living creature which went through a few phases of its life-long agony, they would manage to get a control over the very fabric which contorted a being.

Combined with various others who suffered the same process and you'd get this instrument of woe. 'I should've invited them here. Now they'll cause problems and it will be me.' Red stricken at the lips is almost bit through them, growing bigger than usual. His rage made him grow and act rashly. It was that damned hook which made him was to follow in their trail and rip out his entire shoulder off. 'Do satisfy me now and I'll return your favor. I'll show you the means of bringing something to fruition. We'll break the masses in disgust, do you hear me? You will work with me at any pace.' The cruiser, which had been fully armed with contracted materials which had been attached to it by means of dome-intrusion. The various catacombs which stood near the reefs and the edges of the sea held in them lifting sea-storm manipulators made out of thousands of dead sea-stars which had been driven by necromancy to an unloving state of no denial. It could not be questioned yet, but this forlorn destruction was meant to be. They would conjure storms and tender to them, spinning them until they became soft and easy to touch. Long standing cranes would be brought in order to grab a hold of the clouds, which would be wrapped around the fluidly made matcher of petrified fire. In turn they would conduct the electricity which spread through them to a copulating self-devouring satellite which sent ingratiating sparks that forced those afflicted by its energy to take the peculiar shape of altars dedicated to the dead sea star maker. Those were placed near the sea inlain-plumeteers which looked like far-distanced shooters. Their cannons were long and appeared to be vaguely shaped to look like vengeance-drawn harpies of metal, which came in pairs of eight, holding the chained guns as a means of dissipation. It would've been anticipated that this cruiser was meant for a higher purpose. 'You're a lunatic for coming here, do you hear? What did I ask of you? Not to come here under any circumstance whatsoever. Look at yourself and what you've become. In your youth, you used to be a much nicer man, Glaucoma!' 'Fancy saying that when we're on a cruiser!' 'There is a time and a place for everything. We were not meant to be here at all. Can't you understand that we we're trying to defend the country?' 'I know that very well, that's why I'm here. Look, have I not prevented a mutiny just before come abridge? How come I haven't been decorated yet?' 'What game is this?' The sailor asked, with a musky smell, his flintlock to the holder, aimed at the man. He had at least one desire to aim it as his head and release the hold over it. But that was a crime. He would do no crime. It hadn't happened. 'Go then, and do what you must, everyone knows what you're here for.' He was the last man to be pointed at, right at the outer ridge of the large power house which had been attached to the welder. The welder wasn't pleased either. He saw this as a nuisance. He had no legs. It was flat beneath them, in case this had to be questioned. Air constantly got pulled from underneath them since he needed some way to breathe with the mask on. Uncontrollably asked for, he found himself tainted by knowledge. A fairer case would've been the fact that they couldn't face one another after being caught. 'We will have to split for now, old man. Go ahead and make yourself feel at home. Otherwise, you could look at me from the distance at how

I'll make the accident happen, or the circumstances which will inflict his sudden and shameful disappearance.' 'Dorko, don't make this painful on him, I don't want him to suffer. I don't like it when they suffer.' 'Those are kind words, I see that those women who had been taken by you have nothing to fear. I think you've most likely treated them as gently as possible as your chopped down their feet.' Silence. It was a young man, who was dressed in blue, with an old hat and a fake toned look on him. A somewhat older vibe had been given even though he was young, but it was something rude which couldn't be questioned there. 'Are you writing something interesting there?' 'Only an entry in my journal, I swear I had the most peculiar day.' I stood near him, laying just close enough so I could read what he was writing in his one sitting. The text didn't stretch for hours, this had been his first page. Blank and dirty, smudged over a splatter of ink. 'Well, I can't think of a good start.' 'Or a good end.' I added, somewhat caught in by the seaside. I've caused just enough destruction and a commotion as it was. He probably knew that it was me. It's always been me, this wasn't an exception or one of the circumstances it happened, but I had to tell him. 'I believe I'm an evil person and everything bad in this world happens because of me.' 'Why would you say that? Are you responsible for that dead bird which just fell?' 'No, I don't think I am.' 'Someone shot it down. How do you explain it then? You being the source of all evil, yet you haven't done that act of evil yourself.' 'Perhaps I've only lied to you, as a way to make your passing easier.' 'Are you death, perhaps?' 'Much worse than that, I was sent here to claim you in his name, yet I have found you to be too calm for that. For that reason I'm going to offer you another chance at redemption, one good deal which should help the both of us. I shall rip off a piece of your brain when no looker crosses and I shall put inside my chest to rest. You will live.' 'As a piece of splatter? I don't wish for that kind of existence, if you have to do it, do it then. I've come to realize that I've got no regrets in this life. My story is simple, my life was boring and lacking in action, I'm no one. That's what I am, the person who's done nothing. At least being killed by you might help me get on the news. I'll be accomplished at least, for a short period of time. Oh, how curious it could be, Angus Mcwhoolsworth, killed in the docks of Sicily.' 'Quite far from home, you seem. I'd say yours is a story to tell. Dear man, you're selling yourself too short of a deal, perhaps living would be in your best of interests.' He stood there for a moment, trying to rethink a single clue, a single idea which may work. It crackled and it dawned. 'Wait, dear morbid, stranger, I have lied, as my only sin. Would you believe me if I told you I'm the source of all good in this world? That I'm the progenitor of what do right and what ought to be done to save this planet from the stress of vileness which had been inflicted on it?' 'You lied to me once and you'd do it again. Will you simply get done with it and let me go? I'm seriously in need of some release of any kind. And I could never write either.' He could see inside of him that a piece of his spine split while leading to the head. His brain had been a few inches wider in the back as some form of a birth defect in which his sibling had been partially absorbed. Behind, on a second glance, he saw the old man's back and realized that he had been this young man's twin brother. Now it all made sense, to the very point where this sacrifice could be understood. He was weeping then, on a metal chair, looked down by the welder, who, behind the mask couldn't help himself but weep as well. It was dangerously serious, as they shared that moment of disturbed paraphernalia of sorrow. It had been intoxicating and morbidly capable of jumping from one of them to the other and none of them were pleased. 'I could grant you safe passage to one of those ships. I've got just enough that you may live a good life, find yourself a woman and make a few children of your own. You could have a story to tell your grandchildren. Does that not sound to you like a great deal?' 'Why are you trying to help me now? Is this some terrible trap you're setting me against? What will I suffer with each step I take towards that boat? Perhaps I may be struck by those sea-stars I see? Or will it sink and will I drown? Will they be looking for me in that case? Oh can't you feel that I'm so empty now? I've lived this life for nothing, forced to do something which never pleased me. I've forsaken my family for it. To be a sailor and see the world, that's what I thought. I would read about their stories in books without realizing how highly romanticized they were and only now I've come to regret my choice. The sea had always been weary of me and of my presence here, as it threw storms and never intended to give me more of what I had desired. I thought I could take her as my wife, but she would rock the cruiser and deny me any satisfaction during the night. Please, if you have a heart, do not allow me to live. My memories shall always haunt me, to the end of my days, which, if they were to be prolonged, I couldn't suffer such an existence. It would be cruel and I could not live. Why must I suffer this subconscious disease of the mind? I'm only human you know? I live then I die.' 'Then why don't you live to that point and die of natural causes? If I can avoid, as evil as I am, I shall. My reputation precedes me as evil man, for which I am known and judged, feared for no end. I have not taken upon myself the taking of lives with no reason behind them. It may be difficult for you to understand but I'm trying my best to control my impulses.' Which were trying to take over even then? He could see the petty little man as his desire rose to unfathomable levels of little consciousness and less malign effort. 'I will cut and lament with that. Let me see.' One of the crewmen saw an opportunity to turn the cruise and abandon everyone on the docks. Their lives depended on it being there for the time being, since it held their safety of return. It could no longer be asked for or trusted or seen. It was to be called into action. Two others decided their opportunity was about to come. 'Listen to me, this is the plan. We take two cuts of the wooden figure until she will start lamenting her songs. After that we can finally get along and rest.' She was mightily formed, like some pretty doll, waiting to be eaten from above her waist. Inside of her lay the remains of some interesting gaze which manifested through some arousing poison which got carried on by her tears. This wooden statue looked closely to a goddess, which they both worshipped, and came to be near. 'They tried to hide you away from us but I knew better. I've read the notes and I know that you can live and feel through all of your possible versions. Please indulge me into feeling your tears. I want to feel something myself but I cannot. Nasty captain, he took me to the sound-spatters, they took my ability to feel for things. Please, make me feel something.' The other man was silent, showing interest only to the fact that there was a common interest shared between the two of them. Her and hers alone was a pain they could bear through. One cut, one cut, two cuts, empty. No bark came out, none the better, never came to the shout. It felt pure, to the ears, not to sneer as they both coddled with her in that room filled with large stored frail spares. 'I will turn the ship, now you shall all be left, abandoned, acquired of no way to feed yourselves or the families at far.' To add an insult to the injury, the cruiser pushed forward, destroying the dock and crushing some of the workers. All of which were dead, by a case of little intention. But the cruiser never touched the sea afterwards. It released its lower half, raising itself not by flight but by sound. A second sound barrier appeared and enveloped the cruiser, bringing it to the sound-spatter's sides. There. It was there was no water existed. It turned into a time-bomb boarded on the desire to drink. And what had been the worst case remained the fact that they had been pulled inside the burnt skin. It thinned with some agony and some little vile consideration. Damnation would sooner or later return and come into being. 'What is this now? You've taken me to this realm of brown skies and dark lands for me to suffer as well? Though, I might say.' The young suddenly stood straight, while dropping his peculiar journal. It reconciled itself with some interest which never passed. It obeyed no wonder which drew him to the peculiar desire of curiosity a man in his youth alone may ever know and be aware of. He wanted so desperately to explore. That was the time to act. He came from behind his hand and shortly pushed his fingers through it, cutting one finger. 'What did you do that for?' 'I wanted to test something. Did you feel any pain?' 'You defiled me.' 'I'll take that as a yes.' But the side effect of the finger drawing had been immediate. No stump had been formed and from his insides, the bad air came through the hole, thickening the hardness of the repulsion. He had been drawn to the presence in the bottom of the inverted lake above them. It appeared only for a short moment, after the cut had been made, waiting for him to be pulled in before disappearing completely. 'Marvelous, Glaucoma, you're a man of your word, I wasn't expecting you to have this much of a reach. You erased him from existence, I swear you did, how did you manage to do it?' 'This, yes, this was as I planned, look into my eyes.' That tanned leathery face came closer and almost gave him the impression that everything which went over his head and face disappeared under an appearing wall which covered everything in dark, just enough for his words to be outlined by glowing transcripts which came out of the thin air. 'Listen now, don't tell anyone what you saw here, now that I completed my end of the bargain, I can only expect you to complete your end, after we found a way out. Make no mistake, this thing isn't of my doing and I think there's something seriously disturbed going on.' 'Who dare beset us?' A few of the crewmen, the guests and whoever else was around made it to the looking point, staring down to see those peculiar faces who desperately tried staring up at them. It was the sound-spatter, armored in their screamers of metal, many mouthed but facially aware of their similarities to gargoyles, they bore their long spears which bore a magnitude of ears to them. It was pious to no end, until it couldn't have been considered right, how much suffering they had inflicted on those things. Now it made sense. 'That must be how they. Right. Perhaps this may be come in handy there. Old man, how about we take a leap of faith and see what happens?' There wasn't much down there, over the deep red almost Mars-like ground, other than its orange-skies, which was deep enough to be almost gray and dark trees in the distance. They were puerile, in the way they had attempted to fight. It wasn't threatening any longer, as soon as they realized that the weapons were fully operational. One strike of lightning from above, which had brought the harvest of some dark clouds and they spread like rabbits on a hunt. An insight into this idea came to be, this wasn't going to be right. 'I need you to trust me, old geezer, who are you?' 'My name is Cechkilih Dilzier.' 'So, Cech, I will cut one of your finger and then I will cut one of mine. We'll see each other on that other side, right?' 'I'll do my best to keep everything in check. But if we die in the same manner as he had? In that case, I suppose I would deserve it, wouldn't I?' 'You would, most likely, say. We're here mostly because of you I think.' 'Then why are you hesitating? Go ahead, and take it off.' I had, with a quick sputter of blood, which made me quicken my pace. Then as he was drawn, like a caricature himself, of some mainly dissipating gravitational stretch, I followed. Death wasn't there and it only looked much worse there. Death would've been preferable to this. A bold blue armored holder of realm came. It looked rather flattened and distant, and he held thousands of chains in his hand, all of which were attached to many captured limbless, fingerless, toeless creature, being, and even some crewman who had pricked himself there. 'Oh, so you are the one who's responsible for their torment.' 'I am the one who judges what the worth of their bodies is so they may come forth towards rebirth. I have judged many and my watch shall never end. Have you come to tattle on something, or are you ready to receive another identity and a life?' 'Why should I? I would lose my name, my identity and what makes me a man.' 'I see that. You're a human, I say that with an unfortunate feel. You've been through a lot I see and you're not from around the coming of to be.' 'What would that be?' 'It is by this journey in which they mature, regardless of what kind of creature, tormenter or disabler he may have been in his previous life that he may attain a new one or stand here chained until he will submerge and become one of the many reverse dark symbols in the other existence. Knowing that they could never surpass their impulses and their evil needs, they will give in to terror and may be allowed to punish those weaker than them who are beneath their entities. Many infants would be shattered, many races which wouldn't deserve it would be enslaved, and their reign over the land would end as they themselves would fall victim to their own poison. Eventually they would destroy one another only to be brought back here in their original forms.' 'What does it look like down there?' 'A sight of normal, untouched nature, beauty, unity, purity, call it what you need, mountains, skies, glacial walls and water holes, everything which came before the advent of any kind of possible destruction. Now, see, that you listen well. As they submerge, they give in to their true selves, which resign inside every single one of us who have not fought and chained our presences. Some of us were cursed to lay here as watchers of jailors, others are responsible for bringing in those who deserve it. He came closer and only for a moment, he pricked his helmet off. There was nothing in it. As for the second touch, he pricked another piece of the form of his head, going as deeply as to venture a few inches into that invisible shape. 'I see that you're full of yourself, I can feel the rubber stretching as I poke in it' 'Crush as you may but know that none of it is real. No harm may come unto me for as long as I'm here, the curse makes it so you may one grasp as a piece of what used be there.' 'So you used to be one of us.' 'A cruel example of what humanity had to offer. I was a drunk and I have taken women for myself and for the other drunks with whom I stumbled on the streets.' 'And for that you're punished?' 'No, what I've seen before far surpasses my every sin. This is the punishment for having stumbled onto knowledge as a dumb fool who couldn't keep it in for one night. For that alone I am here and I will be here forever, until times stop, and no longer will there be souls to come.' 'What did you see?' 'Accept my chains and you may be on your way. Or leap in my armor and see what I've lived through, but know that you may give in and take the curse upon yourself, from where they may be no return.' 'And what of you? Will you simply disappear when I enter you?' 'This act of yours will split this realm in two, one for me and of for...sharing.' 'But you will also be with me.' 'Cursed to look over but never in control, you are not the first one to take this curse upon him either, Di'Dorko.' 'Were there others?' 'Too many to count, why do you think one would have to sink so low as to be given birth into another world? They are all sent to one of the realms, to govern over.' 'And that one where the symbols of hatred may rise and destroy themselves?' 'Only another realm ruled by one like you. I think I am one of the same cursed people who's looked over the by the chains. It is them, not the armor who rule over everyone. Deep through the many levels of malign creation, this tool of his has taken many forms, either a weapon, or a dead husk in which one may sink, a piece of armor, or some primitive stone-sculpture one may have to worship to join. During my youth, I have been a soldier, henceforth I had been given an armor to cover my nakedness. But I see now that my worth is fading and so is my shield disintegrating.’ ‘And if there’s no replacement?’ ‘There will always be the chains, they always are. As long as there are souls to be trapped, nothing will have changed. I shall give you a bit of what I see.’ He closed in and appeared to stretch one finger which had been pushed in the temple. It felt as if the entire world had been inverted, occupied by the smallest moving particles of swimming lacerations. They were cutting pieces of that inhabitation morose drowned taint. The fact that he could see his bones was frightening in itself, especially all of those who belonged to the others, being slowly dragged beneath dirt. He saw him. Now, with no armor, as a frail sage, man with no title, cursed to lay there for as long as he would last. It was his opportunity, which only forced him to do whatever he had to do in order to return to normality. He came upon those frail two shoulders and gently pressed down. It wasn’t a murder, but a gentle tap which forced him to lie as low as he could, done out of a mere hint that he may know what he is doing. As soon as he had been placed into the right position, he pushed him down in the same manner he would place all of the other. But it was not enough, he wanted to hurt him. It had to be at least attempted. This sage had done too much damage to be forgiven, his of all would deserve to lose his life, if anyone. ‘A soldier who became a sage, tell me this, If I decide to spare your life now. Why should your life be worth much more than theirs?’ ‘It isn’t. Push me down and I’ll return, slay me and, and...’ ‘I won’t take your place if I curm your life, will I? A liar as well.’ It wasn’t worth it any longer, he found no reason to keep him alive, other than the constant relief and wonder of whom may hold the chains. ‘Let them get a free reign then, without me, they will simply vanish and every single soul which had ever entered any of the planes will be lost. I cannot claim to know what will happen afterwards, I only know that it’s far too dangerous.’ ‘Then I must take it upon myself to release them. Whatever they might do with themselves afterwards is their concern and theirs alone.’ ‘You do not know what you are doing.’ He couldn’t overpower Di’Dorko, it was his decision alone now. But his dime had come a long time ago, when the other soldiers came. He saw them in the distance, even now, approaching in their blue overalls. They were trying to take him back, as their army had been incomplete. What wars would be fought with them? Why could he escape his fate like some of the chained souls had? ‘I admit it, Glaucoma, I only came here by accident. I’m runt, a deserter, that’s what I am. Perhaps that’s why I was forced to keep watch over them, perhaps I saw the other soldiers in them. I couldn’t let go.’ ‘And that’s the reason they can’t sink in, it’s because you’re pulling them back up.’ ‘Believe me, I only had the best intentions in mind. I was supposed to join them, and we would re-enact the fights together.’ ‘And those people with their symbols?’ ‘Dead civilians, nothing more, I was wrought in the flame of war, made to be that way. In our conquest, we became an unstoppable force of virtue which held no life in contempt with our own. We only know death then.’ But then I deserted, for I knew I was meant for something better. An urge overcame the frailness which had kept him down. From inside of him raised a blanket of smoke-silk which took the man out of his quick ascent. He was looked at the same man whose body had become ever frailer, like that of a skeleton who wore rags. A feeble skin had not only surrounded him but gave the impression that it was nearing its shallow end. This ghastly thing feared, trembled, not at his sight but at the things which were coming for him. He was aware of them now. ‘The soldiers, they’re after you, even here. I wouldn’t have believed you if they haven’t appeared in sight and bone.’ ‘They do not have the same appearance underneath their armors as we do. No longer are they set on the idea of decency and honor. Both of us will be stamped out now. I hope your digging has been worth it so far. Without another soul to chain, they will get me, and there won’t be any escape for you either.’ ‘Which brings me back to my original plan, I could so easily snap your throat.’ ‘And that won’t change a thing. Their rage consumed them, they’re empty inside. I see them, even from the distance, empty helmets, and no bodies. Even their armors move not as reanimations but merely of a compulsion to ever-presently chase me like switched of memories, after-images which switch one-between the other. If you would so quietly look at them you’d have observed it.’ How they switched bodies, almost, to similar soldiers as them, each appearing in the mark of a half-a step before disappearing. Either they would be trampled by them or they would wake up with those bodies being inside of them.

In that case, there’d be nothing to fight for, nothing to face, only the inevitable defeat which scourged both of them. ‘Then allow me to return to where I came from with the old man who accompanied me. Forget the crew and everyone else, just the two of us and I shall find a way to send you more sacrifices to keep them at bay.’ ‘A promise and a deal?’ ‘From what you have observed, have I not kept my promises yet? It was a bargain which brought me here and one which should allow me the freedom I deserve. What of it then?’ ‘It’s a dangerous trade, but I confess that I’m rather curious to see whether or not you’d keep your end of the bargain. If you do a slither of honor and keep it so, then so be it, I shall grant you return.’ To which a return motion had been asked for. A wave of bodies had been raised from a hole which fell on him, drowning him momentarily as the release was called. There he dissappeared, seemingly thrown on the wooden rims of the dock he had once left. Next to him laid the old man, brothels and with an unmet desire for fruitful touches. He wanted to see, oh, how much he had desire to dwell beneath the rims of the opening in the ground he promised to show him. ‘A deal’s a deal, is it not? I believe I held my end of the bargain. It’s time that you keep yours.’ ‘I don’t know if that’s what I want anymore Glaucoma, I’ve seen some things there, beneath the reef which shook me off. What i’ve done to him, what I’ve asked of you is unforgivable.’ ‘Yet you feel no remorse for all of those poor women you’ve taken.’ He was likely to show it now, but that had been as show for another time. It was highly irrelevant since the old man, Equor, would be in the family’s service in the present form. Underneath the statue, in the rim of the stairs where they hid the plunder, as time went on, he had been give his tiny slouch to dwell in. It was messy, but he didn’t complain. There was just enough space there for him to collect. It had become more than a study for him. What he’d take would soon enough bite a good piece. If there was one vivid memory he felt like conveying, it was the leaping man who had taken a liking to living nearside him. He was one of the worst lots, who refused to even take a liking in the feet he had collected. Despite them being fashioned with plenty of metal wires, in various traps lain on around his den, he was proposing to himself a quick change of pace. By the time his crooked limbs came to his face, he drew two lines on each side, promising never to cause problems again. ‘I am Crooked. Smoked, Locked, and I have some to take your gander.’ His moves were highly hypnotic, before the time could come in which he’d realize that he was destined to be caught in the fight for wonder and to plunder for some frail crumbs of bread, he came to befriend him. This spiked haired, almost hard-looking muzzled came to his senses and dropped a fourth step beneath his knee. It was fashionably caught by his gaze, the maze which couldn’t have been there appeared in front of them, as a form of self-peculiarity, the calamity of being dead. ‘Have I died yet?’ ‘Indeed you have, old man, indeed you have. You’ve come to witness the end of the line of Di’Dorko, to have witnessed and documented all of their wrong-doings and every single redemption and now that you’ve accompanied them all to their deaths, your time had rightfully come. Hurry up now, I think your brother’s waiting for you. And he’s being nastily annoying, like the usual scoff and the usual word-play which would annoy even the most tendon-filled waiter, with the mead in his lap.'The old man stood there like a fetus, shaking. It wasn't supposed to be this way, as he had his greatest desire to live forever or close to it. Alone, it felt lonely, so much more than he'd expected. 'Don't be sad, I'm here, for you, there's no need for you to feel any negative emotion any longer. As soon as you'll meet him again, I'm sure you will know what to say. Is that why you're standing down there? Perhaps it's the maze? I'll lower it down and turn this only it a walk. Come on, you won't see him until we'll have reached him.' 'I do not know what to say to him. I took his future and his life. You don't know how cruel I've been to him and everyone else. No one believes me when I tell them that I do feel something for every time I've harmed or cheated or stolen or asked for his life to be taken. But no one wants to trust me any longer.' A liar and a cheat, brought down beneath the leaper's feet. It wasn't a question any longer. He had to get up. 'Come on now, I told you, there's only one alternative to the wait. You'll shrink and rot and you will have become a soiled spot on the ground.' On the ground, in the mound, in the saddened renowned crown inside the leaper's head. The leaper's eyes had been completely enveloped into the static, looking through a filter which punched tiny bloated holes through them. He could see the words coming around, as if the message was being told to him, or the instructions of what was to be done with the old man. What had been asked of him was highly unnerving and disturbed, with each step resulting into him trying to crawl inside the body, picking up the rips, and pulling the real core of his prior encounter. Whatever came to his life now gave in to that sudden grow. It was only now that he had bought enough time, before the leaper could pull the core above his lungs out. His throat suckled in as he opened the way beneath him, into that pocket of feet, where they dragged beneath the sudden barrier which prevented him from following. 'But the feet were supposed to be out there, trailed on a bunch of metal strings.' 'An old, trick, you veiled murderer, I will not die today.' He broke his promise to Di'Dorko for a good cause at that. Whatever made him feel as made now went over his head and back around where it was needed. Such a cause could only force him to relapse as he had basked in them and began growing. As the growth had commenced, this was the frail vision he could never see again. They grew back their upper limbs, pushing the muscle to join his body. As they lumped in, he felt a clarity which drew in. His senses were morbidly spiked by such a surge of the mad that his hair grew on the back, turning into chrome, melting through the snow-like surroundings. It felt like what came out of it appeared to be a twenty fêted arachnid which began moving its head through its torso, being no longer confined by anything else. By the time they had arrived, his brother and the true leaper, not the fake image which had tried assaulting it, only this scene had been witnessed. 'I shall never be killed, I shall not be imprisoned and I shall live for as long as the line of Di'Dorko lives.' The statement had been bizarre, they were all supposed to have died. A fight had been ensued as the false leaper came with a blade and with snare, he fell down, caught between the feet, which looked less hairless than they would've been if he hadn't taken them. Inside each of them, without a single exception, there had been some way to know and to feed into the salutatory glands which came in. He was draining him alive, eating, sucking from his throat, before being done with him. A crackling of the spine emerged before he'd be abandoned. A cruel nature, crueler a woe. He had been crushed beneath the soles of his endeavor, to kill that which wasn't whole. The flying tomb came, and from inside of it, four gates opened from its sides, releasing forth a few Llohnirs which joined him now. It was an incision of the most obscure size, which had been suffered by each one of them as they came back to life. It was a sort eulogy, that of which they gave themselves before coming to present them in an astonishing manner which begged for some malady to be brought back to them. In a quick pace, their daces united all of them together in some kind of leash-like embodiment of their kin. Their ankles snapper, their teeth enlarged, skin became as coal, maddeningly shooting a few gusts of musk. Inside of them they started digging their way out. These horses of Pyaath, who came forth, all at once, eight in number, tied together as their backs. Some giant sting like that of an amorphous malnourished deep-sea anomaly appeared to haunt the sight of the horses, which shot in their every direction as many horse-heads as they could. It stopped immediately, this process of refinement which forced their mouth to drawn inwardly and begin eating from their chests. 'I must feed my young, what must I do to call him my father? Oh, why, he abandoned me before I could show him how beautiful they are.' As soon as a piece of his chest had been ripped, a few many-horse-headed atrocious-looking creatures appeared as bluntly as they could, being there, in more way than another, to be phasing out of existence. 'Heed my complaint, the father has not brought them any sustenance so they may be anchored to this world. Without it, I will have to watch them die. Look at the other heads and hear them out. They laugh at me because they know I'm forced to suffer because of it. It's agonizing because it's their son as well. They do not care for me.' 'And you did not care for me either. When half of my face decayed, you didn't care at all. For no reason, no excuse either, you pushed me out of your side and switched out throats to distance yourself as far away from me as possible.' 'I have not, I have not, I have not. Pity you will never have a child, you sterile blunted body.' 'But I could, I had, but you switched my body and drew it apart.' 'Enough, my dear mere, here he comes, our rider, the old man.' Who leaped on their back and strode as far as they could from sight, before his brother and the leaper could catch onto them and force him to explain. What happened to Di'Dorko? Glaucoma appeared to have paid the muse, the woman of his dreams being in his chateau. It was a feeling of supreme satisfaction, to look upon the glass dome which surrounded everything around eight quarters of his home. There, the eighteen statues of weeping angels and the twenty eight statues of creeping vile demons almost came to life. Soon they would battle in his dreams and offer him a sight, for the enlightening hope that he might survive the evilness which had been sinking in his shoulder. Even now he could feel it moaning, pushing through, and sinking deeper to the point where the pain had swollen the area. 'Why have you not taken that out, my love?' Alizee, sweet and grand, glad to be alive in the most deceitful way a woman could appear. Her face was painted, he almost fainted, not from her but the sights of evil which had been given by the hook. He saw the world for what it had been worth and decided he would not dare himself any longer, to stride out from the way. Remind yourself, Glaucoma, you've made a pact to summon one of the mighty defilers into your world. You were not good before the hook came forth. His consciousness spoke, and he became onset on how many people had died because he had been there, on that cruiser, just some nights ago. The Captain lay in some place, drinking with some crewmen, forced to abide and hide from the ear hunters. Out of everyone, there were still those which had their way with the perfect sculpture, the goddess which would never escape from her torment either. And Glaucoma had never even known about them at all. He left them that way, abandoned to deal with their own problems as he forced himself on her. 'Alizee, my precious Alizee, I want you now never to leave me. I shall have you and you'll be mine. Never mind that we'll be together until the time comes when I will succumb to the evil inside of me. But I must have a son, a descendant.' 'I shall give him to you then, worry not. My love, you will bring me some joy, the kind of ploy which will be forever doubted by them.' Who appeared to be staring from the distance. Other rulers, pullers of many axes in their plays for dyes. Every time they hurt themselves, chopping and slicing their veins, they would release a different color into the sea. This was the third sign of the awakening. 'I feel it, I believe I am the one responsible for it. If it were not up to me, there would be good into this world.' 'Do you always have to be so dramatic? You're exaggerating again.' 'But I'm not, I feel as if I'm the source of evil.' He was not it, but closer than he could've ever pointed it out himself. In some bizarre way, the source of evil had visited him, the essence fed him and turned him into what he ought to become. In some way, it felt like that had been the right thing, that inside the world there was something akin to the layer of an onion, which poured inside of him only the nearest essence of wrong-doing. He could glimpse into the future and see the wretched scum which would only be his near-descendant. An evil lord, he was, next in the line of Gordo Di'Dorko. Called in the name of the slayer of sea-shells, he craved for a life in which he would never have to live in the shadow of Glaucoma. Blinded by his rage and his magnificent opium addiction, he made himself a house of shells, near the drift of water, at the very near sight of a fragment of water pouring valves. The world had changed a lot if a generation, with the appearance of a dark curtained-wall which separated half of the Earth in half. 'Look at them, they've destroyed our beautiful paradise. They must pay for it.' 'How might we stand a chance against them now? Look out there, they're remembering what's wrong and despite it they keep bringing them around.' Beasts were set free rein, from the worlds in which they didn't bother to behave. Some claustrophobic trappers came, with their weaving thin, invisible flat wings. Without them, they merely looked like some kind of atmospheric parasites which drew some air into their smoldering rock-like bodies. Tormented by the fact that their wings constantly put pressure inside their insides, they would stop in crowds of men and trap them. Now, such a case as in the city of Ghyrob, they stacked a few members of the most veritable races which were grouped together in a fight and as they came to it, they revealed that at bottom they kept only the most disturbingly-looking tools of pain infliction, an addiction which would force the citizens to start abandoning their resin-like skin, leaving behind what made them what they are. In the fraction of the seizure which emerged upon meeting themselves at their lowest, they release a livid fear on which the trappers fed. A disturbing addition started filling this tiny cage. The reason being that they began growing inside, at an indefinable rate which never bothered to make it so either of them would be alive by the time they'd grow. It was near the eight-growth that the realization came, these beings had no calamity to themselves, and they would outgrow their wings and become giant dark blocks in cities populated by millions of vile deceivers. The organ of Clomethia, which appeared to produce a special type of liquid noxious insulin, started making the first whiffs of content with the air. A failed absorption lead to the infestation of everyone around, whom, in turn, appeared to be grounded to dead beetles which emerged from the ground. The beetles were only a side effect of the driving force which turned the good people of Ghyrob into desensitized devious creodonts who shared nothing but a deep hate for one another and madness like no other. 'What's going on here? I was stabbed.' 'I was robbed, look into my eyes and know that I am no longer a man but a plume which sinks below the fumes.' He shoved and rammed the emerging foes inside his many nostril ports, until he had seen him. Gordo had arrived, tall and lean, muscular and full of himself, arrogant at the sight of the promoter of deceivry and denial. 'Greetings slumlords, I am Gordo Di'Dorko, the greatest man that ever lived. It may not be clear yet but I'm someone whom you're ought to admire and serve.' It was undeniable that they looked at him with an unquestionable level of hatred but respect. He ripped a metal street-light lamp only to see what the was no longer human, not to be confused with them. An immediate reaction made him drop it. Those hands were colored in the shades of the lost, a vividly-looking deviant hue of magenta, which only stemmed from the fact that he felt poison in his veins. But that poison was his, he hissed. And he saw that out of his chest came a few leash-like thick vines which strangled everything in sight, even the innocent people yet to be afflicted by this curse. Alas, he leaped to the closest window and saw a disturbingly-looking mutt of a face. He looked beaten and vaporous, malignantly touched. 'What have I done to deserve this?' The burn marks had returned, this creature which looked as if it had been submerged into acid, which gave way for the span of a few hunchback lumps to emerge from his back to the very point where they ripped a part of his skin and gave way for his spine to emerge from within, not in the form of bone but one looking like a throne. He sat on it and waited, bored. The sky was green now, dark, but he felt at home. As the buildings started to shape their horns into surrounding tops of crystal beds, he started sniffing, seething at the fact that he was greeted at last. 'I'm Brktich, I shall serve you now for as long as you wish me to.' 'And I am the Humble, brother of Brktich, come as the second one.' Both of which came dressed in a most bizarre fashion. One came in the dress of a jester, the other one a suit of white. He had a few marbles drawn on top of their shallow defiling helmets they bore. Inside of them they hide only the most peculiar aspects of gore. But those were not his to see. He would have to be at least as stricken by the weird vapor of trickery they employed. 'How about it? Will you not take us as your loyal kin?' 'I might carry around you whatever spoil you come into contact with. Never mind my brother who'd steal and who'd claim everything for his own. But I am the most loyal of us both.' Spoke the Humble jester, with a peasant's look aside. He was only up the aisle, until he found himself aware at that. It was amusing to say the least. They were a symptom of his desire to disobey. He had been just the first descendant, and in the eyes of his father, he had been a failure, much worse than having no descendant was the fact that he was seen as tainted, ungrateful bastard. Smashing through the glass left neither remorse, nor any feasible wound on his knuckle. It served as a reminder of what he was and whose blood came on the ground. 'How have I begun bleeding? I wasn't the one who punched through it.' 'Come on now, you're overreacting now, I see that. But you're right, you've done it, you cruel master. We haven't even been in your employ for long for you to abuse us in such a way.' 'If you're willing to follow me, then keep your distance, if not then you may leave and never return, I can only wait for so long until they'll get me. There are those who'd stop at nothing to end my line, and not one of them could be blamed.' Pain writhed in his chest, to the earnest lack of compassion he showed them came as soon as it could. He pulled his spine and continued his walk alone. As he approached that overgrown humbling pile, seconds thoughts emerged. Undefended, yet protected by their thick skin, he knew there was something within them which might be much weaker, easily definable, set in stone, lost for the lack of better words, in an excruciatingly show of lost angst. No more would it bounce from his desire, from the thing he most admired about his father as he grew. To him he had been a symbol which lay loose in his mind, the man who had given life to the line. He lay in a chair, abandoned again by the only living relative he had. Only him, who would call himself Seghemnon, remained most loyal, still blunt to touch. It was a coping mechanism, for he knew that he could walk, he may as well simply pull himself and walk towards his son. But in that damning state, who might receive him in the shortest span of time? A man stuck in the past, which had grabbed the essence and forced it in his son. 'Father, I only desire a life of good that I may live unharmed and untouched by the likes of you. Do not curse me in the same way you had. Will you force me into this life of crime and vileness you yourself have always resented throughout your entire life?’ ‘I cannot help it, my dear son, but my desire is far outweighed by the fact that there might be no hope for as long as there’s good in your life. We must take this sacrifice and carry it on our shoulders, otherwise, they shall make fools out of us and defile the heritage mankind has always tried to preserve. If we do not take the mantle of evil.’ His father said. And as Glaucoma went at it again, he felt every side of his well-being and kindness fade his body and should would both be cursed in the same way one might change, at a bitter rage. To his defiance he changed again. He would take another form, slimmer, thinner, much weaker than it had ever been. An essence of the malign would enter him, pushing and drawing, cutting and slashing until nothing of his soul could be contained in either the form of a man or that brute-like clad. His wide arms only gave way for a few more coiling grasps to come in. His body lacked legs but they were atrophied into a tail. In it there was just enough mass to give forth some hesitancy of the morsel. In his gut and in his mouth there hadn’t been a break but a trail which revealed as much as just enough space for a few citizens to come in. Yet they stayed away out of fear that he might try to throw himself onto them, crushing and smashing, dancing as he’d eat them. ‘Now it’s time to plunge and I shall have you at once.’ He made it sound as if it were a promise, a vile thing which couldn’t be explained by the fact that he would try to eat a piece of himself to slow down the acids inside his stomach. Not only was that but there something close to some apparent reason for his straying. A desire met only by the engulfance of a cowardly stab. But he was in and it was dreadful, the way in which he forced everything around him to fall into a state nigh-clear to some degenerative disease. It could not be more exposed than it had been there, that he tasted their raw insides, only to feel himself there. In a state of much-like the ending sphere, which grew and grew until it neared completion. It formed inside one of the puncturing slits he made with his teeth and started regenerating the rest of its body to a completion which couldn’t have been counted for. ‘I will eat you just like you have eaten them. And when I’m done with you, you’ll owe me more meat for me to carry to my den.’ That should prove to you father, that I am worthy of being your son. You shall see it, I promise you that now! To the best of his attempts he couldn’t detest the fact that eventually they followed, a non-intrusive manner, they cornered the find to latch. ‘Have we been wrong in attempting to befriend him?’ ‘There hadn’t been a single joy we shared, within our selves, why, I’d say we merely kept only the most needed expression of gratitude towards him, for taking us into his service.’ ‘But he refused, I believe he had. He didn’t say it but he made it quite obvious that he didn’t want us around.’ ‘Nonsense, nonsense, I think he only acted that way because he wanted to test us, why, I might even count it as a victory for us. In terms of how close we are, only he could tell us, once he gets out.’ That was their chance. ‘Brktich, I have never asked you this, but why do you always seek to backstab me in the most repulsive manner? Are we not pieces of the same cloth? Must I come to terms that I may never be able to do anything without expecting you to fall a few feet behind me, strappingly sharp?’ ‘You were always my favorite sibling for a reason, dear Humble, it was because you never questioned anything, taking the blunt approach, taking a few steps until. ‘Until the derange came and broken them off. The image of him had been mildly different in this reality, like an octahedron warped to the elongated body of a corrupt retriever of coffin-shades. Large nails erupted from fat toes, to their points of lost their signals. Two antennas were connected between the body and the crystal-shape inside of him, from this came the two legs similar to a lion’s mane, burnt to a crisp, eaten to the spectacular point where it seemed to be followed by the melting instinctive walk it had, as it stopped levitating and stopped itself on the ground. For this occasion alone, it had started talking through their minds alone, unknown to the defilers, they could not even fathom what happened. 'Heed my warning, from another man like you, I, Allachiel, have been corrupted and twisted into the abomination displayed for yer' gazes, this curse has turned me into a defiled thing from only atrophy might force me to sink. I shall drink out of my own gut, until I will be required, at that, to join you in the search for the man know as Gordo Di'Dorko.' 'Then you've come to the right place at the right time, for we have joined him in servitude, though he may not willingly accept another servant without us making sure we know the better likes of you yet.' 'Bu I've not come to serve him, I've only come to observe his strange behavior and the peculiarness of his action. I am one of the vile parts of space which may never redeem themselves for as long as he is there at all. Without him, I may never be able to outgrow my existence and be granted freedom from this curse. I know that inside of me there's a human which yearns for release. As is he, and for that reason alone I have stopped my travel through the planetary rift and decided to come here and meet him.' 'Well in that case, you needn't bother with it yet. Both I and Humble have decided it would be worth it for you to make an appointment, isn't that right, Humble?' 'But, brother, we haven't discussed about it.' 'Yes we have, with the three of us spoke about it before he went on.' 'Where exactly was that, they couldn't hope it wasn't as meekly perturbed as it had looked on the outside. But there were good reasons to believe that there wasn't anything right inside of it, that place reeked of the most absurd manner. Even for Gordo, it looked like an inner trap, a recreation of the piece of the city it had occupied, with that rugged brown and harsh texture he had seen on the outside being present on the inside. Not long after being presented with what lay there, he also came to realize that there had been a disturbing watch. 'We've been expecting you Gordo, for a long time indeed, you see, we've been spoken with.' 'By whom would that be?' Even in his volatile form, he continued levitating, twisted as his legs pushed and crossed one another in cone. Seghemnon appeared out of nowhere, slitting the piece of the ground and opening a key to his realm. What had seemed to him more distant and peculiar than anything of the kind was the fact that he was seen the same kind of behavior he had employed with his dad before him. It was crude and unnerving, something he shouldn't have given in. But he turned back to his old habits of collecting the feet of the strange robbers he had somehow managed to trick. 'Why have you betrayed me?' 'I haven't done anything, boy, I only tried to give him a fair understanding of the fact that you're not someone who should be faced. Evil thing you fancy yourself as, I can see that the damage you've tried achieving has only been temporary and crude.' 'Why should I bother with more? Any kind of pain I could inflict would give me away as well as my desire to bring him down. And I see that the key isn't on the inside, at least not here.' He looked above and saw the source for all of the malign. On its top there had only been the strongest growth one could see, the agony and the vileness of crockery. It still tried replicating the same pleasure it had felt. 'You haven't realized it yet, do you need some help?' 'No, why should I?' He pointed at the gaps and at the grasps to see how close he had come to developing wings, meaty, tender, puffy, but almost indistinguishable from the rest of it. 'Gordo looked behind him only to see the rest of the changes which had occurred as a result of the addiction to his propane living inhibitors in the back. Those wings were barely the star as his body bulked in a trunk of eight-five inches in diameter, pushing or to a stump which dragged onward to revealed two main sections it bore. The lower side looked softer, as it was the embodiment of his digestive system, while the upper side of the trunk looked hard, shelled, almost plastic, or non-organic. From one side you could draw just enough to paint a single strapping concave shape.

It seemed to be made out of two shaking hands, which weren't even remotely looking like one another, but closer to some claws. And each quadret of a section bore the same image, stretching the carapace into a forward pushing motion. As each segment met, a pointing sting would draw forward. There was another part of the universe which was enthralled by the constant change. In as much as two straight centuries they Necromancer had done something in the name of Kirhun'Dor. An exert of his deranged activity only now came into light. Despite this being lost as soon as one could pay the tribute to the lost words. He had carelessly lost himself with the help of the whims of least forgotten ventures, for as long as they lay. He stood there, unturned, unable to look away from his secret interaction with a fiend he had met. Centuries had passed ever since the interaction with the Obsidian race had begun, ever-so much in awe had they been lain that they could not be forgiven for their misbehavior. Slavery had been completely introduced by him, the supreme deity of Obsidian who called itself the Duke. As the necromancer or one of his many shades had come into contact with the lost planet which lay under servitude, he had gone through a gate made out of the bodies of the Suppressors. Tens of them stood there, unable to move, yet somewhat struck. Unloving, yet they shot out of their eyes a definite rebuttal of what they stood for. As he approached, he attempted to touch one of their eyes only to result into nothing being done there. 'Take your hand off them unless you want to lose your touch.' A voice said. It didn't come from any specific place, but this weird disgraceful one which couldn't even bother itself to propagate the side. He'd constantly search for any kind of place to plant himself near, wreathing in disregard. 'What happened here exactly? I think I remember them. They had been instructed to look over everything which was fair. Has their servitude concluded, then?' 'Nay, there was no such thing to begin with.' Walking over the plains of space was hard enough for him. Without the sniffing of the touch, he couldn't fathom trying to comprehend what was going on there. 'I could simply try bringing him to life.' 'That attempt would only serve as nothing but a fluke. You're bound to miss the fact that there are contingencies set there which will eventually devour you completely as you may. Make your peace with it and let them serve as the warning they are, otherwise, shade, you shall end up being just like them.' 'What of it in that case? Can I not at least dream of bringing him of life?' 'Do as you may, but be weary of it as well, there are things happening in the realm of dreams which may never be dealt with for as long as you feel yourself compelled to act in the name of the one who gave you form.' 'Very well, I shall proceed and do what I must. I need to know what I'm going towards on my way there, otherwise, I stand chance to risk my own annihilation.' Fare thy well was never heard. Doing the least of chores had helped him gain a piece of trust. It was dangerous, falling into a deep slumber there.

A piece of the bunker

The sinister Ttrhroke came to its full breasted plate, standing near the set of fire popping, pole shooting nail-like assault which only appeared to be the cause of the destruction of the hold. Looking back on it, one couldn't even bother to even point out who had been the cause of the destruction. Only a piece of it remained whole, if one could call it that way, in the midst of the fortification, while warriors jousting, fermenting in their skin. It appeared that another fight had come to life, and it couldn't even be mildly expected for what was worth it, none of them would be able to survive. It was reckless, to say the least, waiting there amidst the sole recursion of distaste. He could see that a few long metal cutters had been completely brought to a stop, while another one at the opposite end kept going on. Without the sparse attempt to look ahead in that point of distaste, it fled father into the air to avoid both the arrows coming from what used to be the liquidly-concentrated archers. It seemed like they had found a new source for their corruption, as a means of unsanitary disgust came to them. For what had been absorbed into the ground were the countless bodies which drowned one another in their masses. And each of them had managed to draw in some of the blood. Though they had been almost prehistorically stunned, or paralysis, denied existence from the depths, they served as batteries until their fight would end. Other than them the Ttrhroke turned its rotary-helmet, spiked as it were, barely attached with its many devices to the bulk of the neck, revealed one tiny light speckle, through which it looked. Its body may have reeked of some bipedal flying bird of prey; the head on top of it was that of Ttrhroke, who looked at the impasse. Before he could even turn his head, the siege engines began again, throwing the most unstable rocks of tinder, trapped between the wrappings of silk and iron chains. On top of those, there were the crawling remains of some of the bodies, and the echoes of the fight, again! 'Pull off your blade; let me see how you fight, fiend.' The trapper, came and pulled his double edged axe, which bore only their mischievous blood, drawing ahead from the sides as almost convoluted spins of metal started digging deeper into the nearest taken shroud. May they are surrounded no less of the dead. Otherwise, we may never see their kind again. 'Ahree, ahree, ahree.' It yelled, as the means of its survival fell from its back. That body almost lost composure as it threw itself at him. He couldn't even force himself to stand, or too look like he would be erect. He danced around and with a turn of the spade, as soon as it hit one of his fellow men, the axe buried itself in its neck, going as far and planting itself on the other side, and crushing it instantly, as if a forge hammer fell on it. Uncannily as it was, the mere blunt force revealed not only he fear they felt, but the lack of an appreciative nature, which the others took to their graves. 'Have you seen that cut? I ought to be knighted now.' 'We'll talk once the fight is over. Careful not to fall down there, I see that there's a stream coming from their end of things.' 'Do not worry about them, well do as we please. Let us not be stopped by the lack of satisfaction. I bet I can make it to the stream and swim in it.' 'And what of the repercussions of it? Are you that foul minded that you can't even behave? What of your grandchildren, Milyiee?' 'They're not as important to me any longer. I've come to understand that perhaps our paths should separate as soon as we can. Why do you suppose I'm here Ktothn?' He was too busy to give him a proper response, as the repository of tied hands came back to it, almost in a cowl and a freckled howl which called for reinforcement. 'Here they come again, let us not give in yet, hold the line!' The line would be kept as far as one could wait on it. Only about three thousand of them had been clustered in separate locations, some behind the broken walls, and others on the other side, fatherly denying the ends of the siege machines which were still going. Animated by the most benign matter of a fierce battle, they had starred the fiery coquettes that threw, almost bearing the might of firestones which landed in a hue. Many sparks of fire light, speeded, unnerved by the demolition which came, as soon as they began again. 'They're coming, look before you.' At the dawn of the many handed giants there came, a forceful blow which threw the few of them which had survived, farther in the back, for the lack of a proper entry. They came out like black spinning horns, which threw the others off the shores of their heels. As these blind predatory courageous screeches stopped their constant spin to reveal a frightening sight of what came from within them. In their long, prolonged mass, like dancers of straddled, long infant-scarabs in their conception phase, they opened like surrounding hairs, only to push out their space-contorted insects which would rise again. From them there came an amiable sight. Roses came from all the scarabs, lilies from the worms, from the unrecognizable ones the same, plants which didn't matter to be plain. 'Beauty from such terrible creatures, I have not ever through I would come to witness that?' 'Don't draw in their beauty. They must be akin to sirens, only desiring to draw us to them and fall.' 'And what kind of death would that be?' 'You fool; can you not see that buzzing head and that entire patch of many spiked ends? If you fall, it will catch you. Afterwards, it will have sprung to its song until you'll be nothing more than a beaten doll.' 'Must you always dog me in such a way? I can't even be envious of you any longer. I'm trapped here in the most distasteful way. I ought to slay you before I end myself.' 'Then I hope you'll sink to agony and he misses all of your vitals. That way you will remember me, and I laugh merrily in the more deceitful fashion.' 'But you would not dare.' 'I would again.' And again, he would, for he saw no hope of the battlefield, now that their commander and the champion her brought with him fell prey. To the lands below them, drink, to the fingers, also pink. To shatter nails, to batter wails, and in the end, don't look at him again. Everyone had, those who made time slow, who made buildings last. Even though they had no power of time, they seemed to make it so, only by a glance oh so vile. With each step they took, another blade started then it stopped. It could not be conceived that they would be kindly thought off in anyway. 'We need to get down there?' 'Now you're talking, oh how merrily I've become indeed. I wish we could both leap and...' 'I mean on the other side of the battle.' Where the enemy troops gathered and piled on top of the corpse. It couldn't be brought back to the worst of times, the bitter cries being stilled. But in the depths, to the gaze, the wrought surroundings of that circles phase of the feeding started shaking for the mixture to have gone, discarded no longer. Displeased by some audacity it may have felt, never felt off as to be again, the inner bottling proved to be a high success, but something had been missing from it. A fiend, who should've been longed for, be there. With it out of the way, taken as one may, there was nothing to stop the process of the planet's rehabilitation that prolonged lifespan, which proved to show no sign of turning back. But across the plain of Hlajj, the purple deserts of lighted lines, fire emerged as the interruption began. Somewhere in the sand machine, a cog cocked in and appeared to be spreading it the wrong side. The tall constructs of Nin'dur only came to see, each other working tirelessly. Their lower ends were held by long metal straps which carried them from around the highly energized sand-creator, the desecrator of fine-glass. They converted it after being corrupted by a most disgusting light which came from one of the prehistoric entropy slimes, which came with its skeleton forming around itself a growth which permitted their image to be replicated inside any reflection. And not only of themselves, but of their pasts and of their reeking habits, which included every pile of trash and scum which came about themselves in a most disturbing resounding cradle.

In it one could see the face of a man who missed half of it, one eye and a few pieces of the sickly grinds, all reflected in a manner which almost completely replicated reality. For one to be met by such an image, he couldn't help it but fall back. Unable to find anything throwing itself on him, he would try to touch it. A grave mistake, as they were not willing to share. Through their nails, like bark they'd come, even as glass or mirror-apparitions, through their large bodies, poor victims would succumb, unable to defend themselves as they fell. Bluntly thrown like a piece of spreading scarlet-fever, emerging through the contagion of scars, they'd end up like the poor victims they touched. Much worse would it be, that they'd occupy their husks and move ahead like solid clusks. One of the many Nin'durs dragged a battering hammer on the shag. 'Flood needs be stopped, or else we stand up losing everything before the fall of a single pine.' They were approach solemnly by the haunted mobile-units of Ikor. From their almost aphrodisiac dexterity, there came only the sight of inertia, the dementia which spread from the heads they brought inside of them. These gambling machines were there for no other reason but to distract them from the work. It was a highly patrician pleasure, to take a head and eat it warm. It brought them suffering, but no one would look forth. For in these giant units, the many which lay inside, bore only the name of the one who almost came close to inexistence. Dour, had been there, one of them, all of them, none of them. In reality, they bore different name and were too onset on admiring each other in their speeches and the haze. 'I am the king of white paint. I shall pain this entire demolished structure in my won color.' 'But you have no paint on you.' 'Foolish Trottour, slinky-broad, as you may be, I know you may no understand much now. But it's all inside of me. All of it, to which I'm pleased to say that I shall share my paint.' 'You won't remain here for long. I brought something with me as well, myself. I'm waiting for myself out there, in the distance, can you see me? I'm floating, levitating there, I'm rowing in a boat, can you see it? It's a spectacle I say, join me in my boat so we may sail again.' 'Echo, echo, echo at last, I can hear my voice and I can occupy all of this space with as much as I have. I'll give you all a chance of quiet and then I'll spoil it again!' The voice had spared not shattering of the glass. Everyone out there looked at their glassy dime-like tome sheet which separated them, just a few feet forward. Where one could pinch ever so thoroughly and break the case. Only a few words mattered now. In all the piles and turns and all which fell, there were still the ones I missed the most, the thoughts of the last man who came to speak with the lad, who wondered at that where had he gone? 'We're has he gone off now? I can't help it, he always goes on his adventures and abandons everyone. He simply can't be held down can he?' Doughwell waited for a moment, just so he could be sure no one was trying to peer at them or lend an ear by the table. Near him stood Alchamy, drawing another cigar from her pack, while being more attentive to him. 'I feel bad for Claire as well, she's been through a lot more as of lately. I even came to think he came back for the child, but I guess I was wrong.' 'We all were wrong about it. I can't even begin to think what's going through the kid's head.' 'She reminds of our daughter. They grow up far too quickly when they're left alone. I feel like she'll simply go through it and never see a dad coming home.' 'Was this what it felt to be a dead beat on the run? There wasn't even an answer here. Everything went wrong for him as well, but no one wanted to believe him. Malt found himself walking again on strange roads and kicking up cans off the ground. What influences he thought to have found weren't actually that great, nor had they provided him any means of return. Not to life in the old way, nor would they reconcile with themselves as they only surrounded their kind and their people.' 'Damned troublemaker, he's always going out there like stray, someone ought to put some sense into it, shouldn't they?' Nowadays they hadn't even bothered to conceal their insults or to look away as they said it. This was already harrowing as it was. No one wanted Malt around the bloc; no one wanted him to be in their vicinity or anywhere as a matter of fact. He was already lost in his eyes. Now what was he doing? 'Spying on your daughter? Were you not trying to escape your responsibilities now?' 'He's trying again; can't you see how desperate he is? No one's going to pay any attention to the strange man peering over the second floor, I'm certain of it.' Their usual cackle was gone. Most of them, which, whomever appeared in their physical manifestation, were rather dull and invisible to every other creature other than him. It's been quaint, to say the least, interestingly enough, they had found a way to go taunted the tiny shadow and the others inside of him. It was quite the game of stretching and of plunging against his body as there wasn't any stopping as long as they cared for it. A few of them would often even appear in eightfold, uniting together to form a pile, which resulted in their heads staring in each direction, peering in and seemingly making comments on the most mundane manners surrounding them. 'Someone brought rabbits here, and dogs, there didn't use to be so many animals around here, were there?' 'And I can see doves, and birds, it's only been a couple of weeks now. This is place still reeks of filth, I wonder why.' The lights were still strapped with their devices, still connected to a power source, though, there wasn't any central power any longer. Instead of it, there was the General

Appliance of Electricity and Power, which manifested itself just out of nowhere. They didn't interfere with the people and worked only during the night shifts when no one had been bothered enough to pay any attention to what was going on around during their rounds. From the roof shells in particular there was a dedicated corner, where only the fewest souls could gather and stare about. It wasn't quaint, it wasn't right to be spied upon, yet devices were planted. Unlike what was done before, this was more superficial. They were planted cameras which actually worked, which lead to smaller rooms where there were actually trained people who were paid to look around and see whether or not something was suspicious. That man again, the one everyone knew always made the same groundings around some part of the city. He spent most of his time walking now. Malt felt older, time was starting to pass him by. Even though it wasn't something of his own choosing, he decided he'd come in and say hi to the girl. Had he even spoken to her prior to this? There wasn't any way of knowing, he hadn't remembered it, not now, not even remotely close to anything he could point out. She was there and he was there. Even though both of them were on opposite sides. 'Are you waiting for someone?' 'I am.' 'Your daughter, perhaps?' It wasn't exactly subtle, but he shared a smile, an uncomfortable smile he couldn't shake off. It was awkward, trying to interact with that woman. He was unfit to be much of anything, and they didn't exactly give him that easy a time. 'How long have you been here, for, Malt?' 'I guess, ten years now, yeah, the tenth should come any day now.' It might've felt too awkward to ask her something now, but he didn't know who she was. Ms. Beauregard, Bourg, and Ms. Anything really could've worked. Time after time it had gotten more awkward to day-dream while being surrounded by them, it was hard phasing through them, as if little by little, they began seeing him. 'You have two sons, don't you?' 'Clint and Hess, they're in the same room with her now.' 'Bored already with waiting? We're not exactly on-set on trying to push through the mark, but I think we'll find a way to gnaw at it, if only you could give us a sign.' 'We're mightily desperate to lock into some place and enter. Why, I'd even say that if you don't let us in, you'll be known as nothing more than a coward.' 'Coward, coward, coward, coward!' Silence came, as soon as they disappeared through whatever crevice they could find themselves in. It was the same regular thing with them. Taunting then running away, disappearing then reappearing with nothing to convey. Strangely, he hadn't been surprised at all, if they even showed signs of getting through to him, they might've spared a glance. 'I've never seen you around here, Malt. Are you and Claire? I hope you don't mind if I'm intruding or anything, I'm simply trying to see, you know?' Her eyes show some good intention, but it would be wasted on him. Too many things happened, now they started slowly going away. They were separated from the other side, where all the tunnels lead inside of themselves. It was a maze out there, hard to facilitate the fact that they began building roads. It had been decided, as far away as one could look in whichever way possible, that the lowest level of the intertwined bunkers were in a desperate need of better roads. And with their advent, the androids and the fully-converted machines, they started putting two and two together. Clean and freshly paved roads still smelled of the high gentrifications which left their peculiar marks on both sides. A strange procedure followed, as soon as they began inserting bolts, shoving in some kind of miserable unknown amount of factors inside them. They brought something which looked like forage weapons, of tools to break high-stone with. With them, they pointed at the bolt and started electrifying them, adding the first of many electrical factors. Laymen around the construction area could only stand and watch in wonder. 'What are they doing there?' 'I think they're setting traps, but I can't be sure of it. I've never seen something like this before. I'll be honest; it kind of unnerves me to look at it. Those shocks look like they could leave a mark.' 'Stand off the area.' Came a voice, from one android, which bore a single trash-crane around his chest. It rounded him and only came as close to deepening itself in it. His chest revealed just enough multi-use devices that he could take any of them head-on. There were injectors and a few extra arms which all simply compiled themselves into his box. No one wanted to approach him out of fear of what might happen if they were to indulge themselves with a fight against him. It couldn't have been thought off as anything but a way to wager the likes of the stranger and the defiance of an unnatural woe. Standing under the false eclipse they looked at him and saw the same thing everyone had ever looked at them see. Cold boxes, soulless, immature, and splendidly stagnant. 'How many errors have you gotten so far?' 'What was that?' The few workers from round turned. Even the laymen in their free time seemed to scourge for that kid. 'Leonard, stay away from it. I'm sorry, trader, my son didn't want to intrude, see? Nothing in his hands, no need for trouble, we're not seeking any way of disturbing you.' 'You're showing signs nonetheless. What's your room numbers? What are your names? May a few years be taken off?' 'But those things are useless anyway, most of us won't even live that long for our sentence to be over. No one even submits to you so why bother?' 'Why bother? Little runt, we shouldn't have trash-mouths like yours near us. It's uncivil and we can't even get access to.' The sound of a trumpet-horn blew in. As far as its grand marshal could account for the sound wasn't about to lend itself any strength from the leftover machines. Eighteen pieces of the buildings had been brought from the nearest adjacent point they could find. This had been the rebirth of power which would bring them in. A craving for circuits appeared to inhibit every single one of them. Joining from the great precious peacock from the nearest floating orbs, what came here was only the strange wrecks of sub-metallic portions of disease. It had become a show of mightily alchemical prowess, which only ended up in electro sizing the orbs together in an attempt to make them even more approachable. Every now and then they would draw closer to the main structure and from them, the openings would reveal only sheer looks of the conductors inside of them. As long as there were just enough unified-mutation, they would still keep spinning. The mutations had been the next step in evolution when it came to the strangled uniforms at bay. For as long as one could see, these were caught and trapped inside their own magnificent leper clothes. Their inability to grow forth through their upper bodies turned into a venomous kind of unreliable membranes which coated the insides of their spheres. Part of their long-skin had become completely encompassed by the virus and the communicators to which they had been attached. A bit of them began pushing onward, crawling in the most distinct matter. Their shivering off-shot legs only came into the light when it was necessary for them to come about. In an unnatural way, they began communicating with the only thing they could plainly see past their bottle-eye-device. Through this small compressed telescope, they all shared, it was obvious that they only saw the empty fields and the adjacent half-a-sunmoon fiend which turned. With each passing of a season, it would start pushing in a different pair of stranger spades which cut through the nearest edges they could find. Going forward revealed that the crossed-out metal hedges had the least amount of diseased clarities, which had been revealed after a close observation after their spheres were completely enclosed. Without the distraction of the outside world, one could see it so easily, that he hadn't the least of clue towards what he was trying to look to. Their visions would shoot in every direction and only then it would make sense. Because they were surrounded by hundreds of sun-moon elemental changers, which turned the rims of which they rested on into a strange plane which had been squared, rounded and even cones to a side. Many flat-surfaces pushed on and carried with the various leash-like spade marks they left behind. It was a code, a strange code which required them to decipher. For what reason, though? As strangely as they were, these codes they left behind started retelling part of history which manifested once they had been done with. Highly-unnecessary as it had been, one of them stepped in. Feeling naturally endowed to stepping through the air as if walking on the plain, he found himself approaching one of the messages left below him. The spades weren't uncomfortable spades in any case, as they were strange spines, which came out of a side of some uncomfortable creature which had been forced to join the exchange for unearthly touches. It shouldn't have been right, the way through which one was going to cut one off. But he was beaten to it by one of the other code-slaves. 'Let me be the one to decipher it. I shall make it my own, mind you; I cannot be crossed any longer, for as long as I have wrought myself a kinder home, I shall find a way back. Need I remind you, bitter creature that we are the same? Though we might interpret everything so unkindly, we'll always reach the same conclusion.' Both nodded as they looked back, unnerved in unity by the fact that their spectrums membranes drew in. Even the long adaptors which were still connected to their optical device stretched far behind any adaptable point. 'It's most unnatural that we're allowed to be here. I supposed we should be thankful that we have been granted access to the spheres in the first place, otherwise, our lives might've been long lost.' 'You worry too much. I can't even think begin to think about the many times I've looked upon my past, realizing that I have broken too few a promises to be able to return. I've done too many ill and irreproachable things that I begin fading away. They've taken something from me, Bonevourt, this.' He revealed to me that one of the decoders was missing, as well as an important set of amplifiers which stretched the bands of his insides to an unworking side. It would be at least a decade until he could find a replacement for them, and by that time it would turn out late. 'I know what this means. The experimentalists had decided you're to be sacrificed just so we might obtain a few more days spans of electrodes to look here. It's not something I can truly look past off, knowing that I may be just as responsible as they are.' 'But what have you done that would make you a culprit? You're powerless, just as I was. You couldn't have had a hand in my end.' 'I had, though I do not stand as a witness to the destruction, I lay in awe knowing that I've done something as horrible as jeopardizing my sanity and integrity. Look inside of me as well. I'm the recipient. Because of me, you ought to suffer and lay lankly distant as I wait for your destruction to approach. Need I be reminded that I cannot even suffer being here, alone? It's something I simply cannot do. For that reason, I have decided to transplant a piece of your mind inside of mine. As you will slowly run out of energy and bodily atoms, we shall join. In our unity, I'll allow you the right of conversation with me or whoever you desire to as long as I find it even slightly satisfactory. Otherwise I won't let you leave.' 'But this is a treachery which holds no bounds. What are you intending after? Are you to drain everyone else until you'll have become a godly being? Will you reign on this desolate place?' 'No, I won't. But I think I'm bound to control their cycle and bring it to the point where they shall write my history and my like alone. I cannot stand to wonder why I have been placed here. Or why I was modified to be this way.' 'You've changed.' But his voice fell as he had been forced to feel the pain and consequences of being strapped in there for so long. It was laboriously decrepit, standing there for so long. Unnerving even, to stare at painted walls which didn't exist. Just what other assaults of mind could he proceed with? 'I'm pleasantly surprised that you even considered taking me in. We're not going to admit you to a death so uneventful that it will clear all the questions behind your assassination. But know that I'm still planning on killing you here and now. Just in order to speed up the process even farther. Don't take it personal, but I've had enough with the glories of spaces and the undetermined anchor which brings only the unnatural gazes of the maze. I see it now; the words are much cleared to me. They made maps and overlapped them just to fraction the way back to their source. You see, these are not real mazes, but mere tricks of the most unnatural order, pushing through our senses with the desire to change our brain models. Stare too long over the maps and everything will start being senseless. We're in the bunker, but we're outside, we're looking in the past or the future. It's a trap, a contingency made to corrupt us beyond redemption. As long as we stare into it, there might be no way back for us to return to. We'll be so trapped by the many overlapping dimension and the sides pulling us in that we'll have forgotten who and what we are. Eventually we would all run out of energy or our usefulness would be considered seemingly null.

And afterwards, we would eventually stop going forth and everything which made us be what we are could be doubtlessly prolonged to the existence of brainless fogs.' I could see that he had already taken the initiative to show me what I was talking about. He wouldn't even show me the signs of the living any longer. Instead, he would stare and push away only the least comfortable manner of jerking. Now he was pulled back and I was allowed to gain entry to the area of recognition where I was facilitated only the quickest way towards unrest. Words appeared in front of me, floating, dangling in utmost capricious manners. They mocked me now, until I had dismissed them immediately with a raised hand. 'I will not be insulted by tricks of the language. Show me what I want to see, and only then we'll talk.' No images came, but an actual supposition of many cultures honed hurt-houses appeared. From the windows it could be seen that they drew spikes and other hurtful tools alike, which drew inwards and started cutting and bringing in the pain. Dreadful as it was, it couldn't be recognized as anything else, but the manner in which they fashioned themselves as wrecks of misbehaves. 'I will have to look inside, but I shall not be hurt.' He spoke with a certainty which made him look at most of the mass which plastered itself near the closest of closed gaps. The first pucker extremity opened. Its emergence only drew out, through the grating of teeth bodies, which were alike to that of an arena long distant, in the past. From down there, I saw the dark spot, alike to that of a cage, but only a few bodies lay spread, with their gibbous, precious skulls and bones and bloody horns, belonging to a helmet. 'What have they done to you here? I see that I've stumbled upon a library for which nothing may be brushed from. Who's there?' I asked, honing my senses back. I was to be called into action without wondering whether or not

I would be approached by them. In as far as a few steps, they appeared in their impish way, tall helmet, in all actuality. Their suits were tinier than their giant rounded heads. And from the visors, I could see the reflection of mighty electrified, almost melted plaster. Through the visor, I saw that mostly, it had been a mass which over-encompassed just about every corner and every possible entry it could bear in itself. I wanted to draw near and I had. My hands, though of another plane entered it as the others backed away. Know, thee, watcher, bred, hearer, of my woes, that I have done something insufferable, that most wouldn't even trust themselves to know any better. I've taken a piece of him which had been perfectly fit to be a shelled container. It seemed organic, ever-so clustered with enough space that each small jerky flap almost came off from me. I wanted something of my own, something so desperate that I wouldn't mind it if I threw myself off. It took me off balance as I opened it only to find out that it was me inside of it, only that I seemed compressed. 'What have you done to me? Is this the future, the past or some strange replica? I have no recollection stored in memories. They've been taken away.' I checked immediately through my head, through the other head, through me but not, through this body which shared so many similarities but which bore no electrical appliances. 'We've given in to become as one with the other metal creatures that we jeopardizes ourselves. And I suppose you know that well enough. Because of us, there might be no future for any kind which is alive. I can see already that past your body suits and helmets there are various machines which keep you going.' This wasn't right, as I had started to awaken slowly. It wasn't something I would be proud of as a first impression. There are too many things which went wrong now. It could be nothing but indescrivable, what Malt felt and how he got there in the first place. After coming as far as this place, where no one paid any credance to his violent outbursts, he found himself simply walking around, muttering to himself at the state of the weather and the strange lost ways which got him here in the first place. His senses were still anything but his. His annoyance only stifled him as he went on. The streets were unking and he would rather be as blind as a bat than to look around and see him.

Sometimes everything would be completely unrecognisable. He'd be lost in his own senses, unable to continue watching the bird fly, and instead, Malt had given himself at their mercy. 'I suppose it's time for me to be taken, isn't it?' It was hard, trying to point out everything which had been lost by him. They would always follow him around, without giving a second in. 'Let us look back and see what we've done here. Is it not obvious that.' 'We've driven you towards the point of no return, Now you must do what we ask of you, unless you want to be left there by yourself.' 'But I need to see, what fun could you possibly get from taunting a poor man?' 'Neither in the head nor for what's fair, let us be clear that as you might come near us, we'll do what's worth for you. I'll drag you down and show you such sights as there had never been.' 'What for, if he doesn't want to give in and play? It's been so long since we were here before the dawn of the alcoves and the spatial forts. I can see that they had planted themselves on the reverse side.' 'The inversion of the red, they avoided him and now they're dead?' 'Who is dead?' Inquired Malt, with as long as one deciding factor being the fact that he couldn't even set him to look any faster away. He was trying to search for her, whenever he could, however he wanted, in the least obscure of sights. 'She's not there, you know that. You keep moving around like that and she'll start asking questions.' 'I can't see her anymore, where has she gone?' 'The woman left before you could say your goodbyes. Well I think you're in just as much a shamble as you had been prior to our meeting. We'd even say that you ought to be ashamed of looking after there?' 'Who would that be?' 'Hiding in the veil, I see them for what they are and you see them as well as we have set the sun in the right direction. Unless you mind it, we shall proceed into switching its side into an irradiated piece of Mars. Only that way we'll have redeemed our lack of choices before we could point back at them.' 'At whom?' 'The other Agamemnons, young Malt, they're after us. Ever since the schism happened, when our connections broke, I suppose it had only been a matter of time until we could set ourselves there. In the awe of the lost planets, we waited and played the tunes of the opera house. Only then could even heed to the destroyers between our ranks. Listen while you wait for her and make up your own mind about us. Otherwise, you'll only be doomed at a life of supposition and nuclear celerity of the most atrocious kind.' 'Very well, but one condition first, allow me sight for what's happening around us.' 'Granted, you may choose to do what you want and what pleases you as well as you pay enough credence to us as well.' 'I had chosen well, as they had allowed me to push on the veiled mist and look around. 'She's standing there, pushing her feet upfront.' 'Notice anything special? Perhaps something you yourself lost?' 'I don't know, what would that be?' 'It's been her only move for just about the last few hours in which, we guided you.' He tried stepping away, or pretending to do so. That was his motion which hadn't fully extended and came back in the position from which it started. 'I don't want this.' 'Then will you all us to begin the steam again, perhaps?' 'Anything but this, I can't stand in a single spot, just let me be, and I promise I'll listen as long as I'll be able to move.' They granted his due, and let him please himself with their story while running through the unfashionable steam. It had been thick enough for the air-chitin to be exposed. His senses were bedraggled by them in the least personal amount of clothes he was wearing. He had packed just a few knitted left-over's and a few coats from the hangers. To him, this armor of his could do anything but show the total amount of vestigial antiquity he had to leave to them. In that, they had seen the signs, the bitter lines of him being aware that they were speaking about the past. 'We have fought them, in an attempt to bring them down, you see?' 'That had been a long time ago, by the rims of a glittering filtered flooded arena.' 'Which had come just in time, the mere presence of which had been nothing but a certain amount of wicked dexterity of woes.' 'All of us were responsible for making it to that point where we had taken control over the Duke. He had been ours.' 'By our command, it had only been fair that we should put him over the tatter and chop him in pieces.' 'Who is this Duke?' 'He was at utmost reputable servant, Malt, just like you are to us. We've made a great use of him and we would've done so much more in the days to come. But he had become something else. He'd been stricken by such a diseased core that not even our filth could bring him forth.' 'His was for the taking, ours for the keeping. I cannot stress how hard it would be to look at that agony of filth we brought. It began evolving, if my brothers wouldn't mind me saying more. It had been by my pick of the play that we found ourselves being carried away. This wasn't the right in which he planned it. It could be far easier placing his hand in a jar and making sure they would crack it as soon as he made them do it. 'Will you just begin?' 'Farewell, of suppressors, for that was the time, which came. For us to go ahead, and lay down the lame ones back.' 'Back where if not their graves? They lay paved in the least disturbing places they would stand and suffer no one else for that matter of which may be. The arena was filled to brim, and in it, they had seen only the first perditions and the other skeletons which came alive from the ground in order to survive no long and implode. Their assault started and as soon as they had been stranded on islands, Agamemnon leaped out of their seats. Suppressors came down at their feet as the insufferable went into their glancing ovations and creations of impermeable hope. "Every time I looked at them, I felt like crying, I abandoned everything because of her." I gave up on the only thing which made me happy, the thing which hurt me the most because of her. Malt thought. He wished there was a way back. He could go there at any moment, but that would mean that nothing has changed. There were more than a few occasions in which Malt considered for the first time in a long time stopping. He could do it. He would stop talking and never open his mouth again. That way, he could slip through the cracks and never be seen again. Of course the only good thing about it would be keeping his mouth shut, that should be an achievement onto itself. The foundation of death would be conquered. This thought would be responsible for the deaths of millions as the star rose. But he could barely stay. It was so long since he had cleared his mind, but now they were pushing themselves all around him. 'Will you simply just sit and listen?' 'I'm sorry, but I cannot. Everything is so difficult and I do not know if I want to stay. Walking around the place helps me clear some things which I wasn't even aware that I suffered off. And I cannot express just how helpful you've been for me, as well as how much I owe you. But we cannot continue this way and you are all aware of it. Go on with your story knowing that I will not listen and that I won't pay any attention. There are so many things going through my mind that I cannot even make something out of it. As long as you talk there's a chance I may begin to drift and lose as much attention as I would've had.' 'We shall force you then, peasant, defiler, thing of the unforgotten, why won't you simply realize that there's a will to be drawn.' Much worse than that, it would simply not be liked for as long as they could spare a second, thrice the like. No one spared each other the desire to push onward where it could be touched. Trying to push onward, they had achieved at least a similarity of thought which forced him to pay just enough thought in what they were doing. 'See? I told you we would get him here.' Through the curtain, tracked and tied, he saw the arena, cut and dry. It was chaos, out there, just like he'd been shown before. After the first explosions and the first assaults, when the flying creature finally planted its last idol, effigy, the piece of it which would matter, the architect felt the destruction spread. In as much as an obnoxious gaze, the entire arena fell prey to the fight. Each drew onward, face on celestial body, ripping with their sunken teeth only the nearest corners of defeat they might be afford to try. In as much as one obnoxious glance, the throng couldn't be felt as long as it would be forced to matter. Not long after, the first enactment of assaults had come. 'Push them into the pools, that way their wings shall fall.' Without a second word enthralled, they forced themselves as many as twenty appearing faces. Each drew onward, then past their nearest sets of delights. 'Spare him, don't you dare eat his wings, you damned abominations!' But uncouth and uncalled for, this would not be forgiven. It was a detestable act which had been carried on until he had been destroyed. He fell with all of them, being munched upon until his interplays had accommodated inside his genes. His body had been completely sunken to the point when most of the mass had become stricken into pieces. And each of them claimed a piece for itself, to the very point where they started swimming inside this form lake, in the body of the Suppressor. Joined by the other fallen, they had sunken past the rims. Dipped into a delightful manner, they seemed to be eaten from within. Without a way of knowing, they had run. And in themselves, they were gone. Luckless of the luster, haste had gone much faster and there were no stronger edges which would we taken from their necks until the sharp eyes fully closed. They had stored just enough of what had happened around them to drive into the shadowy after-life which awaited them. There, in a perfect inversion, they were the Agamemnons, only that everything had been completely encompassed in the midst of shadows. With their virulent giant eyes they glanced and peered. Sneered even in plenty of obscure placed, deranged and beaten and forced to lay and watch. 'What is this place?' There wasn't any unity; there wasn't any rightness nor justice here. Only the wait and the instability which muffled and shook the top of the end above them, which shook itself until nothing worked and nothing could be spared. An unnecessary way to look at the gazes would only bring the misery back. More and more of them joined, suppressor after suppressor, who looked in each other's missing sides, only to observe. 'We're wingless and our bodies lack in.' Realization couldn't have kicked in sooner. Furthermore, they had lasted not a single second in this pure twist of thoughts. As each of them occupied, lastly and ghastly, a need to push on the breathing disorders and the fealty of the order of Unmkh. 'Say, say, see me past that bay out there.' With which he rowed, a bitter crow on his back, there came the surgeon of ravens. 'I need to cross in order to save this crow. I cannot heal it, did you know what? Why, I'm rather peeved that there's no one here to help me at all. I'm sick and diseased, unable to work on my own.' He looked frail, old and seemingly obscured by a kind of star mental apparition. He had physicality about the helmet he bore. It was squared and the top of it had a half-sphere on top of it, which pushed on. From it there opened and came out the head of a dove-like squared raven which had a long body similar to a few rats which had been connected to one another and pushed their children from the side. 'Who are you and why are you smoking here? Is it not dangerous to do such an act?' 'I won't die if that's what you're asking. It is only a way I'm willing to pass the time with. Otherwise, I would die off like the fiend I am, lost and forgotten, missed by none but myself and by relative who work here. Know me better.' There came the hulling sound which dulled their surroundings. It was highly concerning just looking around the place. So much pollution could do enough damage to destroy both the city and the vast groaning breathing cudgels which kept the entirety of the arena where it stood. Without as much as a glimmer, they'd rise and push to no other side than that where it sunk. Dragging their topping masses which had joined left a bitter taste of repulsion in Malt's mouth. Since he couldn't completely comprehend what was going on there, he chose to interact instead, grabbing some faces and throwing them back. It wasn't even his concern to be there or to look into them before going back at it. 'It's already ruined, this memory wasn't supposed to go this way.' 'Can't I have my fun now? I've drifted enough through it. I want to experience more of it; otherwise I won't be able to take my eyes away.' 'Bear me no thought; can't you see that we're losing hope to our delights? We were trying to show you our acts of overpowering against the brutish fiends which attempted getting us imprisoned. Could at least pretend you're interested in hearing about it? I cannot stress how important it is for you to at least show some amount of interest in it.' 'I won't. I can't do it.' Instead, he leaped and started swimming past the rim where the body of the succulent fiend had fainted. What it had crafted there, in an attempt to redirect the streams had been a small net. Yet it was like no natural net, or made from natural elements. Rather than the coy thing, this had been a net for itself which kept all of the broken limbs together. As much as eighteen small suppaceas entered the bits and the pieces of the nerk, making it seem like a big robust monolithic throat. Fractioned rather but working. Its jerkiness produced jutting motions which pushed the liquids away, which allowed it in turn to stay away from the vacuole. But behind it, past this motion of disturbance, past the parade which had been the fight between suppressor and the lord of filth, there had been a strange entry he had found. 'Don't approach it Malt. It's way beyond our limits, we won't be able to looking inside of it.' He wasn't interested in hearing them any longer. Of course this physicality had made forced him to step on the creature then crawl on top of it as an attempt carried on. Sooner than before, he would push on and find at least a portable device. It was largely put on a targe, plane, metallic, lean and wheeled. On it he felt the beating and the pushes it desperately tried to convey. From it came at least an exasperating scent of melted peppers. Within his reach, he grabbed and switched a piece of his hand. No fingers lay on it any longer and he had looked at what seemed to be a welded mirror on him. It was for the first time in a long manner of waiting that he had found him. That highly, almost political figure who had dared push him to the side just by its presence, for some reason, he was to look upon their play. As they descended in their realms of red, pushing through a vision as if from the rims of the dead. Behind him, the river flowed, bearing the last corpses of the creatures and the remnants of stone claimed from the arena. Highly observed as well by the architects, this was to be the stepping stone which would turn the tide. A shout was heard farther away than that. 'Break the foundation. If they want to destroy everything we fought for and everything we wrought with our hands, let them do it. We'll pick what we can afterwards, when a piece of rock will have fallen on a head.' 'When the breaking shall break the stones of Llon, let it be known that it was the architects who came down crushing.' Sights were grim. Many were repelled by what they've seen. It wasn't to be discussed or even considered any longer. This had been it. The red pollution finally found a way down the bunker. It was unrespectable, just the entire way it pushed in. No one wanted to take themselves away. 'Draw the movers, something's coming our way.' Mover eight-five, clearly wearing a design inside seemed to wear only that sudden reawakening of succor, the various shades merely pushing in the few inches through one of the steel bars in the way. 'Careful now, don't stretch the port, you'll activate the entire anarchy syndrome.' It stood just at the top of the wall. Once it would begin, the device would instill anarchy in the body, which in turn would force the victim's organs to reject themselves. His imminence would go down there, in the gutter, while he would uncontrollably jerk and fall. Singling out the copper wires which surrounded the panel to which it had been attached wasn't enough. Nothing would be enough. Caramov, Dirno and Zoya could not help but sit down, stilled by the force which had been projected. A few pieces of the ceiling were moving in a way neither of them could even hope to prevent. 'I'll try making for the cockpit. Perhaps that way we should find ourselves drawing in. Make no mistake, I'll find a way to move us from whatever's falling in.' An initial assumption had already been made, that being the fact that there were at least a few strangers who were trying to heave themselves in. Strangers from on top their world, which wouldn't even come to belong into any place. Utmost dangerous in their kin, they'd be. Perhaps even strays, whoever might even know of them would be a fool and a despoite to stand. 'Stray at my command, Zonya, take Dirno and push him in the room.' 'Will you be handing this alone?' 'Zoya, you know I have to do it. I can handle it if you make sure Dirno will survive.' Rolling his chair back in made her look around. As a state of the going, the mover was hardly in any condition to even go on any longer. It had been severely drawn in and stricken down, pushed even to the side, to hold inside of it a human being which hadn't even been partially thinking, a vegetable who had been stricken by a device in his younger days. 'It must've horrible, seeing you grow that way. I cannot even imagine what life must've felt for you, to even think how much dread you had to have gone through.' Zoya felt completed to him. She didn't see the legs but was meat by a tail-trunk, which had sunken where his legs were, giving the impression that somehow there had been an anchor of fat which drew him downward until there was naught in it. 'I need to know what you taste like. I can't explain it. Some ancient feeling this is. Perhaps I'm sick, but I feel like I'm almost possessed by a lower creature which only came now into being. Luckily for me, I always carry a knife.' A single cut had been made, just below the tail-trunk, which would be used for her supreme enjoyment. Incontestable, as it may have been, there was something she saw there, no innards from within. A bleak image of the bleak, but otherwise, she put it in. Moisture mixed with the incomprehensible feeling of juices which gave into the rawness. It satiated a feeling which made her inhuman like. It was sad. She felt so sad that she was eating him. And he was panting. 'Silence, now. You're supposed to be silent and a vegetable.'Slowly, the piece of neck opened and she could see him fully gaping out, with all his teeth being projected, demented by the various pigmentations which jumped from one to another. Visibly so, she could see the tiny particles coming from one side to the other. Without even being aware of it, she pushed herself past the wonder, and thought about asking. 'What have you done to yourself? I thought you were supposed to be. But.' What would he think of me now? If there's even a chance that he'd do more than open his mouth, if he could speak, then there'd be that much of a danger, as the kind of which she couldn't get away. Wry, a smile, let me be kind, she thought. 'I want to pull another piece from you.' Moans could not stand against what had appeared. It was too late that she had found about her inability to digest it. A claim had come in her mind. Blindness followed immediately. 'Oh, I see. You want a piece of me now. Dare me not for this but take it, take it, I dare you.' Her leg popped off, and she fell on her back, feeling how it crawled away with the piece she had eaten back where it had belonged. Now he would be complete, and he wouldn't have to spend the rest of his life in a chair. An almost perfidious smile would taint him, if he even cared to admit as much. As such, as he would dare away, he couldn't convey as much as a miniscule perforation he had made in a wall. Still moaning, he could feel the call for hiding.

Horns were being released; it was time for everyone to hide from amidst the rounding that followed. 'Hear me, shroud of tingles. I want to escape from this inadmissible poignant space.' A suited engineer spoke, watching him in the small flare which never left its proximity as one wouldn't even dare to look away. The red smoke could not be allowed to spread, as it would bring. As it would bring. 'But where does it lead? What is it? I see no more pollution coming from above.' 'Something must've happened. Someone ought to investigate it.' 'I shall follow in your trail, fellow engineer.' 'Who are you now?' Only a piece of a helmet spoke to him, which stood a few feet into the air, unable to bifurcate itself properly. There would be some tendons which would appear somehow. But they were falling from underneath it. 'Detriments to your plan? I can't believe that you would change your worship so soon. Have you decided to convert yet?' 'To whom would I give myself now? I've already changes my belief to eighteen other deities of the bunker, and I even seem to be hunted by one.' It was a terrible thought. An aftereffect of the violator who still threatened to find him haunting some of the most distant sides of the bunker, even in plain sight, he would still bring in too much for a single man to take. 'Drag me away if you can. If your lord promises me an escape from this, then I'll give him anything.' 'Let it be so. If I decide to partake in this deal, will you do me the pleasure of at least pretending you'd like to try?' 'I do not know what you're referring to. If you could please give me a hint.' 'Try to remake my body. That's my deal. We ought to serve him, the lord of the apocalypse, bringer of doom, Hysdgragglo, if you help me to become whole. I cannot help it if you don't. One hand scratches the other; it's everything I ask for. Do not make me less unnerved. I cannot help it otherwise.' It was clear that this one was lost, one way through. A hole in the key couldn't open the door any longer, and that worked both ways, as the door wouldn't be closed. 'I think this is the end of the bunker. Toxins don't come in red, but I suppose it could happen.' 'Care for me to try? I might as well just fling myself there.' 'Don't do it yet.' Cried Strage, the ending-near, the engineer, as he fancied himself, who looked at it just then, how quickly it had gotten a neck. It was much wider, harder and seemed to be a big jerky straddling spine-entanglement. Could this be it then? Was it even to be liked by anyone else? 'Wonder why I lived so long? Do you want to know?' Strage could not swallow. Was something stuck in it? It might not be so. Otherwise, one could not even pretend to know that something might be going south.

Brought about the end of his knees, he could see himself straying farther away, step by step behind. 'I took it from you, but I left a piece of you behind.' 'When?' 'Twenty hours ago, but the effects should only be felt now.' It was indeed a strange branch of surgery found Strage standing still during the perforation. Of course there was much more inside that helmet than a head and a neck which didn't belong to it. Opposable arms and thumbs wouldn't necessarily do it anyway. Instead, it had a few other inadmissible ways of taking what been it. 'Opportunity came a few other times as well. I can't stress it how hard it was for me to pull it all in one piece. Strange, I know, stranger it would be, so, if only you would care to look and see.' What was going on there? No one would be more surprised other than the citizens of the bunker. 'I want to be a part of this crew.' Rrent looked all mightily as a figure which was anything but divine. The repartition of a single switch still brought the vibration on. Victor had been the only one who had survived in his Mover. No longer would he feel estranged from the other crewmen, not any longer since he'd know there was nothing to fear. 'Do you hear me? I fear nothing any longer. I am safe. I am the only one who has survived and now, when all of you will be dead, beyond my mover, I shall be the last one to stop flipping the switch.' He was set now, he had realized who the murderer was and had managed to bring a sizable blow to an artery. Ever since then, he found himself sitting and standing, as if nothing had mattered in the least. Without the likes of a single malleable beast of an arm, he would tire again, sooner than now. 'If only I could flip it forever, then I would stop hearing the lights.' And they kept going out of the chamber. He knew they were there, he could hear it beckon for some kind of escape for the ones who were worthy enough to attempt it. But the question was who was worthy enough to try such a thing? Was life out there even worth it in the first place or they were all doomed to end up eating one another? Supplies were contaminated after all. It's been decided by an earlier generational report. 'Let it be known that everything is lost. No one shall ever dare touch anything which came into contact with the exposure, or else you shall suffer a contamination of the worst kind. A sizable death would be shown to happen outside your body as you would be completely jeopardized to the outside elements.' The message appeared to break off immediately. But the images projected by the mere recollection could not even hope to bring back anything but the merest emotion of unfamiliarity and death. A battery of the legs would be brought in. To say it this way. 'I will take it upon myself to test it.' Had spoken a man, from the solitary confines of a mover which had been stuck in an artificial fort made for them. Alone, stranger to his own people, he had done something incredibly dumb. Dying in obscurity would be something of the worst imaginable way possible. A manner of less than gracious touches would do. Not to mention, getting through the funeral attempts of the pieces of man which surrounded his metal coffin. There some other parts of the bunker which lay undiscovered. At least by those belligerent creatures that fancied themselves as the hooligans of the lower levels, it had been vaguely similar to the feeling of a sad perpetual song which never stopped. Various tracks and avenues lead in the same direction, deepening to a crested twirl that kept dropping away, held only by a few chains which dropped down. It wasn't structured at all. Everything was plain. Deepening for at least a few kilometers below the ribs of the main frame which kept the bunkers going, there was false foliage of metal flowers, dead iron forests, a false sun made out of some misappropriated sphere filled with powerless corpses and a few movers which had been abandoned. Nothing could affect the humans who had gotten out. They were trapped in there with the androids and the few swirl-uniforms, standing around, peering as they lives saddened time after time. Days passed but no one appeared to care any longer. Without light, how could there be hope? Without advancement, how could they expand past the bore? Same only songs dictated what they'd do. Even as they fed, they would never bother each other with their songs of due kind. Turning a blind eye to their lost brothers had resulted this. It was a lost corner which shouldn't have been. The dialogues between them were dull and most of the time ended up reminiscing of a time when they were happy, for some reason or another. 'Look at the flowers in the distance, don't they look sad?' 'I can't see anything past the dead eyes, they're turning me blind.' 'I think I see them sparkling in the sun again.' 'Where?' 'Just over there, past the green hills, where there's still verdure crying.' Without worth over dying, they ate pieces of the lichen supply. It tasted like meat if that's what meat tasted like. Crackling past the eve and nods, there wasn't any hope to look past anything they owned. Most of the appliances and short devices had been broken a long time ago. 'I remember seeing someone use a crawler, I think. It used to be this big vehicle I remember looking like a giant mole, with large feet which rotated.' 'That never happened, you're too old.' 'Well, it could've happened. That's all I'm saying. My memory is still great, for what I could tell. I can't be disposed off any longer.' The desolation could only spread as far as their minds allowed. And every now and then, everyone put each other down, for no reason. It was hard keeping every cog in this lost device going, since it resulted into nothing. They made their peace knowing they would not be found. It was a flawed world, a piece of which had been lost. No one had been there for long enough to pay as much as a breathing shiver to the pieces of mind they all wanted to share once, when they thought there was a way out.

Breaking through the safe

Only now I have come to appreciate what I had to go through with them in order to get to the safe. Greed had become my only friend now that I lost everything. There are a few good fellows who'd pay just enough money for a hint at it, or a pick. If I had to shovel the whole plateau only to pick a lock, then I'd do it. Without a question. I've been humiliated too many times for me to account thinking about anything else other than a way to get back at them. For all the time I've been through the academia and their high-status houses of interest, dragged through the mud of lesser men, I waited. All of their accounts were there, all of the notes, the gold bars and the needlessly poignant. It's not that I'm not sharp or something. Personally, I would submit to no less than ten francs if it meant getting my foot in the door. But I can only think it so sharply now. They need me there, up on the floor, servicing the Madame while her husband's missing. And the guests need be entertained as well. I can't even get my head back in here. It shouldn't be hard now. I could already envision this heist inside my head, see? The marbled floor provided just enough of an excuse to be to play my marbled bombs. These were such marvelous things could simply be planted on whatever surface I could place them in. One of these days, I could wake up from my bed and put in a few chains and then drag them to the jabber. No one would notice it. I spent months planning on a way to get through it. And it wasn't likely that I could get in by any other way. Just one push and one blow and I could make it. The only thing I needed was a good fuse, the bombs, a keycard and the clothes of an employee, many of which would've been unattainable if it had been done by a rookie. But that, good man, I wasn't. Least subtle of all, as I might imagine myself, I had collected a good set of skills which did me well enough to carry on with my mission. For the few pricks I could help myself with, I managed to get fairly far. Most of my previous nights were spent on trying to earn my due, by picking and trying to have a hand-on near some locking device, regardless of how I had been there. I was, was, trying to, going by, looking at. It may have been too hard for me now. It's not like I had known any better than what I had been taught. Pushed on about every street, going by the dirt and by the spit coming from the high ledges of town, I was unable to look away or to convey anything else other than what I wanted or needed in order to get by. And there was thing which kept following me, these soldiers. War was coming. Its signs could be seen around just about every closed gate, postulating fence and pushed-out window. Unlikely said, I didn't expect any of them to show as much as one titillating sign that they would spare me a closed eye. 'May I be allowed to go there? I'm supposed to be working for the general gazette as a photographer?' 'That wing is closed, return!' 'Haven't you heard him, civilian? Do you need a beating or something?' Neither of them could even be as much as forced to indulge me. They could just as well come down and hit me between the eyes and give me a good shaking. I didn't even think it would be likely for me to snick past them. Yet I had. Only a few hours, later through the night, I have found myself simply scouring the fields, with little attention my surroundings. I swear, I could hear their jackets simply bashing buttons during their shift. I heard the sounds of fire and before I knew it, the mere likeness of struggle spread around. 'Bring in the soldiers, bring in as many men as possible. I think someone's come in the city.' 'Is this one of those invasions everyone's talking about? This can't be happening.' They weren't giving away much. Only the trail of spiking stones could be seen around the shovel. In as much as a desperate lane or a two-side, I saw broken lights, stricken cars and just a good-too many antlers from a few runaway. Their herds had been taken here, so I've heard. From their kind, only the most atrocious of lookers. I was thoroughly surprised to find out about the shabby lanterns and the sight of guns. I was at least set on trying to get my foot in. But this mild distraction of mine had been nothing but some solemn thing can't be given. My choice had already been made. I would snick into the house of one of the bankers, which I had knew so well to have placed it at the back of my fingers, that there wasn't any stopping to me now. There would've been no explanation and no convulsion I'd give. This was my chance to shine and as they made their way towards the other side of the town where the fire had started, I've taken my chance inside theirs. 'No one suspected me in the least, a valuable employer who sniffed around each of their repulsive beaks. As a matter of fact, I'd paint myself an artist or an artisan, one who plays with the most deceitful of locks. I smacked one open. You can check it, check on your files. With the sole of my palm, I had managed to do the impossible. But it hadn't been a wonder that I wasn't meant to be here. No offence, to my employees, but I had made it so far on my own. This was my time to go on and find a way to scare them off. And that hadn't been easy. I looked around the first room I came in, and found one of those rich bankers, sleeping with his wife. It hadn't been me, likely, or I hadn't been up to it, but it crossed my mind that I might pay a little pick on him, just so I could see how he would react. Of course, only the extravagant folk would pay as much attention as to spare me the rough details of distracting him from the lady. My chance was gone, already stolen from its conception. Before I could even drag myself out of the rags in order to steal from him the only piece of identification I would need, their son was there. And I had been caught, red-handed. Unable to draw myself from sight, I conceded to him in the quickest manner possible. 'Good man, you caught me, why, you ought to be rewarded.' 'Who are you?' 'I? Well I am the only man you'll ever pay attention to. For now, consider me as the only person in this world who'll ever matter. Now, kid, I am the atrocious spirit of sullen misery. And I've been drawn here my a high spirit which, you know what he told me?' He wasn't doing anything now, other than the strange hypnotic shake. It seemed like a natural thing, the scream which came over his face, me rushing over to him to grab him by the throat, tackling him instead. I wasn't sure why he fell like such a dud. But I couldn't feel a breath instead coming out of him. What have I done indeed, I wondered, just how long would they be sleeping even after this assault. The kid wasn't breathing; the very idea of it struck him as being absurd. I had been caught twice during that night. The first time by a man who wore two faces, but not on his skull, instead both of them were chained and kept it just a few whims away from where his nose stood. Twenty centimeters rotated from a holding device on one side, while the other barely dangled constantly to his sides. One of his cheeks was red and stamped with one peculiar rotting disorder, while the other looked plastic. Sharing in their peculiar appearance and system had been the rest of his body, which had lapsed in a strange deformity of science.

The arc of lightning which came out of his back revealed the pantheon of lightning gods which worked their way through him. He would dance and queerly look out of the dim lights he had taken in their name. In his hands rested a few strange electrons, which peered as the remnants of his awe faded away. It was ever-near him strange disappearance that I had come to accept that I had to get away. He wasn't going to offer me a chance to act, to look for anything I could take before escaping through one of the forlorn chimneys they bore. Of course, the first sight which had come onto him had been that of a single storm which threatened to come. By the time he had even set himself straight by the rooftop, he walked on fading tongues of marble. He was being choked by the lantern. 'What are you doing to me, stranger?' 'I need to breathe into your brain, only that way will you see me again.' He tried showing me a piece of his broken lips. He pulled them out of some bag, and only dragged them holding onto nothing as soon as I had taken them for granted. And in a long toddle, he pulled away a dissected hand which came to show me that he was dead. In the only manner I could trust myself to join him; I turned to see the nothingness which was him. Only the lantern stood there, at one of the marble-tongues. Hit by the voices in it, I took it and looked inside, seeing how the keycard I was looking for started burning away. 'He fell off the rooftop, scrawling his fingers on top of a pristine floor. He had been impressed by his accommodation to the various paces his feet had angered. He was deranged the strangler. Lost on the streets like a baritone who found no peace. When he fell, would he tell for what reason he had stepped as well on the first two first imaginary delights. Caught off guard by the act of pushing carts, and throngs, he found himself unable to look past the heed and credance of the last time he had looked upon the grims. It was only by one light in the distance that he found himself caught on by the tragedy which forced him to lay infirm. From one of their rifles there stood the damp blade, as vile as one end, which pushed on through his spine as he wed no other woman then. The man was found and trialed, found to be in such a pursuit that he couldn't even be forgiven any longer for what he'd done. His agony was trifling, he wouldn't be gone for as few little as one generation. Back on his track, the fool with a twisted hat, this Coatrack. He had witnessed a lot this night, perhaps too much for a man to handle. Way too hard to handle liquor, he held himself as still as a man charmed by acts which had undone him. Somewhere outside, he could only see that fiend of lightning which differed from just about the lacquer of his teeth. Reading in just about the first pseudo-doors he came into contact with, he entered an apartment below the suburbs to hide. Crock Steam was set, unable to move ahead, he stopped breathing for a few moments. It was already a hard man's job to look away in disgust. But he slept with the help of the exercises of mind.

Swallowing his perilous tongue, he choked himself until the copper and the opium deposit underneath his brain tumor entered his mind. What transpired was an affectionate act of self-distillation which brought him closer to the most obscure of needs. It would be his desolation, to say the least, which brought him to the heels, brought to his knees and beaten. 'We can share with you just half-a spectacle of lights if you're willing to follow us. Perhaps we'll even make the necessary arrangements for you to find a way through the safe just like you have initially planned.' 'Farewell.' He only spoke with half a word, unable to account for hope. It was lost on him, just like his senility. He was there in a way, nonetheless expecting for someone to pay just enough attention. Otherwise, he could be caught off guard. A spectacle had appeared in some way, which wouldn't even be forgiven. It was pushed through his mind, ready to set out blindly, following through the edges of the crisp stones that stood among the safe. Was this a dream? And if it were, could I take something from within? Wondering and trying went hand in hand, as he would send part-shiver in his head. Unable to corelate any of the various principles of levitation, he simply walked as a stranger would, an outsider to the ways of stone. With each step, he was met by the architect, by a worker, by a person who had stepped on them. Unable to speak, they simply grabbed him, preventing him from setting forward. It wasn't even to be called, enthralled by the comotion, he picked a bar and soaked himself in liquid gold. 'It's all mine, all mine, just as I had dreamed of it.' Greed brought him disgust, it was a must which dragged him down.

Aleksey Grigory Ugryumov

Aleksey Grigory Ugryumov, poor man in midst of depression, wife is sad, loney, waiting near confession. Eight more pieces of wood added by the fire, looks docile as he finds himself near him, clothes dry, she looks upon his shoulder, reads the paper. 'Tyromovi' Anastasiya Dina looks at him, pulls him over, drags him near the bed, puts him in. Another day at the mill, wind is blown by the snow in midst of summer. Much colder than the last year, both afraid of looking in the garden, where potatoes, carrots, freeze by the storm. 'Drunk again, Grigory, late and drunk.' It wasn't much of a bother, looking at small radio, singing a love tune, small song. Listen to vale. 'I got a promotion, Dina, we don't have to move out.' She didn't care about. It was too cold to care. Somehow the ice in her veins spiked more than sugar ever could. 'Nasty, woman, making a fool out of me.' Aleksey muttered underneath his breath. He was reminiscing about someone younger than his wife. Chasing her across town while on his way from his missing red blanquettes. They were somewhere, he had forgotten where. It didn't happen that often for him to walk through people like that. But that only excited her, seeing him leave a trail of bodies behind him only because he wanted her so much. It would be near his rum-colored tooth that he would feel that sweet, sweet spot. 'What is your name?' 'My name is Dina, Aleksey. I told you that two times already and you always revert to making the same face as you had now.' She was named in the same way as my wife. This couldn't be happening, she had to have been planted here. 'Dear, oh I fear I'm late for a meeting.' 'What's the matter? No longer drunk are we?' Inside his bottle lay an octopus. He had been sipping not rum but ink for the past four hours. The other bottles had the octopi already used to the point of self exhaustion, which took away any kind of satisfaction he may have had from drinking. It was less important now than it had been before, but he was still onset on looking for a quick release. 'Please, my wife mustn't know about this, if she found out, my marriage.' 'I know, I know I have my way with men and let me tell you, I know just the thing to get you well and tired.' She opened a bottle with one of hers. It was hard not to stare at her, especially since he'd so loyal for so long and his wife never rewarded him. Not in the way the other Dina had. She was so good looking a woman that he couldn't help himself but stare at her bosoms. Drooping, filled with erect migraines, he spent a good few hours with her and left. While she was done, laying on the bed, unable her to get off, he had managed to snick in and take a few bottles off her liquor cabinet. Her husband would be in just a few hours. 'Careful with the roof, it's worthy of a stare.' 'Were you in my house just now?' 'Only for a few reparations, nothing to matter.' Just like a python, he leaped from his pile and appeared out of nowhere. This was no easy cake-stalking pleasure he might've strapped on himself. 'I'm in a hurry and much more indisposed for a run. Do not mind me as I stroll as far away from this place. I'm being looked after.' 'A wanted man as well, in my house? With my wife? Villain, what have you done to her?' If this man only knew what she had done to me, the things she would be worthy of a long discussion over a drink. 'She's sleeping, untouched, I swear, on my honor as a married man, would you suppose something happened in there?' 'Did something happen?' 'Look for yourself in.' He peeped as if this wasn't his house either. 'I knew it, I knew it, this is not your wife.' 'How did you know? How did my poor Dina stumble onto you as well? I swear, every time she is out, someone is bound to draw his eyes on her.' 'As well as one should, now, what do you say we go for a round, together?' 'While she's sleeping?' 'No, not of that, I mean, a round of drinks, on the house, just the two of us, together.' 'But it's still so early.' Yet they went. Together strolling to not a single sight to look upon. But they corpses married in town and together they made their dead children in that short span of a time. Of course the men and women who died made their children frail and weak, as if they weren't even near any kind of interaction, or a distraction or desire to be alive. Their flaps moved in a dance of summons. A portal appeared in their symbiotic, blood-made liver-brains. As they had inherited some of that brain matter from both of their parents, it was obvious that this genetic damning cope had come from a desire to know what was going on inside of them. It couldn't be questioned, why it had been such a bother on them. But they developed minds there, even in that form and begged for a life, from the depths of the manifesting mystical suits of dancing hearts which appeared from the ground, opened the great door which stood there, manifested in all of its glory, sanctified by sculptures of craftsmen who held it still. No such thing as an inherited desire to be felt by them, before it would come to him, that this child desired a way to end its life. The peasants who were near, frightened by this went away as quickly as they could. 'Run, run, it is the work of the brothers again, they're up at it again! Spread the word, get away, close the doors, flock the Sheppard away. They'll arrive.' A magnificent design cursed it, bearing long silvery metals going around each of the pretentiously diamond and crystal ware. From it, came the one apocalyptic contortionist, a servant, a seducer, a woman unlike the likes of any creature which may have been alive, bred for that kind of eroticism came to smash over the child. She had ignored the plea, allowing the satisfaction of being cursed with some sort of immortality amongst its parents. If anything, this pleasurable creature that came out of a realm of dryness from the other side had been abandoned there. The gate closed and behind the closed doors, there had been signs of openings. As soon as her way in crumbled, it was settled, she was in to stay. 'Don't look at her Grigory, she'll twist you, she'll have, she'll make you hers. I can't allow that.' 'Shut your mouth woman, I wasn't made to be one kind of a man. Let go of me this instant before I put you in your place.' But this creature had her eyes following on a scent, that of Aleksey. It was only her desire and hers alone for that man which drove her to remain in this pitiful realm. That man had something about him which drew them towards him. Insidiously watched, he picked another bottle and another, before he yelled. 'Another refill, I don't think I'll be returning home tonight.' He said. Looking around the holster, he saw another lady taking in, with at least two sizers over the counter on a plate of bound metal provider. Ugryumov lived a sad life. He had never been happy without a drink in his hand, piss in a jar and a shared bed. Even now, when he was surrounded by fellow, he couldn't help it but frown. Life was empty again because he would be sober. Not because of his unknown ability to metabolize it, but because for the past twenty minutes he hadn't been drinking anything else but blood, from the man on the counter. It wasn't going to be easy, trying to get himself off, but he already landed himself as far away, onto his two feet, on the way. 'Going? Not without your friend, Konstantin.' 'Konstantin, where were you?' 'I was here all along, watching over your back so you wouldn't get hurt. I was behind you when you entered and.' 'Enough, please, don't. I don't want to hear of another stalker who looked at what I was doing.' 'If there's anything to it, I averted my eyes when you did it.' 'That would be enough.' Konstantin wasn't sure whether or not he'd offended his friend. But if there was anything which may have a chance to make him feel better, it was another drink. 'My good friend, but where have you been for so long? I was waiting for someone like you to come and help me with my sobriety.' But it had hit him, whatever there was in that drink. He felt like he was losing it then. He had an interest in looking at pictures of insects, termites, little discoveries, one in particular looked really nice. It was a big one, yellowish-dirt-white. He had suspected it wasn't any insect but some nonterrestrial signature which served as a gateway for him to stare inside of their hideout when he was at his lowest point of alcohol spike. The delusion was barely able to stand by itself and it was then that he feared that he might kill his friend by accident. What crossed his mind was only an interesting intrusion in the most secluded of the wrought words. Those things which sharpened as they spoke with him. 'Carry us home, please, carry us home, we must know what's wrong with you.' 'What? Who said that? Who are you?' 'I will introduce myself.' They moved like waves, the buildings symbolizing some kind of reenactment of where they hide. Though it was a secluded place, it couldn't be taken out of consideration that there were other powers involved at play. It was interesting, looking up to it. They carved their mount, just like those termites in the pictures. It was obvious by now that they placed themselves there for a good reason. Ugryumov saw how the buildings simply turned into the occupied mounts which waited for the inside them to get out. Not as subtle as he had seemed to think that they diverted his sight from them, constantly. Their presence emitted a perfunctory gas which only affected his pupils, throwing them to the side until he could only stare at them with their corners. For the architecture of the mounds, they looked like heathen temples, eyed, clawed and embolden in the kind of satisfactory illnesses which had turned out to be the reason why those who came out of them were so sickly-looking. No, they were part of them. It was a sacrifice which had been forced by their ancestors, each of them being able to turn and use his body as another layer of the mount. At the very bottom lay their old, ancient form, which had shrunk to pea-sized monstrosities that had never lost their charm and attention. 'We are the Neukorny.' A break had come from that release of gas which turned his eyes as far away. Now he could see that, after turning the sandy-like back or the house-like altered roof tiles, turned a white shape-upstanding Neukorn, who bore his perfectly shaped body on a modified recliner. It moved with the sense of intrusion. Aleksey had to look down in order to understand why that feeling went ahead and haunted him in such a way. Before long he got the reason for it, that being the fact that there was a patch of dirt which changed shade underneath him. It looked or felt like an aura which surrounded him. In it, he felt vulnerability. For a moment there, it had been fading. He had another drink before his relapse could occur. By no means would he want to return to the world of the living, only this had been important for him, the escape from the thought of what his wife might do to him if she found out. 'Let me be drunk again before my guilt returns. Please, I want to feel nothing again.' He cried, but there was no one to see what for. The reason had been lost in the absinthe, and it was a lot of it. So many of the bottles came out of nowhere that he had refused to care and gave into drinking again. 'I see now. You're trying to come here, so close to me. It's unreasonable, leave.' Out of his came a pair of four moving thoraxes which, upon release from its main body turned into shades of dark brown and became much harrier which had been a grand turn from the purity which had been encapsulated into it. They stopped spinning and stopped, opening just wide enough for him to step in. 'Should I do it?' 'That is a must, can you see what lies inside of it?' 'I cannot swim.' 'But would you not drink from it? This' what we produce out of our bodies. We store them underneath our mounds, in the cellars. It's all for you.' 'You mean it? You mean I could stand there and drown in it?' 'But never die, that is why you were chosen, that's why we appeared in this form.' This had to have been the perfect escape from his conundrum, but there was one thing missing, of greater importance than all the drinks he may've had in a lifetime. 'There's no company. What would I do there after I'm no longer thirsty?' Enough of the drinking, back to Konstantin. 'Back to the living?' Beneath his legs, his feet wearing glass shoes, one of the bottles broke in two. His back was against the wall but his legs were crossed. 'How long was I missing for?' 'Only the usual, but I think I managed to pull you back.' It wasn't long until he reverted to his usual ways. Since that creature came out of nowhere he would not have to explain it to his wife. She wouldn't believe it if she were to be me by this exquisite force of nature which sank her teeth in his brows. 'Konstantin, what is happening?' 'I think you got another admirer, Aleksey, I'll leave you two alone and head back home.' His company was gone, and if he knew he would've picked that entrance and left him there. 'What...' A loss of words couldn't do him any better than the waste of bottles he had come to enjoy. It was by her tender touch that he realized how much he had missed Dina. Not his wife, but the other one. But now that he knew that she had other lover, he couldn't fathom returning to her. 'Say, with how many other, how would you say, how many other was you with?' Blushing beneath her veils only made her think of how unnecessary it had been for her to even recount the amount of adventures she had. 'Of course of course and a silent one as well, would you happen to be crazy?' 'Crazy indeed, ever since I felt your scent.' 'Then you may follow my scent back to the tavern, where it came from. I need to return to my.' 'Dear Dina, I know of your wife, she's mightily lonely, is she not?' He had to have been careful, with a tiny butter knife on him. She looked like he had the touch of the unholy, and smelled like a hussie as well. How could she complain about my scent when she is ten times worse? Now she had made him mad, which in turn prompted him to the first slap. 'But we don't even know each other.' 'You have no sense. I just hit you across the face, look, you're red.' 'I'm blushing, were you always that pin of a prick in the head when you were young?' 'My mother always called me a flimsy boy. How did you know of that?' 'That was merely a guess.' Enough, I was not dizzy enough to entertain her, so I walked away. As it happened, she followed, without paying too much of a conduct to what was going on around me. To say the least, she tried hiding away every time I turned around to check. 'If you'll come near me, I'll do something much worse.' That should do it. She disappeared, with nothing more to add, now she got it, now she knew what had to happen. If only poor Dina didn't choke me every time I spoke in my sleep. Perhaps I would share my bed with her more often. But there was one thing which was on his mind. The underneath cartel, the one which dealt with the bootlegging and the likes. He hid a note in his pants. After taking it one, his suspicion was correct. 'What is it, Illiadov?' A red bonnet, laced with closed decks around his neck appeared. Not a second less came to him that he presented his ware. 'Say, Aleksey, a smoke, a cigar? Maybe a few of them?' 'Smoking? I don't smoke, I just.' Presenting a set of empty hands revealed not much to him.

It would've been complete if she had come. 'Dina, I am Dina.' The nerve she had couldn't even brush the kilt of cattle. She simply appeared wherever she wanted, pushing him to the side and conspired against his well being. 'I brought his bottles, see? He doesn't smoke.' 'My dear, he can too, how about you?' Free samples were well received. Illiadov knew what to put in the pouch to make it complete. It gave an intoxicating scent which made her forget all about the reason she was there. 'What was that about?' 'As I said, I insist, grab just a few of them and I'll be on my way, there's no need to thank me for it, just take a few bites, have a few smokes and I'll be on my way.' 'The cellar, now I remembered, I need to get to the cellar if I'm going to leave again.' 'Leave again, Aleksey, you didn't pay me for the cigars, where are you leaving to?' This new Dina came to his attention. 'With him, aren't you? That means you're paying for what he took.' It wasn't her intention to draw too much attention, so she turned and gave what she had. Luckily she sucked the living succor out of an admirer before she came to the man. Life was good. For now. But as Grigory bust through the door, he couldn't see himself going any deeper than the few first steps, disturbing the family dinner. 'What now? They told you, you're not allowed to enter our houses anymore, it's forbidden, why can't you just respect our lands?' 'I'm sorry, but I need to find a way down, where are your cellars?' 'They're locked.' Said Sash, before picking up one of the wooden sticks she had near her. Between them, it only became clearer that he was still being looked over by them. The offer still had to have been on the table, one way or another, he'd look and understand. 'Lo' and see, they cannot understand that I do not want to drown my sorrows yet, I think I'll just settle with it here, in the world where I can feel something even with a mere touch.' With which he came closer and took one of the glasses from the table and up the gulley it went. Their cellar was broken but he pulled the entire gate and threw it against the wall, breaking it completely without a cause and without a wonder. He should've grown a bit stronger in the head but that was it, he wasn't dead. It was near his instincts being taken and messed with that kicked off his recognition. 'Careful there, don't fall too deep. We close the cellars because it had become too dangerous.' And there she was, Dina, with Konstantin, side to side. 'A lover already, do any of my Dinas know of loyalty?' He said with a few cigars lit, a pouch to his nose and eight lights which were smoked. It was greater than expected; he could feel the red coming off his nose, which made him aware that whatever he was having was making its effect. But what he saw between his eyes was what he was looking for, a way in. 'Jump with me, take this leap of faith and don't look back. The world behind is cold. I spoke to my wife last night and told her I of my promotion and of my promise, that I would make her life sweeter and give her a chance at life. But she doesn't care about that, she wants my children, which would give me no joy of my own. I only want to have fun for as long as I'm alive.' The sorrow of not being able to drink mixed with their forced attempt to make him think. 'Luckily I have a small canister for moments like these.' 'If you'll keep overdoing yourself, you'll end up sleeping like a dead fish, don't over do it.'Konstantin had at least tried. But I feel like I had died in that house with my wife. Whatever was left of me called back from below.I jumped, they followed. I fell, they stopped, on my head. I seemed to be looking at a piece of heaven.'Rewarded at last for my great-doing, and my great quest of satisfaction.'Which came at the price of one of his left hooks, his arm and shoulder, and a few of his toes were numb. Not to mention the hit to his head which brought his vision back to them.We were met by our host.'I am the Gorrogh. This is where you need to be now in order to reach your appointment in time. The meeting shall only commence when you are there.'Gorrogh rose out of nowhere, bearing a few sepulchral wings on his back, which pierced through his bandages. He was clearly an adept, who had been a man, but he had small pouches grown which plunged outside his woolen armor. As they pushed through, he knew what was inside of them, suspected it, but never said.How much he wanted to pierced them and suck on them until he would start feeling sick. His eyes were too bright and too white for him to be sane.'What may I do? I cannot go on without being stimulated.'Pierce your liver through one of the roots and you may come forth. The two of them are irrelevant.'I only came here for him, I won't abandon my man without even having been with him.'The mere idea of doing it with Konstantin around amused him. He could watch both him and Gorrogh. But only after he became drunk enough, which made him wander even more, closer to thinking of a way out.'Will I not simply be able to stay here, pierced by the root? I should only care for this for as much as it possible.'Stay here and die then, I don't have to waste my time with you. There are others who would not throw away their opportunity to get away as fast as possible from their bleak world.Eventually, the roots will stop giving you the satisfaction and they shall take back what is theirs. That's the trade of your constant lust for satisfaction. She'll be left out there in the woods to take care of herself until the winter comes, when she'll die off, all because you didn't return for her.'I promised her nothing and gave her nothing to look for.'Does that redeem you in their eyes?'It didn't. But they followed him, for what else could they do now? There wasn't any other way to climb back up.'Are we allowed then? If we follow Alecsi, will our safety be guaranteed?'Has it ever, brum man? I think it would be better for both of you to simply go on your ways and not come back.Away with you, or you may be met by a way meant to be traversed by a single attendee.'And what's this meeting supposed to be?'Konstantin, is it not? A human spirit like yours will be devoured by the many hitting lyres that are present in the very chamber the meeting is supposed to happen. No living sane person could fathom being there, let alone of as faithful as you are.'He point at the chain 'round his neck. It was plain to see that he would be taken from the spot he had indulged himself to be whilst asked to leave. By the time he had asked himself a way to go, he found himself nearer his friend. Not by chance but nor by will. Someone else walked through his feet. Inside of them, he could feel that push, that fattening pulse which made him want to get through it as quickly as possible.'Let me see, what's that about, about the cellars? You never told me why you came here for. Aleksey, Alecsi, Alecsi, wait, don't do that yet, you don't know if it may work.'I have to try something, I cannot fathom being here for too long.'But what if it's a trick and you end up bleeding?' Should I at least not attempt it at the tip of my tongue?'The warden approached and said.'Only in the liver, nowhere else may it work. Trust me, I would not lie to you, I was placed here to guide you through your journey and make sure that nothing wrong may happen on the way. This is a mere gift for the road, since it's long, I was instructed by your host to make sure you follow me as thoroughly as possible until the last of my instructions will have satisfied.'I cannot, I think, I'll go with Konstantin for now. I don't think I can risk this. 'But his body language betrayed a shake, a compulsion to do it, even though it stood as a chance to risk everything. Let me have one sting, one hole in my liver and I will be happy. What other chance will I have to lose control again?' 'Are you still thinking about doing it? Is it not worth it to live, even if it's for a short time with your mind as clear as it has been when you were a child?' 'But Dina, I have never been anything but a drunk, ever since I could remember myself, even when I had been one.' They had to pull him over as soon as he showed signs of getting a prick in. 'Will we follow then?' 'I intend to accompany my friend to wherever he wants to go. I think it would be better for you to return, this is no place for a woman.' 'Enough waste, I shall forbid leave now, and force you to move if I have to.' The hole seated above, in a sudden puff of dirt-dust and tiny flying insects. The green remains of a long-lost pasture could be seen as an afterthought of nature, which had once been sacrificed for their abode. 'I will go then, you needn't follow but I won't stop either of you if you decide it's worth your lives. Konstantin, I trust you to do the same. Perhaps it's the lack of liquor that's making me think this way. I am ready now to leave.' There wasn't any stopping for either of them, looking forward through the passage which led to the river. 'We will have to summon a river carrier for you in order to look for a way out.' 'What would that way out be? I thought we were going in, farther in, to the point of no turn.' Gorrogh almost laughed at the silliness he displayed. 'I present you the creature which will be facilitating your way in. There will be no river afterwards, once it will be assailed by the great trees of Nyliamoure, all three of you will be claimed by them and pulled inside the realms which lay inside of them.' The Nyliamoure gave birth to the living. Ancient creator, birther of trees, who had made a duplicate world of no other living being than his many branched manifestations now lay there, in his own dwelling, resting as he creates mankind again. But for such a task there had only been a failure, for which he had been called, by the many servants and the things which went wrong inside his fever lands. It was a council of the most loyal and devout followers to which Aleksey had been called. They were to come there and shape its reality only as man could, for the being called Nyliamoure failed mankind when it was at its poorest state. It had lain for far too long in a most destructive manner, as they gave birth to war and wrought their hatred against themselves and the world he had created. So who else but them to shape the world, who knew themselves better, who were impure. It was decided that they would be given just as much power as to influence his mind, but no direct control would be given over his world, as kindly as it could be. The trees now rested in a form which resembled them. Just as the entire planet had, bearing unbearable sights of size that not even men could fashion or dare to dream about. Past the layers of skin, the faces, which had already degenerated into dark colors of plumes and oily fumes which followed, lay hope. They've entered it, at the rest of a single crop of the beast's side. As it folded itself closed, they were soon abandoned by any of the outside assistance. For the insides of a living creature, this looked hardly alive. The bones which had been strung on both sides were mere pricks which resembled the marrow, which hadn't even been properly aligned. And to be fair, the giveaway had been the many marks left between the sea-dweller and the grand top, for that's what it been. Beneath lay the creature, within its grasp sutures. Both had been kept together and aimed about one another with a distinctive broad scent. It's been a few steps since they went in. Dina pursed her lips around a match, while the two of them had been looking away. 'Will this do?' 'I can see everything now.' 'Do you think it's going to get any warmer?' 'It's about as warm as it's ever going to be.' She kept by his side despite his numerous attempts to push her away. It was getting on her nerves now, but she waited. 'A piece of cloth here, sticks as well. Perhaps we could make a fire and get warm. Aleksey, do me this great favor and pile them up.' They were at each other's throats. Like a dance, unable to profit from one another's clumsiness. But they would try to outdo one another for no reason. Dina was watching carefully, trying not to blow on the scum of fire too quickly, that she may bring her fingers together at an itch. 'Well, here.' What he found would be his alone. It stared from that rhombus of petals, which had left just enough space for him to stick his fingers in. If he'd do it, there'd be something else to worry about. But it was producing those sticks. He had accounted for that by prodding inside of them. The jist was up. For a moment he decided to tell neither of them of what he found. If he had, they'd reconsider. Dina was shaking. This would take the initiative and force her to move on. She would not do it if she had been made aware of what was going on there. But it moved its legs in a silly manner, be the fact that they may not have been attached. Awkwardly set, he took a bite out of one of them. Bitter and no loss of his sight, this wouldn't be his poison. When he returned with a few sticks of his own both Konstantin and her looked at his purple lips. 'What did you do?' 'I didn't do anything, what are you talking about?' He bent over and tried to rub one of my lips. I didn't resist. 'Of course, this is just, I tried kissing the floor.' 'What for? That does not sound like the smartest idea that came through your mind. Are you sure you're still not drunk?' 'I'm not, please, let me be, I'm still trying to cope with my wife being left alone. She's still there, you know? I never asked you Konstantin.' Before the fire sparked in their pile, he looked ready to spark a fight himself. 'Here? I will start it here if you want me to. Don't make me, Alecs. I'll take you down if I'll have to.' 'Why can't you answer it? Am I not allowed now?' The moans began but didn't distract either of them from this thing they shared. Company was starting to fade with each gulp. As soon as they could see themselves barely transparent, they knew themselves to be pushing through the other side. But out of the three of them, he had not been completely ghastly, but stood there like an amber-roach. He had looked like the effigy of a burnt crop. 'Can you still hear me? Dina? Konstantin?' Waving didn't work, no attention had been drawn to him. No other touch. He was still constrained to looking at those branches, now that they freely moving they tickled the sides of the behemoth which carried them over. It wasn't right being there, the adventurous remains had been filtered through the muck. A much needed clarity has been the opposite of what he desired. In it he felt the repulsion of being forced to dwell near ground pores from which he picked up the sticks and ate them. They were repulsive, but it was the only thing he could do without risking to fall off. The fire was untended yet it burned. A strange reaction had occurred, only which would be plainly the right kind of choice he had in mind. For himself only, he thought, after seeing that beneath the fire, at the base, the scum-rods had released their enzymes, to which he plainly dropped on his stomach and began licking. He had been called there. It was standing there, the guide. 'I thought that was it. Were the instruction not clear enough?' 'Had it been so, you wouldn't have found me here, Ugryumov. But I see that you failed to control yourself and gave in to the old ways.' 'But I did what you asked me to, I stepped in and was supposed to be on my way.' 'Supposed so, but that clearly stopped here. I see that what you've done comes in line with everything which turned out to be wrong. I can't stress enough how disappointed I am that you'd make this behemoth suffer. It stopped because of you, because you couldn't help yourself but pick something which wasn't yours and ate it.' 'But they burned it, how am I the one at fault here? Why aren't they doing the same now?' 'They do not matter at all, don't you understand? I could simply just do this.' In order to prove his point, he shoved his fist through Konstantin's shoulder, breaking it apart in a burst of purple insides. A similar shade as the insides of the stick I ate. I accounted for it in disbelief that he'd been hurt. Gorrogh tried to outmatch him. But his expressions only betrayed the fact that he did not buy it. 'I see. Are you in need for some explanation then?' 'As long as he'll be alive on the other side, I won't care if he's hurt here.' 'Her as well?' 'Don't touch her, that's not the deal. I'll comply then as long as you don't hurt her.' 'Well then, sit down, I'll take care of the rest. You're not as dull headed as to try resisting either of us. I believe you'll make a great addition despite trying to press on me.' His liver had been pierced after all. He brought a piece of the root and stung him with it. No recoil could be had, but it had been worth it. The rest of the journey went on as intended. They were there, but at that point, it didn't matter. Everything was much bleaker, they were much sadder. Without clouds to look upon, in this weird trap, with twisted hills and plentiful grounds caught within one another, there wasn't any soul. It felt like they were held just in a smaller version of the world, as some kind of looking onto it and decide what was to be done. Where the delineation of normal stone appeared into sight, it couldn't be contained at all. No party was there to greet them. Most of the paint of the stone had worn off. It was uncontested, whether or not someone came there to greet us. It happened so fast, their entry almost felt as if there was an intentional unsatisfactory lead, which only mattered for as long as they were there. It outran its purpose, now it lay. 'There, it floats out there. I guess that's going to be our way back, if we're even going to be allowed to return at all.' 'Don't look at it that way, of course they'll allow us to return, why, if they don't.' 'Enough, Konstantin, please, I need to see what this meeting is about. That way, we'll at least settle whether or not our arrival here will have been for nothing.' 'Wait, my dear, please, let me come with you, I'll stay only by your side if it means a thing.' 'Fine, Dina, you can come. But not you Konstantin, I want you to wait here in case something happens. I think we'll handle another entrance to some private meeting, just the two of us. Alone.' 'If that's what you want, then suit yourself. Maybe you're the one who will come back when I'll be bored.' 'Or we may not come at all. That was deeply entertaining as it last, and it had cast just enough of an interesting approach for me to go on. Steps followed, but not as much. Nature took over the place, but the stones were not. As soon as I came at the striking point between the mount of dirt and the green gelatinous spreads, I noticed the metal gate. It was barred, everything inside the place was barred. Whoever had the idea to set a meeting place in such a dark place had been, wrong. I was wrong. After one step, I felt as if I entered another world, which had been much clearer. In it were the missing clouds, around a table there lay twelve empty seats to which they all stood around. With the exception of the right number, which had been intended not for Dina. Not my Dina, but the other, the one who kept by the moor. 'Of course, I should present her.' 'Brining an outsider to our sacred meeting? And you're not even wearing the ceremonial garbs?' It wasn't as much as robes but actually corned helmets and armors of crystal-shaped iron chain heaps which had been stacked together much in the likes of rings. They were bleakly looking but every single one of them emitted a sort of aura which distinguished them. That and each of them wore helmets, which had been capped and rounded, maybe even stranded with a few lines of red. 'The meeting was supposed to take place an hour ago, we were all waiting for you for this moment, before the meeting could start.' 'Why was I the one who had been picked? You could've gotten anyone, so why did you have to pick me?' 'Because you were the only one worth it, from the book of Rgnetts, it's clear, your name was listen on it. A frail man.' 'I'm strong as stable, stranger.' 'Do not contest me, I'm wearing armor. As I was saying, a frail man, sinful, drunk, lustful, grotesquely obscene. Shall I continue?' 'I've seen just enough, I've not come here to be insulted. I am a man and I demand some respect from you, otherwise I shall show none for any of you.' 'You've already done that, by bringing that thing along. Can't you see that the other members are already distracted from this?' And to their mood, the entire atmosphere changed. What had been a nice and plain view of the distant hills from behind their table turned into an erupting mass of fire, brim and melting thin rains coming from the one grand leash-holder. Only a piece of his body raised, the other half being melted almost entirely by the magma. It constantly dripped from inside of him, which left only the certain arrogance of diseased magma flies which came from inside of him. They picked out pieces of his magma-pocks and threw them across the land like venerable seed-spreaders. Dina stepped back as if it frightened her. The gust of various smoke-clouds came into fruition, forming discs which drew in just enough carrions to begin the change. 'May I remind the members of this board that our emotions directly encompass the world? If anything will be judged as being worthy by the creators, then they shall be enabled and thrown across the land the proto-beings made to look and act just like us.' A metal spike in one of the council member's head made the decision so much easier than it should've been. 'He will stay and be allowed to do as he wished. I believe that without him we may never be able to create that perfect ideal world we all carve for.' It was their last chance for a home. Most of them were broken in some way. 'Aleksey, I want you for myself for a few moments if you do not mind.' He followed the council member just a few steps away. It turned the fire and the constant flow of fire and of magma into some kind of deviation of structures. They were making a dreadful spear of solid magma which didn't belong in there. And the others were far too busy staring at Dina to be able to concentrate on what Ekyhr was about to do to him. 'Underneath this robe lays a body which is close to death. As you can see I've lost everything, including my nerves and bones, leaving a gaping entrance which I may never fill on my own. Yours it but in your head, which is why you're so different from us.' On second thought, he believed it would be most fitting to check on him for certainty. 'You've been prodded. I see. Perhaps you're not as strong as I thought you to be.' 'It isn't the first time I've been told this.' 'Perhaps it's better this way, I wouldn't like to contribute to some world where everyone is spoiled. Understood? I could only think of what is right and what is wrong, with each of us, yet there's something which always defies my judgment. Would you happen to know what's wrong with us? Other than our bodies, of course.' 'Neither of you likes me, perhaps?' 'What a silly mention. 'His gushing mouth revealed the sin. He was releasing a piece of himself, as a part of his morality sank to the floor. To him it looked like a limb, which came in the form of some greater cluster of twisted clicks of skin which were tied to one another by mere change. In them lay the ability to grow and to fling themselves off in search for some better host. He was that host, Aleksey. It was a burn-amber parches which came onto his forehead, immediately acting as a watch over the various hidden natural columns that had been claimed. A dark throng came to pass. Now that he was there, he wore the mask, which made his body fade away. Two pieces of some rueful ropes had been wrapped around him in hopes that he would crash into the spare pile of agonizing cruel hosts that waited for him to come forth. 'Approach.' Around him the hurricanes erupted, covering everything but the few patches of ground below him. He would see various pieces of some tree and some weird and unstable key to his desire to drink came into him. Various frogs had been strewn and thrown about, but what made him want to jump inside was the rain of alcohol which came into his mouth. It made him want to be about that. 'We told you could approach.' 'It's all happening too fast. I will come when I want. Now I need to see what's inside of there.' With a sudden kneejerk, he leaped through the wind tunnel and came out ahead to the giant barrels filled with mead. It was what he had desired most, caught on by oppressing dark clouds which joined the winds, they tried pushing him away from what he would give his life for. 'Unearned, it's unearned yet. If you want to be allowed to have a drink for yourself, you must approach us and join our meeting.' 'We're the council members, Aleksey, you're still inside the room.' 'Not until I had my share, until then I won't help you.' 'Mad creature.' 'Do you want to know what happens if this kind of behavior seeps in?' He was shown the world, in its worst shape. He couldn't think himself worthy of what was beneath that place. They were just like them, but smaller, wronged by the fact that their appearance stopped at the head, where searing lashes of blue vine came out of them. 'Why is that?' 'One of your drinks had that in their composition. This is all on you, and you know it.' The pain obtained from being alive in that shape, made them begin rituals of strangulation on one another. Deaths, murder, suicides, what else? Waters lay around but they had been made out of rum. Aleksey trying making for the pools so he may drink but he had failed, unable to swim as far and feeling them fade from his mouth. 'I only wanted a shot, I could be pleased by one.' 'This is not your paradise.' 'It could be if I tried making it into my paradise. Now I understand, this must be my cellar. As far away from Dina, Dina, where is my Dina?' He thought about it, how dangerous it might just be that he could have himself surrounded by numerous images of her, going as far and never ending, a never ending desire to be with her in as many shapes and forms. And there would be other men to drink with but they wouldn't be entirely alive, at least not below them, just so he could have them for himself. I see this. 'This storm, is it one of your minds?' It was just an image but he recognized and felt some thoughts of repulsion coming from him. It was this image which made him think of the worse. Many of the Dinars lay near planted oaks, which had been modified accordingly to the look of the piper. They had been hanged, all of them, together, as a punishment for him to see what happened when his ambition took over too quickly for his comfort to arrive. It was only now that he decided to fight against the many devouring plagues which had almost taken over him. 'Stop hurting her, this is enough.' 'Are you going to give in and help us then? Are certain you won't mind paying a bit off.' The Dinars had been spared, but he had still been unnerved, time after time, until the moment came until he could no longer remain entranced by the vile. One could listlessly defile anything which may be thrown against him. 'Could I at least be given something? I cannot focus, now that I think about it. I thought I was indestructible, but now that I think about it again. No, I need something to stimulate me. Just one drink and I'll do my best to focus.' 'But you've gone so far without needing anything, not a single shot, don't ruin it now, or else, who knows what might happen.' 'I might ruin your plans. Come on, you know how I am, you know what might come out of me if this happens again. What if I keep imagining things like this and I start drowning the poor ones into my seeping liquor?' 'That would be dangerous indeed, is there truly no way for you to control yourself?' 'Below just by my liver, you should see.' 'This is impossible. We had been given a message that you weren't supposed to have drunk from the root. Have we been lied to?' 'It happened after the journey, right as I began to.' As the memory culminated into that spot, something started moving down there. One fully glowing stick attached itself to another one, giving in some kind of weird contribution of some mineral growth which only hosted them in a most peculiar manner. They turned the inner-chamber into a melting pot. Soon they would mix with their surroundings and begin an unfathomable process which turned his body in a time-bomb to prime itself with the spread of the purple-edifying cervix which started cricking, making noises. Aleksandr was no longer human then, just in front of a council member, for a few seconds he had grown those stick-like pupils and the legs. 'You've eaten one of the insects residing in the Cherodamesh. What have you done you foolish creature? Can't you see you have infested yourself with its prime ingredient? It's made out of them, those are its rocking pieces of power which keeps it going.

Have you any idea what?'It began. First the floor, it was no more. The texture looked only like the same prime-insects which appeared there. Nothing was bore onto them, only the meeting point of a few sticks which combined themselves from within. By no account, by no woe, one could watch himself, as if he'd know. What was the matter with the vile creation which had sunken below?'I have to find a way to drink.'The council member couldn't speak. He had been stripped of a voice, and forced to stand in a prison of his mad choice. As he walked, he found out that the world in which he looked was free to that regard. The other council members had been spared. Not of being trapped, though that had been an encouraging thing that happened. Their insides had been poked and stimulated by the bleeding. Internally they all died, which only left Dina who had tried. She bashed the front of the closed periphery, afterwards, trying and trying as hard as she could. It was impossible to look at it and know what ought to happen otherwise. But this disturbance had only mashed his surroundings and forced him to decay. He was looking after her but at the same time, completely ignored her. Where had the musk been? Where was the rum? They hid it somewhere, he'd not be pleased, unless he had it, and they would seize the life of the last council member only to abandon him. 'What have you done?' 'Konstantin, wait, don't get out of that opening, it's going to.' Her voice couldn't have been stopped sooner yet she realized it had been late. By the time she reached him, another way out lay fed. By the same amount of legs, in the same form, always crawling, always forming their sons and daughters, spreading and picking bites at their legs. But they had been immediately been repelled by their sober status. It had been felt, the scent wasn't there and now. 'Don't touch her, she's not yours.' That creature couldn't have been him. It was a disastrous look there laid on him. One which could only bring the poison closer to his mind stopped by the mere interaction of a distant leg with a bottle. They were not dead in that instant yet they refused to follow. Standing still, not to insult Aleksey and the thing he had become. 'We need to talk to the member, I know he's there, and he'll know what to do.' 'I'm sorry Dina but I don't think I can move any longer. Neither can you.' Embraced, to his dismay, they both stood there, being slowly encompassed by the growing, growling, moving sticks. Their clothes had been painted in a deep violet and into some kind of deep purple which had done its best to spread it as fast as it might. It wasn't their lifeblood but some weird substance they carried. Pheromones which attracted and pulled in the growth. Once the sacrilege began, there wasn't any way it could be gone. A patch of land started growing on both of them. 'I see, I'm sorry Aleksey, for what I said, I know it's not your fault you were made that way.' 'Konstantin, what are you saying?' He only pointed at the empty land, to which, for her it looked so distant and vague, that her reminiscence of a place which one was her cradling bed faded. It was patch of land in the distance which was being slowly raised, as if by a bunch of sculptors who fashioned them in both of their images. But he was too busy to care about anything else now that he got what he wanted. Dead spiders on the ceiling. He squeezed them just again, so he could drain his sorrow and the pain. A little interest was shown today, where one lay in the ground, he wasn't about to give them the satisfaction of ever producing a world for that tree. Instead of doing it, he we came to his senses once he had a few shots. There was scorn in his mind then, something obscurely grave entered his realization, memory, whatever it be called. It was a primal fear which removed all the satisfaction from bone, liquor and gut alone. His Dina, which was left there, if only she knew what he said, guild would shatter him in the repulsion and the realization of the unsatisfactory pound of a burn mark he'd dwell in and fiercely be devoured by the flies. Oh the man who'd sent them, he could only spare a moment to find out. He couldn't be helped, it would be a sign of pure agony, this one, to be able to remain alive despite the best intentions to reconcile what happened. But the guilt kept coming back. 'I said so many awful things, I've hurt so many people in my path. Too horrible to contain, my verses are vile, my feet are numb from the distaste there is inside my mouth.' He tried drowning his sorrow and the memories of deaths. He caused them, he wanted to get vengeance on some children and because of him they ended up being dead. The village drunks, they were his brats, they hung from trees, some burning inside their houses. Things which didn't even compare with what he'd done when he was unaware. Some were unnecessarily forced to act to his accord. 'Don't make me, or I'll murder you and harm your young.' A lot of agony lay in his heart. And by the time he'd realize just how low he stopped, there'd be no way for him to mourn, for his words, for what he felt.

His one chance to make everything right faded in as strong as a chance, which resulted in the world being turned from inside out. In the space of the awakening of the grave mistake he'd done, he saw himself morosely gone down the same path he's ever been. Infested with his desire to sink it in another shot, which followed the sticks to which he hid. 'All of them, you shall do as I want and if you don't like it, I will take turns to torture you all.' Aleksey didn't even bother to check the amount of damage he had done. It wasn't even closely related to the disease and the wretch, the likes of which made him fetch not a single straw, agony was gone. As soon as those sharp purple needles entered him, he felt the full blast he had so desperately tried to attain. Down there he was greeted by the intoxicating image of the grandest ruins a single man could've come unto. And yet, he stood, beyond the plain, beyond the gaze. It was all gone again. With their purpose filled, now these stacked on large shocking signs of floating pins served as a way for him to crawl father into the air, to grasp, to touch, for him at last to be free. From the agony of paying responsibility to what he said, he forgot that his words were so strong that they could do something so much cruel and unsatisfactory than murder, that he would be gone. But he was tempted, distressed by the fact that they would sooner or later lose their potency. That was ever a chance for him to go. By his own desire, bred out a charming grace, he pointed at the sky and yelled. 'Breed of the Neukorny, I summon you here, with the sole chance that I may be able to come up with. I've got nothing to give you, but if you would please come here and help me set everything right, I shall make sure you'll eventually be rewarded.' Not a sign, it appeared they wouldn't be tricked as easily. And then it hit him, or had he been more aware of what he had, he could've avoided so many problems. 'Half of this world will be yours.' To which they stepped in from a pile which rose, through which they strolled as if they didn't mean anything to them. Inside a most repulsive manner, they walked and bred the sticks into their smaller look-alikes, with only the promise of what was beneath the rim of the world. 'Half of this place? I see, I see, beneath that fall you shall find the promised liquor, the rum, brewage of ages. With it, shall you suffer something more, in which case, we shall make you want to come back onto our fields? You shall always be welcome for this gift of yours.' He dangled something on his forehead, this giant moving carcass of a yellow-pox, which bore a few smaller heads grown all over his face, which resembled his, but they were horned. Yet the horns came from inside not from their tinier foreheads at that. 'What happened to you?' 'The dirty leash of dissatisfaction which bred with my kind, I'm lucky to be alive, but I feel like I need to rest. For far too many years, I must confess, that I've hunted for a resting place for our kind. We needed to hide in the realms of men, but we found it unsatisfactory, to live much so. Here we can spread and live as we want, without facing the consequences.'Of what was he referring to? He couldn't see what other-worldly color countered his mouth, but he had eaten something which didn't belong to the likeness of fruits. It was harder, junkier, attached to a pair of legs in other words. That didn't count. He slept through the night then and waited until any kind of day could save him. There was so much going on no around him that he had missed while wasting his morning that he finally lamented for his poor woman. 'Dina, what have I done to you now? How could I not have seen you yet?' A rain had begun from on top the mount of dirt I kept looking at. It was difficult seeing it from that spot, standing on Konstantin's hand, but I could at least feel as if I was pushing on some kind of dread. She had been torn at her breasts by the sheer force which came from around the atmosphere. In itself this was something unforgivable. The dread could cower in itself, unable to raise the standards of watching. Forth they went, unable to cull down the call, the strong roots which fell from onto the sky, in its irresolute manner. It could not be permitted any longer for this unwatched and unguarded shaping. He wanted to see what he would see. Breeze spread and sooner or later someone might've put his hand in the right corner, stretching beyond the redemption of the winds. By then they looked upon the future of the planes, underneath the rooted gazes only to see the despot still living and causing just as much trouble as he had started putting forth. Nothing was beyond redemption or beyond help. Whatever might happen or wherever he would go, there was still a chance for him to return. To the rims of the forgotten quires, they howled at the mires only to be met by the dead. As the many women came back from it, caught by images of the drunken stupor, which came to him only now. 'Am I going to be taken back home?' Back through the gate belonging to his own pride, he wretched himself as the dames knelt and saw him track the lack of an awareness to the days in which there was something going in his soul. He felt at least some kind of sensitivity, something akin to some kindness which belonged not the others but to himself. As soon as it had come to him, it was gone and he pushed the gate closed. 'I shall face all of you specters and when I'm done with you there will only be a Dina, my Dina, the only one that ever mattered to me.' He spoke, and as if caught off guard they turned and left, fleeing instead. 'What kind of test was this? Do not abandon me, oh please, I only want to play. I'm so lonely, my dears, don't leave me. I've stopped drinking, I swear it! I swear I've done everything in my power to stop myself from doing it, where have you gone? Please do not abandon me.' He stood in his corner, in the pocket of their hands. He had seen Dina's shadow, through her fingers splashing ahead. It had barely been felt any longer before any kind of repercussion could be dealt with. In as much as a single kind, of bitter mildness. To be aware of how much he had lost, he ran away and hid deeper into her, digging up just far enough to reveal one of the distant uncertainties there lay inside of her. Somewhere deep inside of that chest, there had been a beating motion which called for him. It was the only thing he needed from her, the adoration came from within. For him she would feel some warmth, coming from the depths of his soul. It ingratiated him to feel. 'Where am I going?' The wretch revealed, he sneered and went back. Before the sticks could follow him, he looked at that. His simple legs were stranded on father transparent miniatures of safes which rested there. 'You've come to steal?' Asked the Oldman-amputee, who looked emptily at him, bearing only his tiny laughter-lantern, through which he seemed to speak to another man from the distance, like some long-term connection, to his conversation? 'I'm listened to on the other side; I hope you don't mean to intrude for long now.' To which he couldn't do as much but step.

The Agamemnus

He made a cut at his temple and pulled a small receptor from inside of it. After placing it to his ear, a look-a-like came out of the nearest wall, trying to chase me. Just as quickly as he was free to move he made a slit from which blood started spilling out of his arm. He coated both of them in blood and crisp. Soon they joined one another, and grew to a lisp-sounding frozen solid-moving block of blotched clots. He had only done this because he wanted to get a head start and eat the villagers in the little time he was alive. From all of their sides, as soon as they emerged, a large harpoon precise-speeding blitz-a-had choppers began grabbing them as soon as they appeared in the air.

He was part of the great land fleet and bore nothing of the sort, but the most of all, he wore the curiass of needles inside the back of his rotten blocks of largely diametrical weeding straps that had been made out of the villagers that did not escape. In as much as twenty minutes where he stood upturned, he thought about coming forth and losing himself as soon as he would be allowed to come forth and ask himself what were they looking to find inside of him? First the lance-like trebuchets threw about the first pickets of molten-grass. Most of it began melting. With his best attempts to look at them, he wondered how he hadn't popped a single vein in his mind. With all those piss-poor attempts he could only think of a single way he could try devouring them then. It was happening now. He was about to be set in place and lose no other second as long as it would help him malnourish them from the long-distanced run. About the eighth region where they stood, he shouted as for them to come.

Pulled it by a strange diasbling voice, they had no power and no prowess to resist any longer, as they fell to the long disaster of the moldering steel, which lost its appeal, never coming to the age. It was strange, abiding to the way he acted. But he realised that they hadn't been pulled at all, instead, the entire field had been completely traversed as it crawled towards them at an impossible speed, breaking the barricades they set on the land. Brought about the filth and the roundness of the mindless run, the advent had begun.

For this slobbering magnificent device of vengeance shouted.

'Master, I have come to form them in your name, will you answer after seeing the sign? The symbol of your face which may run aloft?'

It couldn't be anything but the crudest remark he had done, an impossibility of filth that came about, set in place. Never would it matter where thine go. For whatever reason he walked upon the uncanny road of broken backs, as the infantine conquistadores refused to fight back. In their arms nothing rested, none at last. Only the impudence would cost them as soon as they could trust themselves to set afoot aloft.

'You have been answered, scum of woe. Need you disturb me in my time of knowing and of wretched need? Could you not wait for me to finish ending yet the start shall come in? I see there's nothing up to you, must wait. Call upon all of my disabled servants so they might begin the advancement again.'

With that he looked down and saw nothing about other than the needed woe, perturbed by the fellacious corpulent breeds that started feeding on him from the sides. It was impossible to know, never would he throw his life for a petty creature that called itself the infinite ruler of reality.

‘Enough of your insolence, you are but a blotch of no importance. If I were to will it, you would be ended ten times fold. Neither your kind nor manner, never praying after tatters. This is what I have decided to impart on you. Suffer endlessly or I shall take everything from you and throw you back into the filth from which you sprouted from.’

‘But what have I done to deserve it, master?’

‘Nought that I would call uncanny. There are many who would kindly forget, that there was a time where so many wretched like you threw themselves at me, never understanding what went on their heads. I can only see pain in the future and a vileness which might succeed me one day. But do not feign the admiration, pay upon the creation what is worth.

You shall create more altars in the name of Agamemnus until this world will bask in my glory. See to it that nothing might happen again. I shall make it so you realise we’ll be in touch again and again.’

As in that moment, it happened for him to know, there was no hope in this desperation, for him to make anything else out of its putrid life other than this wretched scourge he called it pain. At last, he walked in shame and lasted. Not a single moment did he taste disease. It was a terminal point for him, after watching, the blocks of villager-meat which danced. Upon themselves and their graves, they couldn’t help it any longer as they were paid no mind.

None the matter, don’t push them through the access of stroy. For they might get a feel for themselves and get together in the ploy of disgust, they wouldn’t be trusted otherwise with anything but complete annihilation. Damned they be for that reason, and remind yourself uncanny. Their abomination had no life to look back upon, only dread through which it carried on. Hail it for the summer, wait for it to die, but never mean it after supper, when it feasts on the souls and the bodies of loathing. Woe to him, the vile end, make sure he never rises again from filth.

Why use all that power to make sense out of anything? There was no shame in it, at last not any longer. Just to jutt around the bio-organic table-crass in front of everyone, he shaped it into a locker-extension, pushing through the rims of the outer-planet rims of Chetor. In so-far, he placed everyone done, rightfully disgraced by the others for the sign of weakness they fed him with, he looked at them from their child-like pin. Whereas they were all placed on top of one another, stacked like crops, he alone shone a single uncanniness upon them.

There was a heartless thing to do just then, as the metal cropped into itself. Nothing was forlorn or left in the same manner, as he forced the alloy into him in the span of a few blinks. They were sinking and rising from inside of him, as they ought to have done. It wouldn’t be forgivable otherwise, to be left alone, unchecked and moaning from the quiet. Now it was much better. Without a reason to pile in, Agamemnus leaped upon then, making sure everyone was thinned to a bone.

They poured through the grating holes until none of them remained as part of the same course. It's rather unreasonable to assume they would even try making themselves comfortable in the first place. Which each falling Agamemnon, one of them started giving into the creation of sleigh given form as they pushed on into what would turn out to be the great extension of space. As it pushed on, forth and ever-after, it was impossible to look back any longer, as they curved so long to one point that they formed their truncheon.

It stopped, his large apart got back into one spot and they joined Agamemnus before giving life.

'Not now, not now, not before we approached the perfect experimentation spot.'

So it was agreed that they would carry forth.

A memory was lost. It did not go the way in had been planned for. He remembered serving in the great wars. Before he ended up here, walking the streets with his tail between a coyote's legs, who couldn't even figure out what was his worth any longer.

Compatriot Hern it was what they called him once. But now he resented just about everyone surrounding him.

He was far too concentrated on other things to notice what was going on around him. When they yelled, he stopped. When the guns were fired, he stopped.

And not even once did he question what was going on for the sole reason that he hadn't the slightest ability to fight back any longer. Not after making out of the building in once shoulder grasped against the wall. With all being said now, he's seen the children barely as they might, had they survived with less, he would've come to say something and let it pass. But for not, at the very least, he walked on lonely streets and never said a thing.

My arm is broken. He remembered trying to make it through the window from above. It felt like he would be at least restless and never bother. Not to do something he didn't intend to be associated with.

He stopped near a drinking alley. It was there where he had grabbed by her, just before he fell.

'Careful now, you wouldn't want to break a tooth.'

It was a hard to call it after action. He gave in too much than he could count on. Everyone was missing nowadays. Just a few feet away and he would stand on broken toes.

'Push now, both of your legs needs to pick up on some heat, come on. I think it should work now, give it a try, will you?'

'Why are you helping me?'

'We'll talk about that in a moment now.'

Don't push it, said the voice. It strangled the blood rips of bodies that formed the spinning torpedo in the sky. While the blue reverted, only the most peculiar Nihilistic mater could postulate the color off, driving it away as the far-land manifested in itself. There the Yggers came to be, bloated by their fantastical, almost fanatical code of drowning the dead, they tucked between those bodies, pushing through them until only some of them remained in the air. Some were swollen and left with their own kind, and only a blind neurotic fool would say otherwise, but there wasn't anything going past the bridge.

So many bodies fell but not a single one missed the tatters. Ever after, the sight changed. It was night again and the torpedo began shining like stars. All of which were falling time after time and time again, until nothing remained still, only the feeling that he was being lead on.

‘Where are heading to?’

‘My house, I think I’m going to have to tie your leg down and pick something from it, just so I’ll be sure nothing happens during the night.’

Dead giveaway around the entrance, it almost fell over as they came in.

‘You’re going to have to use my head now. I think it’s getting worse.’

The fluke, the shot, he had taken it just below the lung, from what he could tell it was only getting worse. Much, much worse, it started gnawing at him, pushing around. So many things were left to say and to tell and he had lost all of that confidence until one vague moment where he asked her.

‘What happened?’

‘You were in a fight. They tackled you down, just at the end of the street. Afterwards, two shots and your angle started growing. Something came out of it and got away before I could catch it.’

‘What?’

‘I said they tackled you down and they tried shooting you behind your back. Do you have a problem hearing now?’

‘No, no, of course not, it’s only that I feel like I’ve heard you say something else.’

That and the room was expanding and drawing in at the same time. It wasn't cubical but waveish, creeping between the space of my lost years, where I could see where I had been wrong. Everything, from the lost battles, to where I fled, when I first fell in love and just about everything I could remember then was reflected in that one moment when I couldn't tell anyone about what I felt. I was being manipulated then. As she returned, she gave me something to drink. And for a moment there I was, alone, in that sunken place on the field of battle, asked by one fellow soldier if we were to live a little longer so he could send a letter to his wife.

‘Wait, don't charge.’

My vision was filled with a static moving around, in a luminescent white, which pushed everything into focus. As they darkened I could see ever so clearly what I thought was missing all along. It wasn't wrong, thinking it that way, but I couldn't say a thing. Since he simply charged and got shot between the helmet and his eyes, right in the spot where he lost it all.

Mostly, after a battle finished, we'd run back to the one tramp hole, where we hid with the dirt, hidden as we at bread and butter against egg-shells and chicken loth. Counting each day as we wondered when will it be before the last one of us died. And they were bringing down the sky with each strike. As the show of power pushed through, there was nothing worse than the agony they were panting with, a degenerate way of looking through the mirrors, murky water being being thrown abroad. No miracle would last for long as I was weary of the time. It was necessary to believe that there was someone out there listening.

‘Wake up, come one Hern, Compatriot Hern.’

I was a guest again, at the table, sitting like a man with a bald spot atop his head.’

How many more times will that star fall again? When will the time come for him to pace again through the cycles? It's been so long. Considering his company died, there would've been a chance for some good company.

But good company was nowhere to be found. Only a somber wind prevented him from rolling away. As far as he was concerned, there was no way out, not without the need to reignite some inquisition of some sort.

Some time was taken off the brow. It was necessary to believe that something would come about and deliver the promise he wondered about.

It's been so long since Agamemnon spoke with someone, with anyone at all. He enjoyed company. With all said and done. Even if it was the Colossus, whom he couldn't even hear if he wanted.

There was little to no conviction left there. Everything which was lost could soon be brought there. Now let it be known that its influences spread ahead, and even in dimensions where the filth spread, his influences grew. Symbiosis can only be pushed so far in that charade which spade had become. A black-hole of profanity dwelled on itself and could do nothing but carry its own dreadful alleles which crept on the metal surface as well as the inorganic limbs that began spread. For that's what had become of the sectorial base, in the last stand against the Thorn and its malignant gaze.

Strapped and caught in this trap, the Malglobus Lapplander's face had spread its tendrils and rooted itself into every living, dead and inanimate creature which crept inside of it, long abandoned by the necromancer who had given up on his servants out of the disease that had taken over his mind, for he would serve none and none would serve him as long as they stood in peril of the throng of space-lances, all of which were mightily thrown around, pushed on.

Now the advancement started, as there would be no other great time to prevent this catastrophe from ever occurring again. With little doubt in mind, he wouldn't even dread taking care of the blindness the comets produced. Even those far-spaced, bearing all of their opposite ends, perilously speaking as the four of them continued so.

It could not be thought otherwise, nor accepted any longer, for the reasons being, lost to the watchers. No longer would they dwell on regrets. For far too long had they cleansed the place in the miss-dominant batches of mold-plaster they created their own in.

‘Dark comets feel our woe, this is far more than we would expect out of yet own.’
With it they dreaded not a single second to turn, and all the inhabitants inside of them quickly turned as to hear the echo they produced in their pores. Not a single candle could be held, not to mention anything of the imbricks they pushed through. Like small untattered silken spheres, which only came to be organic as soon as they started pushing in and drawing out. Nothing could be excused about them any longer, as soon as they began.

A dance of uncanny, a verdure which pushed through, it couldn’t be forgiven any longer as soon as they started carrying through the unnecessary asiles that went into their tiny heads. Soon they grew, like fresh sinew pushing through a chewing-bark bubble, all a while whilst holding a small bobbling thorn of their own inside that insidious construction they created. It was the message of their alliegence, as soon as it could be held off. No one wanted to push on farther as soon as they found a way out of the misery, worse than the disease. Living was agony for everyone in the universe, just as Agamemnon had once said, which pleased. The masses looked back.

They contemplated on something that couldn’t be brought. Pure and unadulterated life, something which not even them could deal with nor could they draw beyond. Never through the scowls, not for this mad empire of cowardly beings, could they spare a single shilling of beings that wouldn’t explode as soon as they were there. And it was a dead end, even for them.

As soon as they understood that, it was clear that they had given up on hope, choosing to disregard this sudden surge. It went through and went on ahead, carrying a space-wave which shook the lances in disgust. Though it could not be decided yet, the hierarchy went on ahead to push on and carry through the spores of masses.

‘Look at it, how hard it must be trying to push on through it. Can it not understand that it’s pointless to try?’

One of the comet heads said as they carried on rotating at mad intervals, until they stopped to retire their thoughts in their globular-moving cortexes that moved through their brains. It could not be perceived as anything but a false threat from which not even they could push on from. Getting away would be mad, sad, a destruction they could not recover from. And not to mention any less that there were forces out there that weren’t being impressed by their mad actions, the reaction being somewhat stable for the time being. Yet time was running out. As the effects of the space being torn apart and forced into the two-dimensional space kept pushing through, it was ever so obvious that there wasn’t any way to ignore or push away or lose themselves as they were being drawn forth.

‘Soon we’ll join its two dimensional space and live there forever without leave.’

‘It’s the fate of all living beings, henceforth, it cannot be ignored any longer. I say, we ought to be thankful for it.’

‘But what kind of life is that and what would happen to those inside of us?’

Why, since neither of them appeared to give much thought on it, this was widely accepted as a fact, or a way of life, just as it ought to be. They would most likely be crushed or die during the transition. Caught by the breastwork of the viler ones during their admission of the cystic waves, soon to emerge, they sang their names and it was obvious that they would push forth again. Countless hours passed. It was still not decided upon.

Even looking at them revealed as much as it could be guessed, something was wrong with them. Just by looking at them from various angles, those creatures at the back of the Thorn, they still carried on ahead, with their malnourished sides, eating themselves up as most of the power was being diverted to the flattening of the dimension. And who would daringly go against them, who might care? If not for the passers, soon they would be dead. In as much as the innards which were present there, they basked in their magnificence and never had become aware. For some reason space was being defined as something soon to dine off in morbid seasons such as these.

‘Now, they come forth, beware of it!’

And they said no more. They were filling their hearts with whirlpools of dread of dread long before they came on. It was interesting, trying to define where it went wrong, what broke inside their heads and why they took it to the gut. Something moved in them, after that.

Most kindly as they were thrown as lances, they started departing from their hiding spots, stalking in a never-ending hunt joy. Plummeting forth, they rode on chariots which bore they faced, hid their names, going ahead in the most obscure matters as they pushed on through the masses, in ahead, spark aboard their ringings heads. Agamemnon finally spoke, and then joined the others.

‘Have we finally showed up in time to see the destruction of the thorn?’

‘It would seem so, as far as I can see, they’re advancing.’

So far, the base and the Lapplander’s head could wait no longer as it carried on with its advancement. It would come sooner than expected for it to push forth and land on the needless watch. There thee, beckon the sound-stormed the reverberations produced, as from the side of Illflirnh where the the remains of the dreadfully forgotten idols of death decayed, Agamemnon came to his senses. As others called on him, as to decide, he pushed the changing ghastly remains on the side. Unable to contain himself, he abandoned the others in their feeble quest for a necromancer that's never to be found again.

Instead he chose to carry on. And as soon as the take-off pulled it from there, there was no stopping as soon as they remained.

It came to pass that another voice of Agamemnon joined the chariots in their charge.

Even in the land of storms, there were plains which were uncanny, brushing past the dead. Those who couldn't prevent themselves from being stricken against and pushed by the flying terrors found themselves unable to do anything else but lay in hiding. For those survivors in the fields took it upon themselves to carve rocks and make it so they aren't forgotten for what was to be gone.

'I pray to thee that you may not forget us now.'

The elder Manifold said, he was sure to be looking out of spite and dread at anything he could get his hands upon. For the terrors of the sea were mighty and none could even travel or fight against them, with all being said and done, most of the peoples would be gone eventually. Without a way of redemption, this action gave them some respite. Now they prayed for distant fates, unable to think of anything else.

'Please, oh seventeen lords, do bring us hope. We only wish that we could be brought back home to a world that's ever growing. To a lushful place where the throngs are praying, better yet. Help us be released and pray for us instead.'

With a mutter, against the coming of the monsoon and the other storms, the airvortexes and the strange stragglers of air, those who dominated them never looked back nor paid any attention as they kept on charging through the clouds, pushing through their lightning draggles and knocking down the temperate-balloons. It felt like they were a living contradiction for what was worth it. Not a single man could lay down his arms. For once they had to accept that there was no other way to go. Other than that, but the alternative almost brought them back to death.

'If we make it to their realm, we may face some painless death and may never fret about the weariness the storm brings. This is our only hope for now, can't you understand? There's only this waiting for us, we cannot push it away, we have to.'

'Stop, already, foolish bedraggler, we only have this chance to set it right with our lords, otherwise, we may be lost to worse fates.'

He started recalling the chant and going through them again. Not to spill a single word, he had forgotten. He, the pirst of their tiny settlement, couldn't think of all of them no more. Some of the lords had been stricken down and lost to the unfathomable future they couldn't look into any longer. Woe to them, to those that remained.

‘As the Grand-magistrate Priest of the settlement, I shall beging chanting our conviction. It's important that in this time of terror, we recall the reason for which we came from. We cannot stray, we cannot go away and most importantly, we cannot give in to the disease they shove us through.

Now, for them, I hope they hear.’

And as the Grand-magistrate Priest opened his heart to hear his conviction call, he spoke at last, without a jest or something that might come at any cost.

‘Kikrikiesh, Chehrukan, Hystrioth, Chstroth, Lyshia, Hyumndliyd, I'lliratha Loknmustn.’

He could not fathom where the others went. Where had their names gone through and what would happen if they were lost instead. Bitter words were spoken to him there. As the Priest could not fathom coming up with an explanation as to what happened to the other ten.

‘If our gods are lost, if they had abandoned us, what hope is there for us to survive the storm? Was it, was it?’

No mutter came out of his mouth. It was last amongst all those whom watched. Neither of them could comprehend what was happening to the sea. For at once, the gloomy field turned gray. It feared as much as they had. Something had spilled outside their land. From various open pores, tiny springs of filth came out. It was the flood, which tained the ground and started spilling it. No matter how much it dragged on, it couldn't be stopped nor contained any longer, as much as they had filled with their lives with hope and wonder, none of them would be strong enough to fae it yet. Danger ran through the course of their lives and it couldn't be helpet. Yet time had come, now that they were aware.

‘What shall we do then?’

Our gods are fleeing, that thing is unnatural and stinks of rot. Were we not better when we had a chance to fight back? I feel as if there's no hope any longer for hope had left us sink alone. Could we not attain some piety and admit it already that we may not be able to rise from this sink of evil?

We need to die.’

‘Cappon, do you not understand what that means? If we die here and now, there would be no one left to govern the land other than those flying abominations, who might churn it and strike it down.’

The power and might left them. Amidst the ruins they had slacked. It looked as if the entire place had been ripped out of the ground by some far more distant winds that never served anyone at all. Breorugh came near. He sighted the wolves who had already crossed the scar. Time had already decided for them.

For all the glory in the world won’t matter.

‘We have to carry on today. We have to take the baby steps and settle in as much as we can push ahead.’

It was this loss of interest which carried on, a problem which only stroke their minds and their ego as some refused to die.’

‘What is that?’

A reminiscence of the came came over them. Just at the edge of the most distant cliff, in the land of storms.

As a gloomy figure came out of the mist, it pushed on.

‘It’s strange, isn’t it? It’s so wide and light’s coming out of it.’

In a time of need, this was something neither of them could believe. But somehow it appeared there, for no other reason but to contact them. As if they were needed to beware this world and think for themselves, to grasp at it and hold onto their fate and for that reason they chose to claim it and carry on.

‘We shall see to it that naught is lost, come on, we need to carry on.’

Towards the lighthouse they went. Carried by weak feet as they worked their way through, but they neared the pointed where they had to organise and think of it. Something wasn’t natural about the lighthouse, for what appeared on the half-way point, where the stone changed to the ruin of meat and the wild growths, rested the wormling atrocity without a head. It pushed on and dangled from far end to far end until a light popped from the open end where it pushed on from. And it grew, and it grew quicker than expected. From that abomination nothing even remotely quiet could be directed. It started regurgitating some of the flood. Inside of it the various sacks only started popping now, forcing the murk to overflow out of it. As much as this could be directed towards them, this was for their hope alone.

It was something not even them could face, neither of them being pushed away, or facing the rummaging wrath of the disease carried through the air.

‘So I see that there is indeed no hope I see today.’

What a pity for them to live and learn it through the worst matter. They were destined to fade away and die in the worst possible manner. Just like the stricken lords who fled away, somehow they knew that they realised there was no way of getting through. All of it was lost to the blood and the sinew, the formless sky which presented itself as a dark-violet, purple lightning strikes coming their way. Some were lucky enough to get it through, others had died as much as they could shew.

‘I suppose there’s some incantation that might spare us?’

Spare no more, it came to it at last. He laughed just thinking of them, how madly they had gotten now.

Agamemnon kept his evil eyes somehow cut off and strapped inside the ground. Hundreds of them remained, and he had watched this turn of events with the strongest pride from which not even he could drag on. Woe to him, for he had found some redemption. It was this alone which helped him get the reaction needed, thrice the fact. He laughed in the chariot as the others didn’t even know what it had been about. Woe to them and whoever might listen, to the disease and the prized possession between his claws. He wasn’t about to give in nor abandoned hope for what was brought to him. In time of either the globe had yearned, for a dark savior to push them all the dark of churn.

Chum water now lay contaminated by the flood. Everything was lost to the men and to the aquatic creatures who attempted getting out of the way. Though they might not be calm, they were about to strike themselves down as the various diseases progressed into the mind erratic nature they were thrown in. Blasphemy, blasphemy and blasphemy again, now that they started going at it again, power had been restored to the point they had lost their own necks to the cutter.

‘Oh, I see, there’s no other place to be but this amongst you my dear brothers.’

Said one Agamemnon as he enjoyed looking at what was happening around them. Fierce fights erupted from various spots. Other four-sided, head-entrapped comets drew in as they were called to step in and force the Lapplander base to stop. They knew they could be called into battle, and they had dared not even take the slightest approach as to stray away or betray the thorn. How could this be then? As for the spears still showed no signs of being ready, they couldn’t be obeyed just yet. It was a supreme kind of blasphemy from within that they conveyed no other emotion than the dreadful angst they produced as they dragged on the battle.

Space was being encumbered in a stricken plantation from the rims of which the first signs could be seen. Various planets had already become circles, stars as well, it was damning to see so many dots and to think of them as being billions of lights years away, only that they could never expand from the tiny dots they had been spread into. And the people looked like insignifiant bacterial ants that could never be counted upon no longer.

For there would the spears shake, there was still something to do yet. Out of his many failures, within the outlet of him, Agamemnon wondered. Just what had he done wrong?

Seeing how even the most promiscing servants ended up bowing to the creature the Duke had become. It was a failure. Without taking into account whatever else he's done. While there was no contender, he pushed on through. It rolled over the tongue, trying yo get out of the way.

And what a strange replacement for the kingdom this was. Out of courtesy he stood inside his new court as goverened the others. Most of his servants had already been put to work as they began constructing his am acopolis. It was decided that his long chimera like form would surround all of the most unnatural places this planet would bear. It was more than he needed, as the hybrids started paving the ground for him to walk on. Obsidians surrounded him already, standing near their new ruler, bowing and worshipping away, as they used their malginant devices to shape the various instances of mold into forms of his own affair. The creature the Duke had been was now pleased. For the first time in a long while he had received his servants with nothing more but admonition. And this place, this planet would become lushful one day, because of his desire for restoration.

‘Carry on, hybrids and take the human servants with you as well. They shall enable me to do as I want without breaking my promise to this land.’

As the Duke recalled, he had promised to make this planet the sole survivor of the great proeminence of space. Life dwelled for far too long in its unnatural sense, it was his destiny yet to collect. So from the past primordial statues of their own, he collected from their statuesque bodies hearts that were living, animated by the mold. And in there he felt it deeply sunk. But it was there, in the statue-hearts that he felt the jealousy of Agamemnon which was deeply sunk in all of them. To no great receit, he held the hearts and claimed them as his own. Longer than thought, these would become restlessly useful for what he had in mind. As the same reason approached, the Duke was here but he was also there.

Peering as the mass of corpses which emerged in the court and kept piling, unaware that the fall had to have done something to them, but in truth it couldn't be stopped. So far it only appeared as some kind of memory not even him was interested in any longer. Far in between, it was their problem to deal with. He looked aboard and saw the plans, everything around the planet was placed just right. Some pointed peaks exposed the unnatural shingls drawing out. From each of them eyes and mouths sprouted, brought in by the hybrids who started mering with the land.

‘As I thought it, they would eventually be embedd all over the place, no longer distinguishable from what’s real and what’s been constructed here.’

It was his dominant spot, the place that brought him back to life, the place which made him life. Before dragging its body in as many directions as possible, there was nothing he desired more, other than to know what was coming forth? If not the ether in the air, the strangeness that conveyed, or the planet breaking apart, to which he asked.

‘What is the meaning of this? What trickery have you emplyed, Obsidians?’

‘We have done nothing of the kind, ruler. We have only praised your name and spared nothing from your gaze. Ever since you came, order was restored, no war would travel to our ears anymore.’

But it was more vile than that.

The Obsidian came back, turned and revealed a giant expanded head belonging to a man which was connected to one of the small ape bodies they bore. In it another Obsidian was being formed, one of the giant ones, who managed to prematurely create a slit inside his head, which made it grow past the dread.

‘It happened before, master. Unlike us who need to get out of their bodies, they, they. They do the unquestionable and that we cannot fathom to stop. While growing they release some unnatural gases known as deriliournous and metahnolium which attack the chemicals that keep this planet from falling apart.’

‘Need I make my case clear then? They need to extirpated, abandoned, thrown, left to govern on their own. Throw them into the drift of space, let them be lost in the vacuum before they release more of it.’

‘It’s late, it’s already too late, master.’

‘How could that be? Need I do everything myself? Certainly you cannot be that incompetent of a race, after all.’

He reminded himself of the crater and the various holes the hybrids dug in. Everyone back away as he got up, lifting himself with all of his might, until all of those moving tendons spirtaled inside the earth, wriggling as they started compressing the core. Such force only made them fear, as they looked and neared their previous sizes, shrinking away but only in the case of the giant ones, less of those who were far away, the hybrids and the creatures hiding in the brains of humans. Even some of the planets and the sattelites in the system got pull in by his force. As he did not will the planet to be lost yet, to which he angered, even those that were after, some destruction had to happen out of some will. It couldn’t be forgiven any longer, nor shoved out of the chilling terror they showed. Dread and agony took forms of their own as the Duke became more violent.

After taking the appearance of a rosen-garden, he became as wild as he could get. He, just like the hybrids would remain fused to the planet, growing inside of it yet. He had reached the point where he didn't move. His perched mouths stopped but those on the shingles still stood. From them he gave the orders yet. And from every angle of the planet he looked at the wretches, without daring to say anything, but let them cherish the moments left there. Soon they would be taken from their meaningless advance. It interested him so far, hearing about their antics and politics. More so about the transparent body after-skins they left behind. Even looking at those was more than magnificent, with everything kept in minds, they shared something more.

‘We have to choose one of the parties, to ensure that there will be order and the constructions go as settled. Duke, may I speak plainly if you do not mind?’

‘Say what you may, and I shall listen.’

‘There are still a few that would not take in your advice. They would destroy everything we have created in your image, giving in their selfishness and avarice in order to fashion images of their own.’

It was already seen, but he didn't interfere just yet. Strange beings as they were, he found them amusing, by the way they acted in and everything that ever pushed out of their unnatural bodies. He wanted to feel more. Tempted by it, he took a bite out of one, seeing how it would react.

It was plain; they couldn't remain there for long at best. Though it could not be decided, for what's worth, they gathered all the piles of comets and the only dreadful sing.

The stomach of a Ruminant, standing as it got divided. It couldn't push outwardly to its host. It wanted to please, to get through them but at the same time it refused to show any light compassion. They could only reap the aftermath after the fire.

‘Lord Charlson is now dead. Bless his soul for the eternity he shall rest alone. Make sure he feeds on each of us on his way home.’

It had been a slaughter of fire, but his house would be rebuilt in time.

‘They say all of the servants died during that fire.’

‘What a shame, isn't it? Since the boy is the only one who survived. He's the sole inheritor of the parcel, well. At least he had the garden to tend after even though he's all alone.

You can never make do with them in the absence of the company. Poor lad will have to live a lone, not to mention.’

‘He'll need someone to take care of the boy.’

The fat Baron approached, rummaging through his small enshallee, grabbing something uncommon to show the boy before getting out of it yet.

‘Will you do me the pleasure of presenting yourself to me?’

‘Who are you?’

The Baron cut through all all of the strawpeople as if they didn't matter to him in a price. It was a desperate attempt to get closer to the fortune his so-called parents left behind. Count Krokenhower had wasted no time in planning and betting everythin on a single night. Suffice to say, he's done it pretty well, the child knew what he was getting and where he could spend time instead of trying to get away. 'Pardon me, Baron but I must decline your effort, whichever it may be. As a matter of fact, I'd like to be alone for now.'

Distancing himself as far as he could go, he refused to talk to everyone and gathered around the pile before him. It wasn't that far off when it happened. He was looking out of bounds, as desperate as he was to get a word in, he wasn't listened to, nor would he pretend him to be his father.

'Must you always make those perfidious, lurid noises, my dear boy?

Have your parents not taught you better before they took off?'

'I suppose they haven't, because if they had, I wouldn't be here. And look, I've no other place to place.'

'If you loathe me that much as a father, why don't you leave me then boy? I can't stand listening to the sound of your voice any longer. Your presence here is ruining my party.'

He shoved the door open, revealing the same sight again. The servants took off for the night and on the tables the bodies continued to rot. It was only normal that a son would be allowed to see what the butcher had in mind for him to pry in and ruin. This so called son was falsely pious and lost, he was crass on the mind and touched. It was a wonder, to which he angered himself, whether or not he had been his real so to begin with.

He was throwing a fit.

'Leave my sight then, if you cannot behave, I'll have none of that here, not at this hour. There's someone I have to deal with before long and I cannot allow a child to interfere with my plans.'

'Will you just go now?'

'You wouldn't mind giving me a hint at it at least? Perhaps a bump in the head, perhaps, I could go around.'

'Wherever you want to go boy, go ahead and mess around, I won't interfere with you at all.'

He scoured the plans and only came about when he needed to, this being the least of his concern for the time bein, the boy wasn't meant to survive the turn. Filled with the mild essence, the disturbing disgust only came. They were bash-headed and rash. And this rashness couldn't be controlled any longer despite what was being said at that.

There was a small trot. A puddle it did not step in. On and on it trotted forth. For what was an enclosed area, Agamemnon set forth. He had a chest heaved in metal and encased in blunder. With a pair of wheels, the crate carried his head on top as it melted yonder. No one dared make too bruske a move. They couldn't register orgnaic life as it did not exist in their complicated school of metal assembly. In there, the antrodetts learned how to create at their pace, the parts needed for the lines of the great citadelian-necropolisian worship crawl they lived in. Deep into the crevasse, where they couldn't see mass but felt the vibration of steel, they waited.

'Identify yourself.'

Not to be mistaken any longer, no word was spoken yet. It's been observed already. We weren't made for this kind of world at large. No point was conceded. As they gathered around them, it was more than obvious that they far surpassed his form. It was both bothersome and immaterial to argue against them.

Conflict was more than futile in their circuits, hence the scanning.

'You won't find anything wrong in my system.'

That they could see. Nothing could be detected. Yet he, of all, Agamemnomyius, formally called, had nothign against them. As a matter of fact he only wanted to test them further and test something he bore.

With each passing moment, the indepenence of rust could draw near. Any moment now, he thought. He could bask in it and feel the waves. Ever so near to it, he desired it more than ever before.

'If only you knew what's waiting for you, perhaps you'd stop threatening me as an anomaly and begin treating me as a threat. That's the only way you might get a chance, a spot, a trance for my throat.'

Never before had he been so blunt. He confused the contenders, the antrodetts were in a desperate need to be fixed by any means they could. How tenebrous this place was. It didn't look like a factory for their kin but a strange charade made for strange skin-dazzlers to move in. Such as they had, but they were different. After noticing them for the first time he came alone, drawing near. He stopped interacting with the machines, instead picking on hints of the making, wondering what they were. Out of curiosity, he wondered at it and instead of approaching he spoke in their minds.

What are you?

'Who said that? Show yourself, I got an anitique electron-pistol. Off brand, off-shot, I could take your life at any point so don't move and don't make too soon.'

No sudden noise there. He was aware now that they weren't alone. His family was tended to, yet they couldn't make any possible noise, not if this rabid looker showed signs of pushing forth. For his own sake, he hoped for less. It was dangerous, way too soon, pushing past the obscure lack of nuance, the distraction ahead, the dead. He had piled a few of them. About everywhere around him, there were sacrifices that had to be made in order for his family to survive. I wish there was another chance. To escape this place and make for the front sea, whence metal paled, no comparrison remained and even life faded once it came into contact with it.

Upon its waves the stairs would be revealed, leading on foot towards the rims of paradise.

'It's a dream, confusion; you may not escape this disillusion as long as you fancy yourself with them.

Abandon them and draw near. I wish it was somehow simpler than this. But you have to do it.'

Now he spoke aloud and tained. The poor sop's mind who left them behind. His daughters wouldn't forgive him. He knew far better than that. With the lack of certainty, he looked on and saw him. No longer attached to a metal rail, he wondered what the feeling was. Who was watching and what did they want? It was a glory he could not contain. Another mind was dominated in his name. Now, now, to blush no more, this was too easy, he wanted more.

'Walk with me and don't look back. We'll see to it that the'll be protected on your way off the track.'

'Where are you taking me then?'

He asked the levitating head. If this was a dream, he wondered what the meaning was. If it wasn't, he could not try taking off. He was sick to his gut, his body was rocked by a force from inside of him. It wanted him, so he could tell. Four turpentine leashes started grappling around his bones. Inside his neck, and in the throat, he felt the frogs start appearing on their own. Finally he could release and feel the peace of masses. Infinitely better, this pain conveyed more than enough emotions he needed to be there. Just thee and thee, look ahead, another tormented soul joined them. Though his skin was made of flakes attached and unnaturally large nails shot through his body from every angle he could take at last.

'Done by the machines, it was done by the machines.'

He spoke less but didn't understand. This place was mad, no less than it should be said. A gruesome pack followed on their perched feet. Small vermin, rat-like in appearance and tainted to their skulls. They lacked some wild awareness which turned them around. With each death, and each of them had been crushed by either of the strangers, more of them started instantly growing from their overblown puckors of meat. It could not be believed any longer, the amount of mental agony was concave. It dug up in their brains, leaving them standing. A brute awakening and a short-sighted motion, then the voice, in as many sprangs of pain and appearing veins as it could muster.

'Take the point where they will eat you, I want you to devour some of my mistakes.'

Gut-pint, that's what he called it. A primordial gut-pin he carried on him. He used it on the man, enabling a quick way towards a complete encephalic suicide, bred out of a gutter. It was absolutely filthy and disgusting, just as he realised that he was already pushing the pin through the man, he came to feel his inside rise again. It was a trap. His head snapped and out of his skull a single sappling of skin came out.

Why would this matter in day? How could it not be conveyed by any other mean? Other than this disgusting pain he felt they were spreading false rumors about him, trying to pin-point his exact location. To get clearer about it, as soon as his brain matter ended up dripping on the floor, with the sappling as well as everything else that was about his face was kicked in by their voices. Mouths of Agamemnon be damned. Each of them were attached to hundreds of neurons, all of which were enclosed in the unnaturalness of the trap.

He stumbled out of his cradling horde of pins. It was hard to whip and whap, to hear the raindrops falling.

Somewhere in the universe you could hear his voice.

As it echoes across galaxies, Agamemnus set forth.

‘My children, I have a good use for you at last.

You are to charge forward and take over the spears before the others and infest them with yourselves.

Now it’s the time, the Thorn shall not abide to hear of our jealousy and the madness we provoke.

For whom is him to threaten what we’ve made and whom we called forth?’

And thence they came, not to remain or feel any pain. They started marching forth under his name, to the banner, joining all the forces that were brought there, the voices and the Lapplander. The thorn would be broken in half, destroyed and annihilated in sight, until no trace would possibly exist anymore. Who could stand against him and fight? Agamemnus only trampled everything in existence with the help of his sheer size. He was alone in thought. Unmatched then, even his simple intervention could end the conflict without there even being a chance for either side to join the fight. It was fair, it wouldn’t matter. He created it in a distant part of space, out of his mind.

Without delay, he chose carefully what to say next.

This headstrong bullwark of a creature managed to defy the physics though a trust by sending not one but two swollen faced defier. Mildly caught in themselves, wrapped around and bitterly trapped, only a big of his original will carried on with them.

Some of them appeared like dances, trying to take in each other’s craft. Through unsung bodies they only pushed themselves past the part in which they carried. As undulating as their approach and appearance were, they came from anywhere. And just about everywhere where they came to, a sense for each scout, they were the architects and the others were not.

Despite the charade and every possibly failed state in which they tried pushing themselves away, they would not relent. And would they ascend if given a fair chance? Would it matter if they tried at all?

In that land, the perched land, as given to them by a stranger who couldn’t even decide whether this life which crawled inside his chest, the one that wanted to break and rest mattered.

First man which came from them, the one given life from a piece of blubblery swollen mutt came to life. In itself, there was nothing even remotely near, that to fear his enclave of skin-cans. Through every corpse they brought out of themselves, more and more could be given life until nothing about them would be sworn. It brought ever so more of a deathless stare. Formed around their crowns, the field pushed the vermin away.

A grin-field, for those that counted, from within it, an inconsistency of mass protruded as it was only followed by the utmost dreadful example of primitive incissors, in them rested the future. And without them there would be no legacy to be left behind. Blind he be for the same reason he cannot approach. IT pushed out like a sea of mad roach, dismantled from the get-go. They who fancied even the mere distruction couldn't sverve to him at ho'.

'Him, he shall be made again.

I do not like his brow, turn it into a pillar and plant it down. Allow the rest of the body to grow, that alone should allow them a missonary's verge to push ahead until it shall be called from what's being sought.'

'And what does he desire? Why were we sent here?'

'A city of the kind, blasted it if we shall not give him the chance to do as we please, do as we must. And never cast the glance of evil again, not in this land.

He knows much better and for that I swear as well. But do not tell the others of the wells that might come upon us or we might find ourselves dishellved and misted with the runts.'

'I seek to know the future after dust, If I could only get a word in.'

A man approached. He was barely made from glassy-field bones. It was clear from the way the muscle pores, the river of blood flowing through him and the emerging other kin of theirs that he presented, that the creature felt he was mistreated. For what reason need there be more? Could there be a chance that they were not even hoping to present a chance for him to get off?

His wrists be strained by a force not even he could account for. And to push through them again would be more than painful since they showed no sign of caring. It would be much worse, to say the least, to face himself after suns would go down. In the midst of night, in uncanny dayy, he carried on without being dismayed. It was all he wanted and nothing more indeed. His property of being was theirs and there was no freedom he looked to achieve. An unnatural woe called to him.

The man presented himself again.

After seeing the mad changes they brought here, this is what he understood. He shouldn't be shaken by it, not that he could even hope to care. It was dreadfully painful but this is what he said.

'I want to die, claim me just as you have taken my brothers and sisters. I don't care how it happens or why. I don't even care how I might end or why this might happen here after all.

But I must as this of you. Need I be spared? No, I have no desire for it, I only want to be reunited with the ones I lost. And at no cost would I spare myself a brother or anchor my soul this way.

I'm searching for no redemption because I know that I'll be away.'

Despite presenting himself to them, he couldn't account for the pain he felt, or the heaves that were thrown against him. Somehow, this lurid man remembered a life that's been taken away from him. He had his memories on which he clanged onto. And normality only pushed on and on for the shortest time.

Before too long he couldn't account for it any longer.

'Is that insignifant thing in a desire to die so fast?

He's barely been alive for how long now?'

But he others plainly moved away. Little interest was shown as he but dismissed. There was so much to be put on. Other than the foundation of temples and the giant livable areas, they had to even deal with terraforming everything in their wake. Placing the living being in a less than primitive state was something they couldn't account for.

Better or worse than what it had been called. He would spare nothing and tell of nothing more. Still present in the company, they swore to themselves and stepped aside. To the Isles then the bridges chimed in every possible direction they could. It was as degenerate as it seemed, unpleasant.

No company was involved. Moreover the bridges fell, the buildings got taken off and nothing remained pure. Something lost its mournful look. It came to then only them, that they should try pushing everything as far away as they could. Undisciplined action could last.

Upon a summer field they called. Upon encountering some of them refused to talk. They were many and we were few. Against them had we faced, we would've certainly lost more than I'd like to get through.

As for their story only now could I call to it, alas, I must cast away what I can remember, as they will shatter whatever intention I ought to bear. To carry on with what I remember, first I have to swear.

'I remember looking after the dusk. Though my memory is fading, I think this might last a while. More than a few issues have to be addressed before I'll let go of them.

It's been a while since I thought of it yet. I am an old man, though you may have heard this account from others such as I am.'

They would marry flowers as perfume inundated the poor passing of the weather. There, in the distance you could, no, it wasn't like that. Now, after such a long time, after so many years of weariness, their control couldn't be dealt with. We couldn't fight them any longer, now that they got stronger. With all their vile plans, not a single soul could ignore them anymore.

Leave and be exposed to many. Stay and watch everyone join and up the streams heading to the last caves. Most of them halted the production of the statues, which left us paranoid and exposed. Without them, we could know no beauty and that's what they hated in the end. Without something as cheerful as this would be, our blessings were halted. It went try, the well could not die from a prick in the finger. And I know it even less, now.

'My daughter used to love the wheat-farm, where our wheat-cattle loved growing around.'

It was a dreadful thought, seeing how it ended, thinking of her again. What would she have said, my dear Mary, if only you knew what happened yet.

Mary Hormdun walked arousedly morose. Her heart was beating around the slaps of her braids, but she knew better than to say.

'Father, something happened here.'

'I see.'

We weren't the first ones to observe that this wasn't the same place we used to be in. Seeing how for the first time, I lacked the courage to tell her of my dying heart, I now understand, that she wasn't addressing them. I was shocked to know that I had already lost my heart and that I could barely fathom looking out for myself, let alone for her. As if I were met by someone I knew a long time ago, I chose not to do it, for my own sake, I knew better than to address them.

First the many but then the few, some of them drew near but they hadn't said a thing I knew. He was barely a face that couldn't stand straight. It was more than obvious what it wanted for me, for this waste could not deal with itself. Trashed or lost, I knew that I could but convey a single word. I said: And you should know that I spoke no tongue here, especially since they were sounds mostly, or in part. It understood the frequency and chose to say.

'I see that you are one of them.'

The head stood on a body of sticks and most of them were so thin that you could miss them. Wrapped around every bar rested his face, though it was twisted and left no distinct sound that might come to be questioned. Less than that I knew what I wanted to ask. But I had not done it when I did before.

'My hand was lacerated by a weird tiger. You wouldn't happen to know where he went?'

'Was he the one who stole the provisions from the town?'

From one of the faces wrapped around his arm:

'Am I the one you're looking for?'

At this point he wasn't old, therefore, it didn't take long until he could finally approach what he was thinking off. For that reason, I could say, the way he looked at it was the way he spoke.

'Indeed it was, but why have you hurt me?'

Why.'

A stop dragged him to be a token. Reasonlessly approached by it, he chose to poke his nose and leave a mark. When had it happened?

Around a few months ago, that's the earliest date that could be pointed back to.

To be clearer than someone might even come to think of it, hear this, and hear this well:

'I was standing on my desk, writing my confessions. Up until that point in time, I hadn't written a lot. At best I could only remember pinning down a few words at a time, but there hadn't been a way when I had not been in motion.

And never did I take a break. Despite the least clue of a satisfaction, I knew better than to beg myself.

About the place and all around the watch I knew, it was time.

I hated working at the mill and if I think of it now.

I saw them there as well as I could remember drawing in. They were, how can I say it? They were the head on the wheel that turned, with each wing spanning it in reverse. Sickening though it was, it made me realise that time had come for me to stop worrying about it now.'

There were some other entries, but they were meaningless for those who prayed. I for one would have to say, that through all the mess and the comotion, there was the realisation he came to. With all the literature he had read, after coming to accept that he would never amount to them, the man had almost resigned.

He was not delusional, at least not in his lifetime, as he wasn't actually made for it. Instead, what he chose was this. Despite the praise he would receive from some people he would take it from, he knew that their opinions wouldn't amount to none. Compared to the right ones, he wasn't great, he wasn't solemn, as he was only a hack. It saddened him that he would know it.

After all he hadn't been good at a thing. But this he came to accept as a man, and many would know it, as a quote after him.

'If you're not meant for it, you won't make it.'

So he thought, and it turned out that all the praise had amounted to none. After the initial wonder, clarity came after and he turned to the ones he admired most. And most proficiently of them, as it came to him, he accepted their critique and bowed his head. Without saying anything, he knew he was naught but a mistake.

It dawned on him for the longest time. It happened nonetheless, for, despite knowing it, he couldn't control it. Knowing he would keep doing it with or without anyone to impress.

'Less than these pretentious fires, I see that there's a way in. If only I could record the history in some way I could admire it, then I would stop forcing myself to read.'

After each draft he painted such an image that did not even come to stare. They were all blasted things not many came to take. He took for granted that he'd know of a way he could turn on whatever he wanted to show them.

'No, I need to tell you the truth.'

During one night he spoke it in a letter.

'Please don't make me endure this way. I say, please, let understand this, before I could even get past the first lines.

I only did this for my satisfaction at first. It was meant to serve as a retreat. It meant to get me on my feet. And when the prospect of making money came, I can't let you know enough how absorbed by greed I have felt. This much I know, I feel, do. That whatever genuine thing I knew got killed and drowned by avarice and my desire.

‘It made me realise that I was both selfish as I would aggrandise myself for the longest time. My daughter and my family had been mistreated by myself. Whatever reason crossed my mind, somehow, I’ve come to realise that it was ill found.

Thence I came to the conclusion, that I would ruin everything If I were to choose it. And never would I pick a quill. Never would I feel anything more than what I would have to feel. Whatever desire one might have will always be drowned by the petiness of avarice, which threatens to kill everything you have. No good intention could come of it, I know.

For that, I have chosen this, never to correct or long for it.’

As much as he would turn and scowl his chance, he picked up on it and chose to get back on the trance. The old man reflected on so many things, right where the others stood. There and only then could he look out of the way and fear. What might happen and what might appear.

‘I have lied about who I am.’

That is the part he remembers well, once when he had the chance to spread his writings, he took it and flipped it out. It was true, what they thought of him, what they would do. Even a name could spread it and push him through a life of fortune, one of worship. He purchased but a mansion, he exploited the poor. He had done so many things throughout the days he got absorbed by it, only then he understood.

It felt so unusual, a lucid dream threatening to end. And now the most important question.

‘What if it were to end? How exactly would you feel? What would be the repercussions of this life you lived?’

Truth be told, he was unsure. He was weak, pathetic, esoteric, and unknown. Old or young, he couldn’t tell whether or not, if chances ended up that way, if he were to give all his fortune away. Many people would in his spot, others wouldn’t, at last. It didn’t matter what others did. It only mattered what he would do with them if he found himself backing on ill feet.

‘I seem to have lost my will, whichever it would be. I cannot answer that question.’

‘Then the tiger shall come and take the land, the one that’s yours and theirs and move along. You need to know as much as least. I cannot fathom drawing any more through this cyst. Your daughter will be taken away. I fear that everything you own shall be lost.’

‘What of my mother, what of her grandmother, what of my family? Everything I’ve done for them.’

‘Lies, that’s what they are, lies, let it be known that this is the truth, whoever you fancy yourself as. You’re using excuses, and sooner they’ll one. One day they shall find themselves knowing about you, your past and everything you have inherited from the generation that passed. They’ll look at everything you’ve done, you’ve written up until this point.

And despite everything you claim to have learned, they'll see then that you were never able to grow. It's a hard realisation you should never cease to remember. Lies will bring you nothing, you're not a keeper nor are you a defender.

Nor in prime, not the master of the cruel or the blind, you've forced your way through, as a plague would.

It was unfair for everyone involved in here and for every time you used them.'

But why would they care of hearing everything again? Why had it mattered if there was no escape? They would be better men regardless of what they read.

'I could try to be like them.'

'Unlikely, you could strive but you will still remain blind. Can't you see it now? You've taken a wife of their own and even if she wasn't, they would've known it as the first sign. Tricks or the betrayal, whichever could come first, know that you cannot be trusted and it's pointless to try the verse.'

'Please, allow me to explain.'

'There's nothing you may do in writing, no excuse that could be pinned down. Do not seek any pity, as you're undeserving, do not seek to hide. Know that you are one of them and whoever might hear of this, let it be known as well.

A second clue, which be, alas, is this; hiding behind their back, pushing through and taking something that isn't yours. Need you be reminded more?'

There was only one thing he could approach there, he couldn't take it away from anywhere else. The truth would some days be denied and he could use it.

'No, I'm sorry, I cannot think right. I don't know what to do. I'm not smart enough, I don't know what to do.

I keep beating around the brush, I'm petty. I cannot change who and what I am. What good is there to simply reiterate what they know? What was I placed here for?'

'Man of faith and no cloth.'

But that was about all the time he got before the sticks retreated and he flew in the distance. Night came along and no one was spoken to about for days.

'Father, are you going to write again?'

'I do not know my dear.

I wish I knew it. I wish I were not banned and beaten, disobeyed.'

And every time he looked at what he had created, he realised something of the filth that ran through his veins. It was something which he inherited, a shock that he hadn't come to know until yet. An embrace he had no control of, but he would not live his life in regret.

'Stop that.'

'Father, what is it?'

Her daughter inquired. That was it, that was the only thing he couldn't explain. It wasn't a conscience, but a man he remembered, the only hope yet.

It was a long time ago, not that he would care to partake with it. It could not be dealt with that way. There was nothing to be proud off, especially with how many people they hurt in the past.

Not a single second more could he waste trying to forget it. All that pain which had been caused, all those people did not deserve that kind of treatment at that. Living in regret? What kind of petty thought, what kind of filthy arrogance was that?

'They hurt them, our family has. Everyone in our line hurt good people that did not deserve it. And still I cannot stop thinking of myself my dear.

I cannot fathom how selfish I am, especially as I near this age.'

She didn't say a thing, she wouldn't understand it as a woman, this was his burden alone to bear.'

It was something baffling. Extractions of thought couldn't even come to compare to what was going on in here. Old or not, he knew something they did not.

This task which was undertaken by them was overwhelming.

Hideout

He was worn out now. Having lost control over the bunker made him turn on the others, froathing his was in and out as he wanted to return. It was been lost, it had been lost, it had been lost. To him, to them, to just about any of them, and they were in no mood of changing.

At once, as if he had been heard, the terror of the small piece of it which threw itself all over, came near, to breaking through completely through the ceiling where he ilked for anyone. They, those, all of them who rose from their spots, looked as it like a mist of blood, unable to comprehend whoever it was that came through their den. And the pain was also ecstatic, as they hadn't known what went on through their minds.

It was that intrusion that, for once paid off. As if they were uncouned any less, they went through a wave of bickering blotchering plemorch or some crustification, the malignancy which formed around the ground, forcing all of the bunkers which were attached to one another to advance deeper inside. There was no earth any longer, instead there was only one inconsequential change. All the dirt surrounding everything had immediately swallowed through. Turning harded inwardly until it had achieved a diamond-hue of indestructability reflecte din its crystalline form. Never to be forgiven any more, as the various turnaround vestibules pushed in.

And to that, they looked on again, even though they couldn't know about this filth-rain, as soon as to evaporate itself into the air, that their overlords, and the machines, soon turned around and forced everything to come in. A total state of lockdown had been declared, and from it no one would be safe again. As they closed their doors, the various shades hid on inside their insidious castles, manors, kingdoms at a glance. They had been converted into smoke and soon left off never to be brought back. And in the closest call, it turned out that they could not be called, yet they paid, something of themselves would be left again. Most of the junk fell into the pile, immediately being absorbed by the raising solid bile that had become the blocks between the free regions. A total control instilled.

As to rejoice again, as life had been normalised again. With the great re-emergence of the, of the stricken men, those who looked after one another were lost. It was hard to describe, or to enable.

But they had made a hole into the stratosphere by their own actions. And as a result of it, the blocks of junk occupied everything, soon melting their insides away, until they had completed the creation of the hollowness inside each vein of the buildings they recreated. For all the effort to reconstruct the roads went nowhere as this chaos emerged. Soon, the red mist deviated as it had created the worst lockdown that could ever haunt them again.

As for each passing second you could feel the emptiness breathe. And even those who saw themselves free now realised that there wasn't any other place to be. It was a nightmare to look against, as buildings looked into one another, levels joined, yet those below could see the ground. Movers no longer had the ability to move, instead they carried on around keeping life as it was. Access had been given to the mad centralised unit that would bring its talons back into their lives. Safety would be to no control as long as they were able to attain control. It was the perfect chance for him to get through. Despite everyone being confused about what was going on there, taken under the consideration. Malt slipped through one of the cracked bars and ended up walking as a free man would. The rest of them stood behind for a good reason. He was there, and they were behind the cells now. With an inability to define scrutiny that remained, soon they were gone from sight. Nowhere about, as to their own doing carried on.

It was hard there, harder to live. Ever since the buildings had arrived, ever since the total state or control had pushed everything in itself, they were given some kind of wild way of living in the Cold Bloc. The facility was restrained by other means.

The recluse had decided that it would be much better not to get away from it, especially since so many escapees managed to get to the embarkment of one of the ships out in the ships that went through. It was inexplicable now, just the amount of scavenging they had to get through until their new additions made sense. Incontestable and unforgiving as the weather outside started being more rooms were being opened. Twenty bodies who resembled the same man sat down. All of them had drilled holes through their hands through which they spilled everything in the form of growing surface tensions, green and muscle-like, pumping as they were trying to give in their surroundings. Something was growing because of them and the last survivor knew it well.

Harold sat as well. Unable to comprehend his release, he only wondered where life might take him now especially since he had little to no experience outside his living spot. And he'd fought too many of the other Harolds to be aware of what might happen if he were to join them now.

'All of them are so weird, so unexpected, they run around and dress in feathers, they're missing legs but bear something, something.'

The man picked up on something. He feared approaching or even drawing near it. For that closed, almost inmate-cell, was where the wool-merchant fell, where he died and where he ended, the entry to the Sparrow-head realm, where no one wanted to come near and lay undefended.

And while there was some hope for him there, he didn't think for too long. His senses said one thing but his mind acted in another. Just for this consideration, he contemplated getting out. It was getting crowded by the minute and he couldn't compress all those feelings that were his. For each time a single drop of something made out of plastic or of iron, he considered the worse.

Out there, for what he knew, they were taunting him. Trying to get him in without spending as much as they would on the poor improper attention he was messing through. Battered at the head, even as he looked at the other Harolds, he started naming them.

'Arnold, Aarranth, Slobber, Court, Baarkath, Lemur, Imironth.'

A cruel stop came. He tried going in circles but he couldn't remain in place for long, despite what was said about him, he questioned everything down to the slightest foam which came out of a socketless eye and the dark which was inside of it, which looked like ink-blotches. Never had he approached such a pest of the mind that he considered killing himself.

It was no secluded incident either, just by looking at it, you could drag just enough to know, there were things out there that wanted him to get lost into the frothing alley, better yet. End up dying, so they could claim his body and eat.

'I am the master-savage, and I have taken my wings out.'

From whence he played, with his wild expansions again, there came only the most unnatural feeling of disdain. He was perturbed by his own creation, from the jerky cartilage which pushed on ahead, whence it dragged on and on until it looked like the bottle-broom end, there stood two adjacent skulls he cleaned. Not human, but of no animal either, they were slightly pushed out of their unnatural forms, as if they had been cradles when the time was still old and counting itself out.

What was it about that they fought? If not for this reason, what else might be brought if not the action which pushed on as the wings extended, drawing on all of the body-sheets, the plain skinned taxidermy possession he bore. For the faces that grew on them had holes yet carried on to speak to him.

Or so he claimed.

He who ventured far, the Master-savage, he called himself, took no pity on the weaker folk. He grabbed a few.'

'He's chasing us.'

Without delay, he pricked his fingers and ran after them. Somehow hovering at times during the small leaps he took without the mistake of blinding himself in the meantime. It was unnecessary to think for long. Other than the periods being taken from, he couldn't believe it. But it was necessary to cut pieces of them as he ran. A strike here, landed there at the ankle and at the back of his head. Pushing through the postulance, they started levitating, as their necks were no longer attached.

'Give up on your body my dear, that's the only way we'll escape from the savage.'

'But I have worked so hard on creating it, do not make me abandon it now.'

Despite how much human-like they were, her lover only revealed the root-like conondrum which allowed him the flight. In that he took refuge, as to believe there was another escape route she could take. Around his neck there was a flight-ring. More of a circle from the looks of it, regardless of it, he took his losses and pushed on.

'Come on now, just let go.'

And she had, without giving a single toe, a bitter throng for the savage to take in.

'You disturbing cowards, come back.'

'Oh, are those wings not set for flight?'

'Perhaps you're way too heavy, you savage.'

'I wouldn't put it out of the way my dear.'

'If only I had.'

The Savage-master only trusted his own senses there, as he pushed past the point of desperation and wondered about. What were they on now? Could it be?'

'Ah, you wouldn't know anything. Damned ugly flying kretans, if I were this close, I could've hovered forth a few more inches, and then.'

There might've been some desert. For some time and for some reason, now he was stuck with those two bodies, which he put onto good use. It would wear him down but he would live a few more days.

Farther from him, there were the failed ones. Just by looking at them, a simple consideration came. They needed to be taken out of their misery as fast as possible, without question and regardless of the sanitation. Just by their mere feeling, the way in which they seemed, they looked plume. Something had to be recuperated. Various turns around the bunker savaged from this disease, the entry to the Isles broken, so many spectres passing through and in.

Without comprehending what was going on, being overwhelmed by his surroundings, Malt began dreaming. A presence recognised him immediately then. For what was worth, Agamemnon carried on and did the same, awakening the vessel, the tower pulling another star in. After another hole had been made into the bunker, there was nothing more to be done about it.

Another wish had been granted to the man. Malt thought about it, despite being unaware, as he had just the thing. He wanted order to this place, brought from within his mind, only then would there be quiet.

Only then he could somehow make up for every wrong he'd done. To that point, he wished all of the Violators returned from the ground up, serving in concord with the others he didn't care about. He brought most of the electrical creatures who bore their children, the electrical ticks, the uniforms and the guards and everyone who's ever thought about it after dark. No longer would the guards and the watchers be human again, as they ought to be replaced by those filthy, destructive vortex-races. Worse, they had been brought, in a severe state. Most of them were mindless drones, taking orders from the filling unit that governed over them, at all. In quiet, the buildings started stretching and spreading into eights.

And each of them was alive, producing even more enticing grates. For every building that filled the place, as hollow as it were, immediately got formed into an apartment with more of the mindless human look-alikes, the androids now being forced to live inside of them as well as everyone else. Unseen in his eye, Malt had removed the circling presence, the orators of dread inside their mind, the spectres of the Duke, Di'Dorko and everyone else, who had been forced into hiding, only for him to see.

And at the lower levels the lower-floors crumbled, just so there would be standing places filled with fountains and tress, just like in the happy times where his mind was still. Movers as well, got told as the boding wells that they would be dysfunctional as the large contenders finally stood at home. Poison got removed and he had taken everyone back home. Just like in the times they managed, every complexity being changed, stopped even from their unnatural gazes, the looks of an unnatural Brutalism set in stone.

Some images were not worth seeing, but now he had achieved what he wanted to in the first place. Everyone was his, to do as he pleased. It didn't matter what he had learned. It didn't matter that he would not see her again.

Now there was no reason to interact with any human or any person in the Bunker, once he had taken his supreme role as a creator. He was too deranged for it. This was his stage, no target would remain.

'Greetings Sort, I suppose you've been waiting for me to come now, haven't you?'

‘Hello Malt, of course I had sir, we’ve all been sitting here reading all way. We’ve been waiting for you to say something to us.’

A pleasing sight, that was all he wanted. Eight families stood reading on benches, being surrounded by Four unnatural Violators, his M-suits, as he now called the uniforms, or his agents, some modified androids who peered around, and, why, his personal guard, though neight of them could see him now. He was a tall and marvelous anomaly contorted out of the bodies of the rotating shadow, a supressor he stumbled about, the Duke and Di’Dorko and the headless numb tendrillites of disease that spread from the voices of Agamemnon tha fed him.

Why, the sight was great, he didn’t care about anything yet. Just looking around at them made him smile, over those families he had seen androids, hybrids and even some people who couldn’t even help it but speak through their mutt-encompassed languages taken from as many forms as they could find. He stopped worrying now that everything was in control.

And let him not forget of the foragers beneath his hideout. Not a single words said to them yet, despite the fact that he had planted way too many elevators leading below their plane. Though he kept quiet about it, the elevators were set out in the open, leading as far as it was asked for to a single ship which had been claimed, wide enough to encompass just the whole stretch of all the bunkers and all the levels combined. All for him, even though he hadn’t been aware of its existence over a great while. Most of the caretaking astronauts were his, just as they ought to be, serving and being looked over by the Violators and the worst offender, the scum of the world. Only they, only them, they would be sent down there.

It was only that, someone escaped. At the back of his mind, he could almost sense it. Despite the impossibility of the matter, he had gone away. He was Charles, he knew his name. He knew where the ingorant fool hid. A visit would do. Dead ends waited for him ahead. They all wanted him to fail. But he would contain all of their screams and do as he pleased. How has he escaped in the first place?

Minor confession taken from one of the readers on the bench:

‘I’ve never seen Malt that way, mister Violater. I don’t know if you can hear or if you’re a man inside that, well, ring of yours, the hole or what’s happened to your body but I know this at least. Something changed in that young man, he’s never acted this way before. Times are weary on him, so it cannot be entirely put on his back. It shouldn’t make me less afraid or paranoid for what’s been hapening along.’

Clever girl, she kept most of the thoughts in check. Not to say anything especially since there were so many of them there. A midly warm breath could be felt on her cheek. Tongue and cheek, and there were spiders down there near her shoes. Squashed on the ground from days past, near the itinerary. ‘I would attest that I found myself just as shocked as she was by his actions. Knowing him though, I think it's but a phase.'

'But a phase? How could you say this? Just look at what's been happening around here, he's clearly the one in charge. He's responsible for this, I wager. It's not that hard to put two and two together if you think about you. Smell the ashes, will you?'

Between the sverves she couldn't do it. They were breathing on her lane, trying to get her to sign. Sign there, one of the agents said. He was largely obscured by the strangeness he showed aloft. But even there, he'd still remain and there would be showings on the screets of Mare. That's where they recorded everything that happened nowadays. Without delay and no fake takes, security had to be kept at even intervals, just to make sure that there would be no trouble. Twenty more seconds passed. We were expecting her to be kicked in adn her memory wiped out by having force applied against her head. Clearly we all feared it, as that would happen sooner or later if we said too much or asked too may questions. And either way, there could be nothing that would even work. Nothing we could say or do that they might let us follow him.

'I have to ask Malt about a personal issue I have with him. May I not even be allowed to walk over to that lane?'

'Movement is forbidden in his absence. For that alone you ought to deal with the circumstances in another way.'

'May I simply move a few feet from this bench?'

Soon the Violator turned towards her. It asked for a simple identification, nothing more. As soon as they got that out of the way, everything would revert to the right position, circumstance and control would be maintained.

'Listen now, I will slowly give you my name. After I'm done with it.'

She wasn't given the chance before being pulled in. It didn't work exactly as planned, before she was completely encompassed by the oilish bile, drawn inside and regurgitated. Some of those who were stationed near here attempted to run before being apprehended by the androids. No one but absolutely no one would be allowed to get away, under no circumstance and for no excuse. Whatever the reason Malt took to force them to say, they hoped it was worth it.

He was there, he could feel it. Despite the sudden lack of a sky and despite the other off-shots he called to prevent any kind of escape, this would do.

'Greetings my dear Hellen, how are you ma'am.

As great as usual, my good gentleman, that's a new haircut you're wearing now?'

Preparing for a war now, you devillish-looking sir?'

Of course he was welcomed by those he didn't know at all, by strangers by noon and even by the colloquials that came back from the lanter-swoon. They made such beautiful interactions now, they seemed to be more alive than ever.

'I suppose it might've been too boring now than ever. Simply having everyone locked in their rooms. Get out, socialise, do what I couldn't do in the past before I had been released. I don't get it either, but I suppose I'm finally in peace.'

With both himself and the actions he had taken before. Foaming in the back were the other machines that extended and finally descended in their true forms. They were part constructions, statues that worked up repairs, they fixed the electricity and the quadrets that kept everything in check. Just to be sure, he had instilled in them the minds of tiny critters, only to be sure. No one would retaliate against him now and no one would hurt anyone as far as he could.

'Push on this falsehood, you will eventually get bored of it as well. You know of it, you know you cannot control them now. Sooner or later they'll desire something more. And you will have taken their chances and their minds alone?'

'And who am I speaking to now?

Which one of you abomination cares?

He was unaware of this strange appearance they spread to the side. It felt like he misstepped into the land of the dead, where everything had changed colors, his soul having switched then.

'Where have you taken me? I've got an errand to attend to.'

He was desperately trying to retain everything he's learned in the past. His control was waning, he could not.

'Even the strongest of men falls to his true self once met by him.'

How am I supposed to find his room here? What of his building? Where could it be? It all looked like a mesh barely put together during a time-thrill which fell aside. There were no isles and no silence, he wanted to get through with it already and keep his search. I am stronger than this. Malt thought, but seeing how he was driven to it, he could do the only fashionable thing. He stood and listened. But they didn't talk, they left the sightings talk for themselves. It was a ruin out there, with all the buildings put in a place. He could see everything down from his old apartment, some strange buildings that belonged not to his world but some distant place he remembered seeing on some newspaper alone.

'I was born in Sicily, you know? It shouldn't be that unfathomably far but I think we could both rely on whichever account you want to if you don't mind me saying.'

It was a hard-to look through, hard to come ship. They were battering it against some sound-plays they were forming in the distance. Most of the crewsmen had been left behind. This seemed more barren than anything since there was any sea at all in the dock.

‘Once my father told me a story of how he entered a strange world after embarking on a cruiser. Of course I did not believe him, but for some time I would assume it so.’

Both the mold of the dock, where the stone went and variously thrown piles erected themselves held the ship still. It turned itself over and looked more like a completely upturned horn that came out of the land itself. It even pushed out as electrical power came out of it before them now. Despite the close encounter, they could not believe what they were hearing them. From the door came the captain. Introduced as Lleeyiathur, he bore no resentment any longer for who appeared in front of him. Despite not knowing who he truly was, the resemblance was uncanny. He was never to be held as anything other than who he was. Not whom he claimed he was. For the same reason they approached the limit of their say. He welcomed them in, both if any, who were they?

One of the first things that were noticed there was the change that came in the floor. Despite the captain leading the way, it would be hard for either of them to simply climb through. Stairs formed for them as if on command. It was pleasant, out of the very fact that he Malt took in the play. He wondered at it, soon, something could be conveyed. A distant flash, and a reminder. Some corruption in his mind, a factory still haunted him as it waited for the disaster to happen again. His failure to suppress them, all the people hadn’t died. Various creatures he created showed themselves in his lucid nightmares before he could set them aside. It was an impossible approach, yet tainted. Feet distracted him for whatever reason he could not say. But they were out there, pouring in, gently placed as paintings for admiration.

Nothing was finely colored for the same reason he was there. It was all made by them. For the same reason he could tell, he was there, it occurred to him what to find, how to mitigate the mind-scowl, to throw in the towel calling it a day.

‘May I please take a turn here?’

Without delay, he waited for the captain to set forth and opened a door which was barely part of the room at all. He was simply at the edge of falling. An empty cruiser with no bowels waited for him there. Around Malt’s shoulder, he waited for no second reason, ever so near before he heard the whisper.

‘I was about to tell you about this now.’

This incident had been thoroughly explored. You wouldn’t like to take a wrong turn now would you? I would only assume that such a fall would harm you as well as any other man.

No matter what you call yourself, no matter how strong you were then.’

But he managed to keep his calm around it. Deviating more, he found himself drawn back to the stairs and coming forth to a closer cabin, there he stood, near one of the curved lamps, a sign that said foreboding sea and one of the crewmen, whoever that might be. To word it improperly, he was just a dunce. He paired himself with a talking pair of holes that dictated him what to carry on with. They spoke of some vile plan, to which he was clustered with and hoped to hear it out. Despite his sudden intrusion and interference, the mastmarker ignored him completely. He was simply lost in his antics, too much so to care for what he was trying to aim for.

Make sure to keep administering the toxin, the captain need to get out of his head and do what is needed instead of waiting for them to get him. With the barely recognisable exotic plants, it was safe to safe they were meant for something more than an untimely stroke. Whereas the desire to take over his mind was something not even them could contend with. It was incontestable, approaching it from any angle. Distasteful just admitting to it now, and they could not year for it to end sooner. It was expected of them in any case, wildly chasing wild goose despite being forced to wait. Sailor Anglois stood his side. He welcomed the men at one of the strange tables, near the drifting poof that was sipping from his throat. It was largely decided he could not bring himself to say a thing to him. Not to his face, not now, not closer to the others.

Anglois came out of his diver-hole across the wall. He was an important plan of the assassination. Damned he be for the same reason as well. He wanted to make all of them pay for it. Not included in his throat, there were the desperate sings that wanted to make him mock himself, unevenly set. There were signs out there, need them be reminded after the crossing of the light? One could not do it thoroughly, not with the sea being shone on his face. And only then had Malt taken the reeking batch of the sea to himself. He claimed this world and thought of it.

‘What am I to do then? I need to be listened to. You need to obey me as I talk. Perhaps I wasn’t as clear before, but now, now I think this is the only way we could patch it through.’

He would have to be claimed, spared of no remains.

‘I’ll break those sailors and whoever else I need killed. Don’t force me to do it now because I shall do it without remorse.’

He felt excluded from the place. His inability to think took it away from him. It was all so cold, there was no retreat from this hole.

‘Why did you want me to see this?’

Di’Dorko thought of it for a second now. But the explanation soon fell off.

Malt carefully observed both of the sailors. He was almost set on trying to find out who they were and what they had been about. Just what was their end plan in any case? Frustration could not keep him down yet. He followed their guts and looked for a way through. Knowledge was important for him yet.

The four of them came up with the plot once they sat themselves at once of the mad tables. With all the tormented faces singing in the rising of the mold, it was clear that they set forth.

‘Listen, the two of you will help us now.’

‘And I’m supposed to help them?’

Both Gordo and Malt exchanged just as confused a glance as the two of them had. Of course their looks varied. It would be impossible to deny it. Even more so now, that there was no hope for them to get along.

But it was clear, what they were after. And there was no escaping from it in any case.

‘Yes, the two of you will help us kill the captain and everyone else inside this ship. Just so you know this plan was made by I.’

It wasn’t either of their voices but one which came from the wall. It was interesting, just knowing that there was no hope of getting after it. That meant tracking the voice to its source. For now, the mastermind remained close-gated. But Malt couldn’t help it even then. He turned in place, shook everything and wanted to get off this ship and get back to him. And each time it came to him, it would make him feel worse and morose, an inorganic feeling almost made him cherish the pain.

Neither of them told me what was going in the Hideout in my absence, especially since they knew what I could do. There was just so much I could break with my hands that it wasn’t even worth it wondering.

‘I want some silence and some respect now. Stop your collusion and hear me now.’

I am the Emperor of the Bunker and I shall not be denied by rightful place.’

‘And where would that be exactly?’

Everything was going just as planned. He would see their guts ripped out as soon as his rage could subside. But they would not meet his demands face to face. Not entirely so. It couldn’t be distinguished from the surroundings by any case. Now, if any other pace was taken, they were called to his face. And all the cards were placed down, upturned and up the strawn.

‘We shall look for him as soon as we’re done with him. First the murder then you can return but not sooner. Not by any chance. It will not be allowed, unforgiven by anything else.’

Past the birds, hear them sing, the wingless wonders want us to believe something.’

‘Cut it out. I didn’t come here to listen to some babble.’

‘Play along for now. You’ve got to do it.’

There came the answer and nothing would chime in. Malt would know better than that. He decided for what was worth that he would not take any rash action. So I followed. Charles and Blue would be spared for now. Though he wasn’t aware of either of their existences, for what was worth, it could only go one way. And that was his and only his in the matter. Let the first breaking begin. After going as far and to find the clamor of the ground, they walked out of the room with a bottle in hand. Only but a few drops had been used for it. With the clemency be it dire and withheld from the surroundings, he could not focus on the mess that waited for him. Outside the room, fabricated mudd rested on the trise-dent. Where he stepped, wherever he went, thered you’d find it. It felt someone predicted his exact movements and somehow managed to account for it, by whatever means.

‘I think that for some reason I’ve been here before.’

Gordo came near Malt, he listened closely. Unaware of it, though he was, something was beating in his chest as soon as he entered the left side of his right arm by chance. It was an unforeseeable accident which struck him as being odd. Something felt off. Even the brightest of minds could not understand it. Not to pinpoint it here. Or make too much of a ruse. But it was tender, just praying on it here. It felt like the entire hideout was in him, not the other way around.

Malt carried the bunker in him wherever he went. But he wasn't aware of it as of yet. What a terrible yet great man he was. And the bastard did not know a thing. Blessed the poor soul, Gordo thought, bless him thoroughly. This man would defy the world. He knew it now, as much as he doubted everything in the past. He now carried the bunker inside. Yet there was another thing he was aware of, only the bunker and nothing more, the frightening yet the more quarrelsome thing of all. To think of it this way, there was nothing else he dreaded more.

But merely imagining that great outside force which help the outside allowed Malt to keep the bowels of the hideout with him. This consideration made him entertain no other thought but the reeling factor of death. He came again to his senses, pushing on without thinking of it yet.

'Now let's all take it slowly. Not funny shake, no business met by moving on too soon. I want this to be perf'.'

The man said with an encapsulated thought. Despite being as tired and lost, he thought of his. He inherited some fear from him. Even in that false-life he contended with, which beat not living by a long mile still made him shiver and linger on small minded regrets. It was a passionless crime after all.

The four of them met ahead. Anglois, Malt, Gordo and the yet to be mentioned La Croix. They were moving slowly, in a serpentine manner, butchered to the knees, subverting their faces as they drew ahead, that much was known. With every spade left to rot, someone brought himself ahead. 'The captain should be in his cabin now, enjoying his nasty meal of dissatisfying crabs. I know this because I picked them myself, carefully, if you catch my drift.

I made sure that most of them should have a, what do you call it, a kick to them.'

That was proven to be right, after judging by the strange erratic noises he was making from his private quarters, he was clearly in pain. Absorbed ever so slightly by the bowel-moment that began opening and drawing his arms in. A terrible curse started leaping around his collar. It looked like a benign jumper, a seraphine hunchback that looked like, whom erupted from his insides and had no desire to wait for this chance to flee. Instead it took this opportunity to make sure that the captain would be taken care off. That he would be properly tormented by the time they brought the poison.

'He's not someone I'd assume to be an easy prey. The captain won't bow down unless we tank the man with as many arson-powers, shots of nitrate, toxic, venoms, poisons, acid, cyanide pills, and alcohol of the wickedest kind. And then, we'll tackle him from around the corner and finish him off with a blow to his head.

How does that sound you for the time being?''

'It certainly can't hurt to try.

At least, we should make sure to keep quiet around his quater. There's something about it.

There's something.'

He paused. Mistaken or not, this is where the halls twisted, where the cabin and the twenty miles came to melt together, as if they had embraced one another in a distasteful touch. It looked like half of his rubber-side was missing, leaving a few hinder-fourths of his cabin exposed. He was trying to find out a devilish fiend of a kind neither of them had ever seen before.

'Get down now, don't let him see you, no matter what happens, don't let him find out we're stalking him.'

'Well are we stalking him now? I only thought were were paying out respects to them, the walking shadows.'

Damn Croix, he was looking at the ceiling again. He was the only seeing things that weren't there. He claimed he had the ability to see the shadow of a man that fell through the wooden boards, as if we couldn't hear the noise ourselves. Either way, that's not the only thing he saw. They were dripping now, and he couldn't touch them, so he claimed at least. With each step, a part of his face did become grimmer for some reason. And it was no coincidence that it happened as soon as he approached those spots. It made him dry,so dry, unnaturally so despite there being no wind. It pushed through one side of his head ending up near the other. Again, this man had a dark head sprouting out of his neck.

It looked like a giant mole that found itself growing out in hopes that it might find someone to listen to it. The way it spoke was fast. If you were to open your mouth to interject on something it said, you'd lose it. 'I have to go back, I have to go back there fast before they notice my absence. What do you think of me? I am who I say to be, the only one missing is my brother. He's the one hiding inside your captain's liver.'

'Blasted creature, what did you say about the captin?

Croix, stop trying to crawl towards the shadows, I was to listen to that think growing on top of you. I think we might have something here.'

All of them drew towards him. There was no way to avoid it now, just because they still had to wait for the struggle to stop before they could come to his help. As amusing as that sounded, the theatrics would be the highlight they were looking for. It did not bode well, for what was worth, what this creature claimed he hid inside his liver.

'It can grow just like I can. And my brothers know what it wants to talk about. Look around you, we're the ones trying to keep this place secure, in check. Made, turned, working, as it ought to be.'

He had no other option but to disclose what was happening here. See to it that the pains are being dealt with, not to pin-point the ones that are missing, they were long since dead. Buried in the bulk of the ship, which in itself pushed past their cosmic mast-head, for what was worth, it should be known that there wasn't any sky any longer. And the towering ballista at the top of the ship reached the outer rims of space, sending shivers through the celestial bodies gravitating towards it. Yet there was no trace of Glaucoma yet. He kept to himself, though it wasn't the time for him to played with.

It would come, it had to come, that entry to the ship. The strangeness he did not know about the ordeals still gravitated to hinting that this place had a life of its own. It manifested itself in the reality, as if countered and given the chance to rise despite there being no sign that Glaucoma knew of it.

‘We cannot fathom staying here for too long.’

The Other-Croix said, he was flabbergasted, as he knew he couldn't reveal everything yet.

But what was that?

Blasted noise, looking behind they got the first hint. A piece of the floor extended upwardly until it got ripped off the rest of the structure. From it came the master of confusion, talking in wild tongue he asked them for a few pointers in the right direction.

‘Where ought I to go towards? I seek someone who might help me. Listen to it, the sounds of birches craking, ripping, I hear them all.

I am the founder of this ship and I shall be given some respect. And you want to know why that is? It's because I have actually put a part of my soul in it and for that reason, I am externally bound to it, in spirit and in sight. It's obvious, you're obviously well known in the literature. Some of you at least look like upper-class folk. I wouldn't be surprised if I were right about it, for a reason or two that I won't disclose here.

When a man is bound to sell his soul, only then can he say that he can't be anything but damned. It's quite obvious, just by standing near me, you could feel it even here.’

The founder came a few paces towards them. As soon as he had, his alluring presence changed. He couldn't stand in their presence because his body slowly faded in the same way Croix's head appeared. To explain it further, he started drawing towards his innards while being slowly encompassed by the dark. It gnawed at him, and you could see the mouth sprouting from inside his belly. It stank as a basin of moist sharks. Twenty more stops at least and the tunnel would be made inside his head. He revealed that, despite there being a skull surrounding his brain, there were bounds of skimmed meat that pushed in which made is ever so clear that he was dumb. Broken and numb in the area where his cognition should've come out of bound. There were others hints he gave to us. As much as were were set on this task, we all drew back as soon as noise came out of the room.

‘Captain, captain there’s someone coming to the docks. I haven’t seen him before but I think he’s someone who’s well known. And more importantly I think he’s, I think he’s stacked.’

As music to his ears as they went away, he drew himself upward and gaze at the bottom of his shirt, pulling everything away. He walked uncannily but hadn’t found a clue as to say what was going wrong and kept at that, going around the hall. There was no one else other than the first hand who alerted him of the presence of the others. In times like these he knew better than to argue and went on.

‘I told you not to disturb me, but I’ll make an exception this time for you. Out of the bottom of my wide growing heart, I think I could spare a spark or two.’

It grew wider there with the sinew that came out of his spine. A perilous sting-like rib pushed from inside of it and ended up being lodged into his heart like a thorn would. Not that it mattered. The four of them and the head managed to land themselves into one of the spare rooms before they could be found. Instead of trying to get away from this plan they managed to drive themselves further in a corner. Right about the time of the disaster Malt got his answer.

He felt trapped in there by the minute. While they were trying to get him on a knee, he found himself sitting and wondering.

‘Where will this lead us then?’

Please, I’m.

Come to think of it, I’ve got nothing to apologise for.

I need to get away from you as fast as I can.’

He thought no more of them and their peculiar ways they were trying to assassinate the man. Malt had no desire to play this game and opened up where he remained on track, where he had been before, marching towards it with only one thing on his mind, finding Charles.

‘I suppose I could at least do this, I think it’s worth it if we could only.’

‘Stop it already, I can’t focus on where he’s gone. I have to find him in time before he gets away.’

But Di’Dorko pressed on. He needed Malt to meet him, he needed him to meet Glaucoma. With every step on the way, parts of the hideout and that ship started connecting with one another. He walked on the boards while looking around the bloc. It was unnecessary to resist now since he had the image right as he wanted it. He could trace his way back to where he needed it to be without being lost or wasting time. And they were there as well, stuck between the worlds, with the only difference, that he could point at being that they could not step outside the ship.

And even the walls they touched appeared to have left them handless or partially disjointed. Sometimes only their bodies could be seen while they were there, in the middle, where they could not dwell. Yet this was only a physical mule. Instead of crying over it they could hear each other just as they would in any other occasion.

‘I must at least confine this in you here. You have to meet him in his prime.

Don’t push yourself out of it without meeting him.’

‘What do you want from me?

Can’t you see that I’m trying to find out how that one man managed to escape the hideout? Can you not comprehend how dangerous that is?

It can only mean that either I don’t have a supreme control over everything and everyone or.’
He hadn’t considered it just yet. But the man could’ve been just as real as he was. And that was a threat he couldn’t deal with. Or even think it through. He wanted to see whether or not there was a chance to skim around it here. To look and see, and get some answers.

‘Where are you you?

Show yourself already! I want to meet you Charles!

I know you must be hiding yourself somewhere.’

Where they had gone missing, there they were. Again, he was unable to resist the deconstruction of his sight. The patches of the hideout became only the dark built by the shadow-head of La Croix.

‘Why am I taken here again?’

‘Because you haven’t finished witnessing it yet, then and only then will you be allowed to do it. And I can think of nothing more than that.’

‘But I am the one in charge.’

That’s what he thought, that’s what his arrogance lead him to believe without knowing that this was a result of his own wrong doing. It began striking back at him in full force without a way of drawing on. He wanted to push on, he wanted to make sure they would know it know. But he spoke less and listened instead. With the initial assasination, they decided to crawl out of the room and search for the captain.

‘If anything, we could at least use this as our opportunity to get him yet.’

It was a well thought plan. So far as they knew, there was only one thing that pushed through. A pair of accoustic infections that be it so compressed into small ear-shourded patches, well to do placed on walls. With them they could infest the man and make sure than in no time he would be done for good this time around. It was a short-sided, barely put together after thought that shouldn’t have held a candle to their privious schemes and for this very reason they were desperate to draw in for the kill. There would be no life after in quater-decks, not a single crewman in the cabins and no soul in sight. Waddling around as the ship was somewhat ill-steered, they could only pay this much attention to the sounds of the wind. Deadly as it were, there was no way of knowing what waited outside any longer. For starters, they were lost to their own antics, trying to figure out the best way to hide the body after pain was conveyed by a blunt object.

‘That would do. I know this seems vaguely put together, but I can’t seem to come up with anything else. I’m afraid our only hope rests on the back of the most primitive technique we could ever come across. We have to employ brute force, regardless of what the repercussions might seem to be.

For once I think the sea might be weary.’

To the starboard and back on deck, their reactions would shake about everything regardless of the intonation. It was felt, hardly so. With everyone focused on the celebration of a new cruise and a new invasion they could finally mount the guns and have their fun. But the line of control would do.

‘Do you seriously intend this to work?’

‘It’s the only thing we can hope for now. Listen, our time is limited, our resources run dry and I think there’s little hope now unless someone takes something from us and carries on our will.’

He was a rat-minded pure baboon but he knew that was doing. Acting like a bonobo if anything, Algois had a mind for crime. He knew how to get tin-handed when the conundrum needed it and he would do it just as soon. Despite the fact that he was vaguely flabbergasted, there was no reason to put up with it any longer. A reason came to him, he wouldn’t remain for long. He had plans of his own as soon as they disbanded this gang, this band of messers, whatever this was. It didn’t matter to him as well as it did to the other, as he brandished a sharp knife of his own which only appeared to shine brighter and get sharper every time he got it out.

I was put on the spot, to prove my loyalty, despite being who I was. Despite the power and the doubt I had that I could even be hurt here in the first spot. I was asked to lead for the time being, but not as a leader, more-so as a servant in charge. I should be the one leading the search party needed to find the greatest and most portentous object I could lay my hands upon. A blunt object, at least, from Anglois’s description, Forty inches in diameter. And that I should at least make sure that it was made out of iron and that there would be no trace of rust on it.

Woe and behold now, there was something I missed. Long before I even got to this ship, I had already been reminded of my short sojourn in the submarine. Perhaps at times the wood resembled ever so much the metallic interior I’ve so become accustomed to. I could never take it away from mind. Nearing every kind of turn and cranny, there were objects hidden in the cabins that reminded me of the place, some navigational tools that weren’t needed, the patterns on the crosses and the carpets when it doubt. Oh and there were plenty of old hymns I would hear about the place whenever someone crossed by.

It was after all, September, crossing through the month of June. Only so much sense could be drawn to it once you listened to the tunes outside, peering through one of the glass domes hidden by the metal chimers. In the distance the same cruiser could be seen, threading through the sea with only one peculiar intervention. It had been the direction of the entire ship which dwindled with the uncanny. Wrong though it may have been of me to ask of such a think, but I turned around, opened through the other cabins where the others were searching for some hidden hammer, or someone's blunt surroundings and I asked.

'Would you mind answering me why is there a ship out there that resembles ours in each and every way?'

Why of course they were as flabbergasted, unable to think of any way. Whatever the reason might've been they couldn't even explain it themselves by no possible manner, regardless of the span of days which pushed on. Looking at the setting sun they also saw the change in the weather which happened in the middle. A typhoon could've happened in any case as June and September started throttling each other up.

'I say, if we don't carry on this assassination in time, we stand the chance of sinking at the bottom of the ocean, as an inverted pyramid at the bottom of a sand ravine.'

Nastily going at it, he wondered, just what was this new comer on about, what would he do if presented with the chance to take it all for himself? Had the others told him yet? Did he know about the loot captain hid behind the deck?

Of course he would eventually dig through the mast and find it himself, but there was only a chance to do it that mattered. He could be anything but flattered by what the implications were. Here, there, amidst the azure and the beryl, there was only some uncounted peril which awaited him. Malt, what a strange man he is, I could see how he'd try taking the lead, more than a servant, more than a snake. He was only a dread pirate at heart, a scum like the rest of us who didn't want to admit it.

Yet, he had the support of La Croix. And there was Gordo and the man. The man who disappeared out like that, as if his existence diminished before it could become finite. He, ho, where had he gone? It was a blasphemy that could not be brought to mind or admitted to. It was clear that as soon as the countenance faded, they would not meet eye to eye.

Twenty paces more now and they could see each other blinded by the musk. Many lesser seconds there and first we had a victor.

'I found a blunt weapon after all, and I think we might be able to use it.'

He had ripped off a pipe. It pushed through alike. And through there, but anywhere, an echo had been heard. Despite the power and the might, some things would go on all right. As if they were meant to happen in that way, Malt drew towards Gordo in an attempt to convey the most important emotion a man like himself needed. Distracted from his mad pursuit, now he came to listen to the voice he shouldn't have come into contact with.

'Who's that?'

'Does it matter? I think it's a bit late now.'

Anglois hesitated despite seeing how both of them were doing anything but counting their blessings. If he took it now, he might stand a chance of knocking him down. Quick enough though unmet, he might've stood a chance to take both of them down with the pipe in his hand, at least that's what he wanted to think. He had all the chances in the world to get rid of all three of them, then make it for the captain. Not even this rich stranger could escape his wrath and just in time had he heard the other cruiser be set on a trajectory which would ruin both of them as well as the dock.

'This would be the conclusion to a fine day, a very well crafted, very well thought, fine day.'

As he prepared, he stayed his hand in admittance to guilt and fear. He was being watched and touched and couldn't do it anymore out of fear. Looking around him, he heard the holes blow their mad air as a whale lifting up for air, near a lost shore. Of course he would not do a thing. Even he knew better than to fight against its advice. He feared what the repercussions might be if he had only dared go against its advice. 'I will do that for now and obey the best I can. Do not worry for your poor servant for he knows better than to go against your set decision.'

Contempt on it, Anglois had no other choice but to draw back and go alone for it. He knew at least, as much from as a hiss coming out of the holes that he couldn't rely on them any longer. Either he wasn't strong enough or well-minded as he ought to have been.

'Perhaps this would do, but I cannot say for certain. What do you suppose might happen if we were to try.

To push in and follow the voice before the dance could even tie us to this place forever?'

'Shouldn't you at least try meeting him for a change?'

Guilt still lingered in his voice. Gordo felt unevenly caught by this feeling of being unfit to walk on the same road as this man. He wanted to run but there was no place to flee, it would be much better this way, at least he admitted to see a better way.

'Very well, I shall make sure there will be another way for you to meet him. Perhaps this way around you could meet him in actuality and not in an illusion.

I need this more than you could possibly understand. If only you'd knew, then.'

His old man could finally get the message delivered. He could finally be let know that his son is long gone. Without a way of weeping, he chose to stay his hand and not even more from where the others stood as he went away.

'What are we to do now?'

Cried Gordo to La Croix, while he was greeted by the other; he would know it to be much better than to run about the place or wait. They would have to kill the captain in some way.

'Have you any sense where Anglois go?'

'Nay, but it shouldn't be that far, should he be overburdened by the weapon he took with him, I suppose we ought to know. Come, I don't think the way ahead is as convoluted as it needs to be. We should find him on our way with a turn and a swindle.'

As for them, they could only meet the cinder below the floor. Some heat would be felt, but before the end of the way, they knew. The captian would be dead.

By whatever means and whatever other plan they had acquired for themselves, it mattered less and they wouldn't count for it. This was the promise would be held. As they approached, the lively look of the ship began deteriorating. It looked anything but what it had been, not even remotely taken as if felt by the shaken grit.

‘I think we should find him past this open crevice.’

It was a desperate hole through which they could look through no more. Only from the distance they could see some vague forms in the shadows moving some ill-shaped teeth, all of which were placed wrong. Not to mention in the least that the distance between them was more than wrong and ill-fully dragged from one row to another. A screech and a shout came after, now it was time to go.

‘Anglois’ being taken apart, what kind of fluke is that?’

But they could point no more nor wonder at it then, for the same reason infested his mind before he could point away. A few uniforms gathered but refused to adress it, while there being nothing but a quick systematic aproach, it sang. Thence, forth, sounds of metal groans could be heard in time.

‘I think we’re getting onto something now.’

‘Perfunctor-maker, officer reports in.’

‘Reports are supposed to be submitted by eight-five, ten.’

The intial equations appeared to point only in one direction. For whichever reason, there were far fewer choices in terms of who moved and who had to wait.’

What is wrong with you?

Malt slowly drew on, as he would, on top a pipe. He was a pipe-head, just like the others. It wasn't a mockery, but pure flattery, seeing them look that way.

Elegant's World

If he may have a single word in he'd know what happened. The only one that wanted to strangle him were the people who only got a mere view. They were somehow mortals who lost their only chance to rise higher from the ranks of mortal of near strange elargies dancing. Cooled down by the midst of touched, they only attempted defeat. It was unforgettable for a good reason. For the first circumstantial walker protested.

‘Have you all gone pale of head? Do you not think before saying anything? I would like to add that we have all lost the man who appeared out of nowhere, making a fool of us all. Why is no one disturbed by him?’

You’re acting wild, but you are mild now, never saying what’s on your mind.’

‘Calm down now, dear Estos. Can you not see that you’ve taken it too far?’

IT wasn’t going to end soon. It wasn’t going to end at all. He was toying with Estos, this bear-pawed bruttish yoddler, whose voice was only brighter than the song he was working on. Notes a straying, as he forced himself to least create. No more tunes for them, as they siped on their blue-rosary wine. It acosted them less than it was needed, if only they listened for a second.

Elegant took the only way back he saw fit for himself. Thought plainorous and heavy as it was to follow them around, he understood just how things went around there. Everyone was following an unspoken code he closely observed in order to imitate. Despite looking this way, he understood it as being temporary as his eyes already went on ahead to scour for something to grab. And though it still didn’t befit him entirely, he’s done this for himself. It was a suit of lightly toned, barely shone upon for the reason that these clothes might blind you with the addition of light, suits that grew fatter below the ankles and the wrists. From around his neck they started pushing on the shoulders in a circle as to highlight the other straps. And from the vest which he grabbed, he saw only the dark star-sings that were pushing on, as if to lock everything into place.

While rummaging around, he also took a single hat, which was about, everywhere he’d see. Just what went on this high-society? How had they managed to fill their time and lives with nothing more but clothing and the skin of lowly earthly boars-like Strattons, which were highly praised, put at display. Even some of their bones remained in the rightful places, though he hadn’t any idea of the animal life that roamed the splens below, he questioned it. As long as it remained to him, it bothered him less, not to found out and be depressed.

‘Where is that man?’

There was a stalker, and he was getting desperate. It had come, well earner, a grabbing arm which grabbed him around the throat and started grabbing him in the back.

‘Remove the trouble maker and let’s see the next show at last.’

It came, with more flying machines that bore higher forms and wilder shapers, some going atop the railings, twisting and turning until neither of them could lay to the impression showing. Just what could be the reason for it if not the plains and desires they bore of rowing higher in the sky? It was desired, though they were pushing the plates below the ground ever deeper into earth's crowd, they had no interest in the plebian.

Why would he have either? After tasting their wines, seeing how the glasses dissappeared with him, at least for the time being until he let them aside, he got rid of his own apparel and made it to the second floor. Where the others were entertained by wild exotic dances and the weird folding lances of marine, played on strings between the wings of harpey longs. Such were their instruments, as it could be called on them to hear it go on.

‘The songs of moon are soon to follow, and we shall carry on until the earth's shallow. For eons ago our martyrs died, and for them alone we shall rise.’

It felt glorious, now that he appeared, ready to blend in. Elegant had even disregarded what had happened in the past, dreading that unknown armored foul who had nothing to say to him behind. All of the words were a creeping stalker's roaming tools. Indulging into it would turn him back to where he swooned out of. Not to get over his head. With the threat removed, now he could return to the water's shed and the small fountain in front of them. Looking at the circular lours that came to be, even in the high-placed angular twists they set their planes around before exploding. Right on time, he looked around and carried on. With as much as he had enjoyed socialising and realising he was meant to be there, no one even asked about his whereabouts or why had he been there. Admirable, to the highest degree, this was the way life was meant to be. Looking back at songs a watching, he had stepped aside, closing in to the fence that stood between them and their peer-sashing. Another one of the cockpits appeared to make it true. But one a close inspection, he saw what they were filled down the brim to,

A disgusting watch, but he realised then why they were enjoying themselves as much. One fellow guest even pointed, yet the obvious.

‘It's for the children, we tell them, it's all for the children.’

There was no joy in it, no desperation he could detect. Only the utmost, almost flunecy of truth, he hadn't said a lie so far, nor was he interested in it at all. It could even be subjected to some kind of test. Not to bring him to any kind of stolid distress, but he had fainted, plain and simple. Not him but one older man, not far aside. From that much joy his heart was finally revealed as it turned out-side down. Though it wasn't a gruesome show in itself, the turnip-like lock came out and finally they started dragging it around, with its lock about needing a key.

‘Come, come, this is the highlight of the show. We're about to become tenderly rich.’

They each searched his body for the key, though inside there was no red, as there were earthly colors, courtesy to old age, a blue in it as well, lost to the strapping of them searching it. Everything was slowly being encased into metal as the age was finishing, ready as he was. Slowly he'd melt away with one exception, the turnip, as it was set aside.

'I found the key.'

'Blessed be him of all.'

Greed had encompassed them all in what could be nothing but the most inhumane aspect of any kind of living thing. Blasted things, as they were, now they shared in all of the old man's despair. After taking everything they could, they saw the jewel-like pricks which they had stashed inside their pockets and everyone went their way.

'Come, come, I saved a few for your as well.'

I partook in this ritual, not to stand out. And as it happened soon enough for it to be done, and as we returned to our seats, the man was gone. In a puddle then in nought, he was never to be found again. Brought to an untimely end. It was somewhat prudish. Not being able to keep us with the line of events took a toll on him. It's getting closer now. For each moment passing there was another fallen through one of the skyroofs going around the high celestial planes of air, where they dwelled upon it many longer days until he'd finally grown tired with waiting for them, as he carried himself over, all those colorful pictures with nothign in-between.

'There is no substance there.'

One of the high-stockades loomed around like a long forlong necropolis caught in itself long before it could be gone.

It was bleaker, filled with some incomprehensible amount of discontinued pieces of grim-lust that twisted each spire and they were only there.

'Klyothr of the first Anglers, rise now.'

And thence he came, with his unnaturally hooked-longed necked barbarous long legs that pushed through the spine, out of the hands until it hard created the perfect replica or an inverted vertebrate which started pushing all of its unnatural long horns out of the wilder rims that came forth our of the high ends. It wanted to be dead as the rectangular face began molding and stretching until it had become part of the stockades in which they rested, pondering on the many surrounded trims of ungoliathic stone that kept pushing past their dark heads, all of them bobbed together until they were not forgiven for their acts, which they bore out there.

As unnatural as they were, there was something there. 'Who are you?'

Elegant paid no heed to the others. He drew near him and asked.

'I'm Last'

The man said. Common garbs dictated something of his common origin. Common for the dead people he wore. Not that it mattered anyway, as he came up with the greatest ruse, he would use this man as his tool for destruction, no matter how hard he would be shaken away by it. All would be set right, and to no delight would he bear hatred towards the man.

'Last, I suppose you have wondered, at least for the time being about something, haven't you?

What if there's more to this world than running around the sky, what if there's a chance we might walk on glass planes and never have to touch the ceiling of the demodronic-sea?'

Eye up high, he lit, and suddenly got up.

'I'm listening.'

'Follow me now and I shall make it so your time will be worth.'

It wasn't something he expected, but something which contrasted against his skin, as it glistened within the trim of a pearl, he showed him something from his world. Elegant told him of it, and he made sure he was listened to. For each sentence which was muttered lasted as much as he could think of it. Now and less, he wouldn't be impressed by anything less than what he had to spare. If there was the chance for a confession, there were things that could last him through the night. Blight would tell him what to look for and as they went ahead, they discovered the stop. It was an immaterial hold which prevented the fall of all the buildings and their ringed reverted domes. For what could be said, this wasn't worthy as long as they were led there. No matter, for what's right.

'I shall not give up on my promise now. I feel it, I can feel it down there. There's something calling me, it wants to get revenge on this place, but whom?'

He called on it and saw the moon on which they crept upon twist. What could it be and what made those noises? If not, at last they saw it, the giant crow reverted to a side. It was eating and spitting out the pieces of itself as it yearned for something to happen. Ancient being, as it were, it stood aghast and wondered at him now. Why would they show interest to him? How could it be that he was lost at a hymnless whim, in that purity and beauty he had never seen about, Elegant gaped at the fiend, as its deeply conveyed cannyons inside of its eyes, the head, and just about every wing that spread.

If there was one thing he couldn't see, that was the world beneath it, which would not even come out of contact, or for him to be told otherwise, there was no company he'd ever have.

'We have to get farther blow. Lower the sardon-ladder.'

'Careful now, it looks dangerous.'

'So be it then, I'll take as many risks as I have to if it means getting further away from this life of theirs. I've seen enough to be sure that I know I would only be met by a blissful boredom if I were to stay.'

Last nodded, and didn't question it. He did as he was asked, always doing it so. Though he couldn't spare him emotions from the wrath he felt, alone he contended with the least profane, the image that came after him again. He froze and stepped back. It struck him like a heart attack. Yet on the small rounded pri-deck they stood on, round around the fence, in front of the wooden entrance they rested against, two feet inside the open space of the lower level, it leaped. It couldn't be, that wasn't meant to be. But his own slayer, the outlaw, the murderer flew in and landed through one of the windows.

It was the Proto-being, that impartial bird-looking sculpture that came back. As if undertaken by a long journey, it stood on its own lap and waited for him to greet it.

'Stay back Last, I need you to stay back for a few minutes. I'm afraid I couldn't ever take this away from you, I couldn't spare you if comes to blows.'

He was shaking, almost in some way, yet he didn't reveal anything to him yet. It wasn't meant to be, not this way, this, this. A breather, in a few seconds, to realise this looked like too much of an enclosed area. From around the trims a staircase lead to the zone where they gathered and served the wine. There was no passion there, as much as they could tell. Even without the songs of the minstrels, none of them would've heard it yet.

'My dear Proto-being, how much have I missed you.'

Elegant was struck by the cold gesture. He stopped and only thought of the worst now. Immediately after seeing how tense the Proto-being was, he was onset now. Unapproachable by the mistle-touch, the reveries not even coming as close as to show how he came onto it.

‘I thought you bled to death. I thought you were gone for sure, no, I thought you had been destroyed.’

And what was that he was seeing in his fangs? They were fangs after all, more like nails, pushing out and working like a sewing machine. He killed someone and even recently at that. It was unnecessary to believe it otherwise, but there was still hope to redeem the strange act his wicked eyes gravitated towards.

For now he came closer, bent around the knees, he waited.

‘A truce, that’s all I’m asking for, if we continue this way, I suppose there’s a chance that neither of us might get through it alive.’

It could get dangerously close to both of us losing ourselves instead of getting on with the plan.’

‘What plan?’

Now I got you, dumb bird. I could wrap my hands around you and do as I am pleased. He wondered if he could see him now, even thought about it, disappearing on a whim. But that triggered no response from the mule-brain. It remained so far as they would see to it.

He came near Elegant and asked. Weary of his own self he only came to be of latter sayings.

‘Will you let me join you in the flight, as in the old days when we met, Elegant?’

Open ends always ended up there, one way or another. It felt weird there, as if they were sipping on some nymbus syrup of some kind, trying to see where they might go and what they might see now. Not a second passed without chucking it to a stone toss, worst of kind, never mind the misunderstanding that crept between their ears.

‘We ought to land somewhere and see what’s going on here. I suppose they’re hiding something we ought not to be stumbling on.’

He couldn’t shake the small floating isles they were on. And there was definitely something down there, pulled by the gravitational force residing below. After a quick debate with himself, Elegant realised that there was no other hope for him to trust the creature for the time being. Without indulging too much into anything, he hoped for less and never met those cruel eyes. He was a killer after all, and there was another tool standing by. Last didn’t understand it yet. As expected, he stood there fumbling under his breath while trying to make the time pass. We approached the same edge of the ship now, where the barrier between the moon, the isles and the earth were. A simple leap could yield some deadly results he had calculated in his plan. Yet lowering a leather saddle on a walk of planks was the next best thing. He thought as much.

‘Are the two of you ready to follow me now?’

Would you do me the favor of being the first one to climb down, my dear Proto-being?’

It nodded with a strange contraption. Despite his lack of arms, instead of which he carried those ambivalent pair of wings, there was no stumpage in-between. He noticed that. Despite the time they spent together, this was wild, this was out of question, peculiar, how many more sharp teeth emerged from under his wooden-kin false wings. He hid way too many deadly weapons did he hide? What was the end in sight? Accomodation had to wait for the being, as for now, it lowered itself on hindered legs.

‘The transition or the fall to the moon could be deadly now.

We’re about to embark on a perilous journey if we ought to escape this false paradise.’
But at the mid-point across the saddle, it hadn’t mattered any longer. Beyond their control and hold, they were pulled by gravity alone. The mere force of it took a power unlike anything ever encountered before. It was slim and mighty, pushing and ever-throwing. But they set flight and went along the passage. With every few meters they came near it, the grayish stone got clustered by a blue and a dark hue that carried on surrounding everything in sight.

From the far regions, from the distance, the breaking happened as the entry towards its inside opened as they were drawn in.

‘Grab a hold of anything you can.’

An increase in the mere tribulation threw them around the place, forcing them to struggle as much as they could, as they faced the faceless aspects of the moon-crows, which even inside of itself it chewed on its own body. Having taken a liking to its own flesh, there was no stopping to it any longer. Brutality had taken them there, in the rightful place, a cage of crow-stone, which they all shared. Food made out of crow-flesh fed to the prisoners instead of anything other than the kin. Even the crow-water was made out of its blood. As it happened to finally join them now, as if the countless manifestations weren’t enough, another giant head appeared. This time, it looked like it meant to say something to them, going as far as to interact when needed, not to be spared or miss it. First it took an aggrandising moment to look around them and see.

‘You are from the land above but the two of you don’t belong. What is the reason for this intrusion?

Did you think you could simply make the pass unquestioned?’

‘Nay we have not. Allow me to speak for myself and for my winged companion here.’

As he dared replied, the Elegant’s sight, the entire room shook with feathers, all of which were thrown around, slowly falling as they dared not make a wing out of it yet. It felt as if they were back home, for both him and the Proto-being. This mere invitation of indulgence to pain, not to mention the beauty this crown unknowingly produced, with every feather being crystalline to sight, perfection having been naturally attained without even knowing it. He hadn’t known it yet, he couldn’t. Nor should the crow be aware of it, as it was eating the useless bits off himself, leaving only the perfect feathers and the feathery floors they rested on. They were magnificently crafted, as crow-rocks rather than themselves. Even the mere reflections brought something of a wonder, as neither of them could pinpoint what they actually were. Had he known it yet, he might've turned to despair.

'Depending on my inquiring, I shall come to decide whether or not you're to be toyed with longer or thrown in the grave of the sparrows.'

'And where might that be?'

'Below the paradise of course, below my reckoning, there you shall dwell with the inhabitants and the heads. But know that there are no masses of graves and that you may simply be overwhelmed by the sight alone.'

I digress to this sight. As many crows started pushing out, finally the birds started flying. Yet they were more feathery than their Demigod, their ruler or whatever he called himself yet. We were given but a few options for us to be spared at. Return to the world, though we were warned that ever the slighted fall, by accident or not changes the being in itself irreversibly. In which case we could go there as soulless as we were once claimed to be, worse than that as only time would tell what would happen if the three of us were seen there.

'I shall make you a simple deal, giving you this much. Know this, strange beings that you are, I shall not give you a second chance upon your return.'

Why would this dreadful being push us out? Why were we here in the first place? For once Elegant began taking the consequences into consideration. Just what went through him now? Could this be the once chance he needed to accept his fate and play his role in the grand scheme of the universe? That much he knew, that much he considered as well.

'Listen now carefully.'

The manifestation of the crow began pushing itself out. It appeared in front of them in an unnaturalistic blood archetype that sprouted in every direction for the shortest time. From each side that erupted from him, you could see the differently modeled and animated heads of the crows which came out of him.

Neither of them, suffice to say, appeared to fit. A reason for that was the partial boot-syndrome that started cutting through its throat. After pushing some tiny unnatural globe-crow crawling insects out of the depths of its foaming belly, then had it began the dreary madness. In it the sadness began to foam.

And after the water pushed out of it, the black murk of ravens sang.

'Again, I shall perform this now, for a second time in my lifetime, I shall make it so you'll know me.

Batter my gutters and listen to our songs.'

They promoted the other's responses as they started eating their own young. Other crows started appearing and pushing out of their own guts. Playing the dangling harpies, their tubes and the flubber-guts, they listened to the songs of rubes.

'Now, it is the time to see, I'm better be called upon thee.'

For this oratory dance was there for a reason. It transmitted a few words over them, giving them as much power as they needed to understand. It pushed through every single one of them an unnatural appeal. Muscle memory was inscribed in them, as much as they would be forced to feel the angst and depression which carried over them.

‘I want you all to become our standard-bearers. For the Crow-moon desires this, you need to swoon over and do as we are pleased to.’

Need thine be reminded of less, need be confessed over the evilness. Of direr holds, and holdings of the moon, an empire could be created soon. And to no less, it could be confessed now. What desire had been pressed into their schools of thought they said:

‘Very well, I for once, the Elegant, accept your deal. I shall do as you say, and will confess to everything down the to mid-most point.

Send me below the earth, for I have seen it in the vision you’ve given me and I shall go forth and do as you will.’

‘Thence forth, I shall excuse you and allow you to set forth. Do not mention of this discipline and evilness afront to anyone, and none may know.

But of the two of you? What shall you do in that case? Will you allow yourselves to state thine way?

Should I commence again with the vileness and imprison you forever?’

‘Nay, I accept, if there’s something I may be given.’

The Proto-being considered it for a moment. As a matter of fact, for what was worth now and for him alone, he considered this.

‘I listen and obey. I did so for the longest time. Whether it be my own kind, the Proto-beings or my friend, Elegant. But seeing how your dance has shattered a part of the past, you’ve given me something to look forward to at last.

Need I see more before I can make up my mind? Nay, I need no less, I confess that I’m not searching for such a thing. I’m bittering with the jitters and I can search for no evil in my own intentions.

But the visions you’ve given me revealed something of the things I so desire. So many lurid beings lay down there, in the ground. All of the sparrows are actually alive. For, their bodies had managed to sink underneath the ground and lay into hiding. I know that now, and I won’t regret pushing through, I will not abandon this fate and future you’ve given me. As I lay through the worse of graves, I shall get through them and remain as I was once before and once again.

To that I say, aye. I shall become your standard-bearer. And I shall started sinking below the rims of the ground, digging in and pushing through until I can do it no longer. Afterwards, I shall hunt all of thye necrophiliac sparrow-bodies that abandoned their heads and slay them forever in thine name.’

And thence the Crow granted the Proto-being release. Now, with that in mind, he no longer looked blindly at him. Instead, he pushed onwards and spare no ground. He could only stand about after releasing the two of them. Ready to inquire of the last one, the man so bold that he couldn't be denied anything of the old age.

‘Last, you’re named, now have I not give you a vision?’

Have I not embedd in your mind a way through which you may kindly look for a way out?’

‘I do not know of that? What is that you want from me? I’m weak and petty.’

Last said so, he was unsure on himself and didn’t know what to make of what he said before. I couldn’t see a thing out there, only my own death. I was so afraid to step on them that I could’ve lost everything then. As much as I could say so, I wish I knew what I could tell the crow. But for now I feel tired. Tired of my own existence, I cannot tire any longer, nor can I push myself towards retreat. I wish I knew of some way out now. ‘Who are they the ones that call on us now? I can still hear their distressed sounds, the songs we carried forth will never amount to what they created.

I bethink all of you ought to be sent there and instill upon the sparrow body moles fright. It can’t be dealt with and you should know that we will push the light and see them fade.

If you obey this we shall bring you back as reshape the paradise as much as you desire. You ought to know.’

The crow manifestation spoke, it pushed through its own insects and made way for them. As soon as it drew near, after releasing Last as well, despite not tenderly trying to force him to swear allegiance, he mistook it this day.

‘I will grant you pardon for this sole occasion. Unless I’m wrong and shall be brought back, I shall tenderly push the double-headed, rip the body-halves. I shall bring you back and torment you until not even an inch of your mind would remain the same.

You may not understand it yet but I desire only some tinder from their land. Eventually I shall bask upon it and scorch every single acre that I might stumble upon. And then the will be mine.’

But more importantly, Elegant had something else in mind. He wanted to waste no second and think of the opportunity ahead. If he played the game, if he played his card right, he could have it all, an entire paradise in his image, with all their toys abandoned and dishellved.

I would no longer be tormented by my choices. I could possibly be worshipped and bask in luscious garments, drapes of new, the colors of the peacock and nothing more of old. Of that damned old filth sea, which still found its way hauntingly. He could not focus on anything else, but the mere thought that it could somehow chase and find him in the least desirable end. Hope would die, his heart would shatter. For all the matter in the world would come crashing down and bring the moon, the paradise down. It would be a disaster not even he could prevent.

Then he addressed the crow itself, standing between Last and the Proto-being as a peculiar beacon which barely found itself standing there. Pushed by the soles, it waited as if preparing for something to come forth. By the time the squarish hole erupted he had greeted the sight of their leader. Undoubtedly that's what he called himself, you could feel it from his presence as well. A stigma of the cattle which followed in the back, as both of his servants were reluctant to leap to their deaths. So it appeared, as the fall would take everything away from them.

'I have a request. If you don't mind, I want to get something in return from this, something other than the paradise. I could not fathom living without it here.

It's some kind of trinket I desire to have.'

He contemplated on it for a few seconds before going back at it. Rearranging the vowels in his mouth, chewing on bark. 'Go forth and be drawn in my champions and carry on my flag.'

With a fell swoop they were made to go, no longer in control but no longer wondering whether or not they had to hold. There was no material and no stone, no ground and nothing forcing them back. It was that mere sight of the fall which made them almost resign themselves, because there'd be no hope for it. They had seen too much and they were about to faint. Even after this trip had gotten to their minds, it was more than clear that they could do nothing to stop it.

Before they knew it, they slowed down, and the fall ended. No broken bone or crocked their beings, no longer were they undefended. From the start they stood upright and fended all the uprooted heads. Some of them were violent as they knew what was going on ahead. They feared their coming despite carrying nothing on their backs.

For what had materialised in their minds were the giant floating heads of the mooncrow standing above the three of them. Last pushed in no direction, Elegant could barely fathom staying seen for long and the Proto-being had already taking the initiative whilst killing some of them were put down. With the initial shock fading, they were not pretending to do it any longer.

A grand expanse waited for them there. Out there it was hard to latch onto something. It was hard to grasps as they moved on from toe and clasper, from them and around their breathless stares. They couldn't even necessarily look out of the way. It wasn't likely that they were prepared for this kind of life, with everything countoured and little for the blind.

How much time did they have?

How much time was there for any of them until the crow decided they weren't welcome there? Perhaps that was it.

Their conceit, it was hard pushing it after so long, knowing they wouldn't be listened to. It was getting much harder for whatever reason, with the lack of understanding fading with every second. Each one of the head leaped and fell, acting like dollheads than anything a man of joy had to have made. By himself, uncannily looking out. His destiny called as soon as they started chasing something in the distance. A man woke up from a field of dead birds.

He did not know how he got there but wasted not a second until he came to a sense. In the plot of land, he called for someone, anyone who heard him talk. His feet were cold and there was no way of warming them up. It got clearer as he started on track that there was no one there to greet him. Walking as he may, he couldn't convey either a way in or a way out, he wanted to shout.

But no one listened, not from beneath the earth, where he now resided.

'This will be my home from now on.'

Dependant on it, he chose to stay there for a while. Only the paleness kept him awake. He couldn't focus in any other direction, nor could he wait for a way out. It was too late for him to figure it out.

'Pray for it and they might hear.'

A tapping in his ear dictated him to go. It would be a long way to get down there, in a place where he could not know peace, but at least it went in one direction. It should be over soon.

A lack of satisfaction needed to be addressed, for the same reason this confession failed to touch anything, Mill found himself sitting there. Even covered in dirt, he was trying something else now. Without even taking a direction, he was left with them, the gorgeous material which went through his jaw.

Piles of it through which he fed kept him alive.

'You are about to devour the liver of a fool. He, in his petty clothes, a jester without many words fell out of heavens and found himself here.

I know you can only hear my taps but you better figure it out now. There's only a single way you could do it there. You can only make it if you dig deeper and not return to.'

Anywhere, it was the only advice he'd take. Stay there and don't come out of your hiding. Otherwise they might pile you up with the other bodies. A flash and woe, and there they were at the dawn of a new world.

'What happened?'

Asked Elegant as this sudden flip in unity happened, a sceneray that didn't last for long. Meanings weren't ever where they were to be, steps were made out of grim stone and they were out there in the opening. During the ceremony, they had little else to say of it.

'We were bitten.'

Proto-being was the first to observe. A single bite took off the stanards they had carried on thier backs, those phantom-like peculiar ghastly symbols dissapeared before they could be taken back.

'Keep your heads down and don't say a thing.'

Somehow they would do it, trying to blend in. A cradle rested nearby. On top of it rested a potato-bag with two eye-holes pierced in it. Last took it and made two extra holes through which he took out his arms. He of the bad lot, at least he wasn't made for this. This time around they missed a word or two.

‘We’ll look for a way into this ceremony. Act natural.’

Elegant of all seemed to be the least concerned.

They fearlessly entered the peatlands.

Beyond the hate of the blinding lights, there was this one sight that would only see it. It was their society after all. Up close they looked decently dressed, pilgrims that were anything but what they had been portrayed. It was strange walking around them while facing not a single lash, not a yonder or the rash of being touched that way. It was a strange pass. Mostly so because he took a second off, taking into the back and looking at both of them in turn, slowly observing how they played their roles in his plan. For whichever reason, Elegant admonished himself. Seldom had he thought of things, taking them for granted more than often. Wherever they might go, he considered this. Wherever they might be headed towards, he saw the Proto-being as being different now despite appearing to be very much the same.

If it survived then, it will survive again. There would be no pass-over and no way to see him as the dumb-lot he appeared to have shaken himself into now.

Then he appeared out of nothingness and chose to walk closely to him. He felt no lungs there, but his breathing was even now, as it ought to be.

The Proto-being observed this. It subtle, but the shake of the beak meant that he acknowledged it.

That was all.

Carrions

Srechils going the Paragim of Dourness, they looked ahead and couldn’t feel anything but the boldness of the basin. It felt like they could stay there for hours, never minding life outside their tribal way.

‘Can’t you see that technology had failed us all? Do you not see the uselessness of our actions and how we have been tained by the speed of advancement? Taken from our very end days, I say, we ought to reclaim our world and bring in the dawn of the Leviathan as we were told.’

Moments passed and everyone turned to the Glorra-Irr-khra, the one Carrion who promised to unite all of them and bring back the days of peace. When they were freed of virtue and looked for a cure like the shamans of Irk’Alar.

‘Back at it already? Foul feathered irksome fool, why can’t you understand you’re not welcome here at all. We’re bound to find you in the burrial grounds unless you paying us heed for what you consume.’

‘But I need to eat the ashes and the berries in order to know what’s happening outside, otherwise, who might communicate with the spirits in my absence? Who might clean the world of the unfathomable disturbing racks of Carrions who abandoned us in search for, in search for this.’

At once, without delay, Glorra-Irr-khra pulled one of the broken Dour heads he had come upon and showed them just what it meant for the people who were out to get them. And he knew less and didn’t think it would much matter. That they were trying to push on through the veils, perhaps it would be better to look into the sickening fells that ailed him.

‘Great fires, as they’re destined to push onwards will make it so neither of us will make it on the other size. A prophecy, the end of our legacy is bound to come, and no Carrion could possibly survive the coming of the destruction. When our solid masses shall come to be broken in the need of tribulation, listen to me, oh bretheren of mine. Unless we fight our kind for our kind, unless we face what they had become, then we are bound to end up just like them.’

As they were listening, at least four of them had completely fallen apart, out of the mere force the illness displayed. They couldn’t convey any of the pain any longer. Brought to them, as if it mattered, was the anchor wthat was to decide, if there was hope indeed for any of them to carry on.

‘Look, how my fingers break your fires as I bask into the hellfire of smoke, from the broken realm where they’re bringing us forth. In there, look, look.’

He showed them what he saw. The young Carrions and the older sages, even the hunters gathered around Glorra. Only a vision had been determined there, out of nowhere, as one might tell of it. But looking back, he could only see that which was anything but deterministic. An intricate set of chains were dragging them on to an arena where they would be stomped until nothing remained out of them. There, only there was their future. Only there would they lay their arms, no longer fighting as they ended up being broken apart, and in the rows and seats, they’d be observed. By those who couldn’t think highly of them at all.

‘We will be judged as evil.’
Though he had failed to recognised the place as a court, not an arena, until that point. They had all taken to the paranoia, as to know what they were called for.

‘Murderers and triads they will call us for daring to leave peacefully in the wilds. And look who stands at the top of their throne, if not the metal body of one of their new gods. Standing in metal, he bears no head. Enough of them are there for him to be the instrument of execution.’

Soon, as soon as the dust expanded, the vision drew nearer to their faces. Many of the Carrions recognised themselves and had nothing to say about. They were not only lost but they had nothing to say. For all the pain in the world wouldn’t amount to this, for a good reason. Peace fell from their sight, and it was time to come about the place. Worse of all, it was not only their bodies which got destroyed but their spirits which showed clear signs of not wanting to give in at all. Otherwise, short lived, in disgusting days in which peace was lost.

‘I was humiliated in front of my brothers and for what do you think? It was only because I dared spare you of their future, I, who was forced to fight against you in chains.

Look at how they wouldn’t even give me a fair chance to defend myself from their oncoming blows. I feel as if there’s nothing else needed to be said.’

Before they could see the culmination of what was about to happen in the court, the vision faded and they still failed to understand what had happened there. Who was responsible for it and why.

Why was the face on the quadran still speaking in their ill-founded teriak, spindling between the art of hiding between many templated that hid who he was. He who would hide himself like a coward gave them nothing in return. He who presented himself as the one in charge of their speech was silent there.

And Glorra made sure that’s the only thing they’d know. Otherwise, it could all be lost.

A break from the taking, no one wanted to look at the obsucre triangles. As soon as they lowered themselves, everyone went into their corners and started hiding just as far as their reaches extended. Otherwise, they’d be undefended from the Falking Demugg that came. Up to his corpse there remained none to be reanimated any longer, yet he came dressed in a few, wearing them through his breathless-suit. He basked around the place, revealing nothing of the real unit he were underneath the deathless coats he wore inside. Each of them wore their disturbing suits, darkly orange coated from the amount of infantile chemicals they fed him on. He knelt, revealing a mass of muscle which grew on corpses. He had managed to add to an unnatural bulk from which he paid no respects. Brought to him as if on a plate were the two hares they hunted in the evening.

His helmet was wider than his shoulders for a good reason. His unobstrusive filters began pushing through the back and giving him the imbalance he needed to lay his hands onto them. At once he interjected.

‘Come, I brought something to you.’

We all saw that he was hunchbacked; one of the worst possible cases, if that may be added. But none dared cackle.

Soon so much pain would be forced away. Out of their hands, even, as they promised to repay the gift he shared with them.

It should’ve come sooner than that. But they were brought only to the point of not being aware that they were there. The chamber was hulking, its sides were trampling the near surrounding area, in a fluke. It wasn’t safe to dwell outside for too long anymore. Not since the headquarters still shook despite the absence of tonal life inside of it. Closely put, the apparition of the other monitoring parasitie-humanoid units had amounted to little in terms of the surveillance. It was a mere fact that there hadn't been any sightings of the tribal entities outside their borders. Hence, came the silence in. No alteration came so far.

No movement could be distinguished from the upper-levels with one exception, the dormant and the broken who stood at the crossroads between all trains. Though he had almost taken to itself to become some miss-aligned reptile out of the replicas the bodies had been formed into, it now rested as if nothing had happened.

Like an organ which had succumbed to the point of not being able to rise from its mold, it stood there. No chamber came near it, and most of them had failed in their attempts to refill themselves with anything living. For at least a few weeks, they had been filled to almost full capacity with still-borns that hadn't had the chance to fight for their lives any longer. An act of depuration even pushed them to abandon them in the pile. As, by this very moment, the strange concoction which had almost given the stragglers food had failed in itself, being no longer jerkily surrounded by the protective jelly which had encompassed it before, it died. Alone, with not a single point of consciousness given even to the remote chance that there was a thinking being in it, so much so that it was theirs. For now at least, this place belonged to the Foremen.

And they had become even more lurid as time passed. Wretched in the way not even the living passed, by themselves, with themselves, surrounded by nothing else but their similar faces, they stood on their back, against the machine. It would sadden you to see them this way. Since the hole-filling would mostly act by itself and since they had long given up on the prospect of exploring further, they had reclaimed their own minds.

'Again, what must I do to get out of here? There must seriously be something I could wrap my hands around and strangle, twist with a spanner and fix. Fix, that's what it is, I need to fix a broken tool.'

'There's nothing here left to fix unless you somehow count your mind with it. Now go back to your post and stay.'

'What's the point of it? I didn't see a reason eight hours ago, I won't see it anymore. Not now, not then, I will never see it, if I can only.'

'Only what, now, Foreman? I can see not single good reason for you overracting now. We actually won, we managed to lure all of those scum-bums out of their hiding and put them to good use. You can't seriously look forward to starting it all over again? After working this hard, I might say, we earned this.'

'Well deserved, as well, listen to him Foreman, there's no point in trying to fill holes that don't exist.'

'And once we're done with it, then what? They'll rot and we'll have to re-fill them again. And that way, we'll.'

He turned for a second in consideration. What were they planning now? Certainly not what he thought they would. Not to be misunderstood now, but he hadn't even the slightest idea of trying it. Pushing it and gnawing on rocks. Just so he could paint the time away, he searched for it.

'My notes are gone. Has anyone of you seen them?'

There wasn't any answer, nor did they offer a piece of mind in return. If anything, they scolded him for being that much of flat-skull for keeping such a childish thing around him. Some things were meant for others. And he himself had administered as much. By the eight turn of a rock that was moved at various intervals by vibrations, he came to question why they were there in the first place. It was a derange activity, which made him walk.

'Where are you going?'

Not going to answer to it now.

With every promotory, he considered what was about to happen.

There was the strange carrousel-like trap in which they all stood past the cave. Other than that, deeper and more threateningly were their strange twitches. I should've known this was going to turn out to my disadvantage. Ever since I fooled that man, I knew the guilt would return. And it hit me then, all those strange smiles and the weird lies and the meetings with the others, they all added up to this point. I could somehow feel it haunting me again. It pained me even more than I had expected.

'Woe to me, let me get through.'

But even they ignored me now. As a pastor to the sheep, I could only see the stangely eaten parts of the cave, which stopped being devoured at the exact stricken point where they appeared. Hardly grasping at those strange holes, I hardly fathomed what was going on there. Luckily for the damp, stricken by the lack of moisture as each act carried on, I saw through it, knowing of something less. I've come to confess that there were worse things I might've said. On my way there, I felt the distress of those surrounding me but I could only realise after being too far gone that they weren't entirely there.

And a greater part of me had been chewed upon, until I was left with nothing but the slightest looking frown formed across my chest. A part of my arm was missing and it only went as far to miss, more than a face, more than the neck. Stricken down by pieces of his helmet that didn't make it off, he whiffed around his throat. With his non-dominant hand he scratched ahead and found just about a quarter full of foul-rock. Coming from around the place, it was recognisable. By all accounts, he knew where it had come from. He did not complain any longer, instead he moved. Wretched in both sides, it pained the lass to think of it that way.

It all came down to him. Tour came to his senses yet. He had left his nest before the others could even get to him, giving in the point instead of overtrying and petty-playing. Mess containing yet for too long had it happened for him to douse off near the bridge. Hardly could he see past it, yet he carried on rolling around amongst the mist. Far too vex, as it looked, there wasn't any way of knowing if the elation lasted for long.

'Where am I being taken now?'

Tour looked at the captor as soon as he realised he wasn't rolling around any longer. Hardening as far as he knew, there was nothing else he wanted to dwell around into. It was hard to act like was the only contender that wanted to make noise. With everyone down there, he knew there would be some uprise every now and then. From what he heard over the helispeakers, he understood it.

'So where am I being taken now?'

Again, there was no answer to there. He didn't bother to respond to any of the provocations set in store for him. There was too much embded on him and too many parts lying over. And that incessant noise never stopped for as lone as they pushed up to the singing point, a good name to it, given by the strangers as far as he knew. Could you hear that? Even if it took you a second now, could you hear it? It was an unrealistic approach, even for him. He tried getting something out of his throat. Though he was a somewhat straping stranger, with a fillament going through his neck, this was a normal day of his life.

After what happened who could blame him for taking his day off. Strange, how it never rained, but through the high-mist you could see the land falling apart just as another train went through. They never embarked those. As a matter of fact, they never got to chance to see what they looked like.

Only now had he gotten the chance to se the terms. In his strange appartment there were the marks of drops, solid, encumbering around the granulated spots which couldn't move. He started shaking, checking himself for a pulse with the nid-press. Whilst placing himself on the back. Not while being exposed like that. Carefully moving his gaze a few inches away, he saw the flat fiend holding. It was a complete decompression of the bones which took everything away from him on that very day, on that dreaful night which followed in minutes. The shakings as he watched them rebuilt one of the last factories only dragged him on. It drew near. A time for play and one for debt, he was the collector. As from that flat gate, which had become the creature, the various falling drops took his filament away.

But what was the matter? Everyone knew that the filaments weren't supposed to be gone. They were never gone. It was them, it was part of their being, what they were. Instead of darting out, they pushed in, more so than it had been desired, only a few inches at a time, up to a few meters. Worse than the pain had been the pressure, which only dragged him to pushing through. As he was made aware of the mindlessness that carried him through the press, he saw the being extend. It wasted no time in finding an outlet for itself. He was worked out for the next eight day and night cycles before he stopped resisting, feeling the fillament come in. A few days at that, he finally walked out, straight out of the premise and into the world. Everyone had fallen on their backs again, they were going through the same ambiguous death which would revert back, if need be.

‘Cnarhemull, calls the mule.’

A long long beckon called back on him. It wanted the waste his insides produced. He played amongst broken feet and wondered what went on around him.

‘I wish this pain would end.’

‘So would it.’

It was spoken for again.

Twenty straps leads out of town. Farther than the station where so many perished standing down, they had finally been accepted in.

Siskelot and the others, who were only trying to get in, they had already set up a ruse. As a matter of fact, the Carrions were measured and checked, as to make sure that the perfect one could be brought back at home. The elimination could come close, if the wrong terms were used, nothing would stand up to this ruse of souls. Off-track, taken back, he started replicating their adherence to the weird contours.

Something broke in the universe, specifically in the brains of the operation, mostly because everything was overencompassed by an unlookable glitter which made it hard for the unaccustomed to look around.

They ran as hard as they could get to it, reaching the main control area. Whereas people were struck down, they survived. They had to. Somehow, for the same ransom which took them off guard, in the surrounding areas where they didn’t even force themselves to care.

Colt had his knee broken. Grendle would suffice. He produced some cloth out of his wrist before realising what was wrong with him. It was a pint which took him off guard. They were of a chessboard-like stratter now. It was impossible to know how they got on it in the first place but nothing else would do. From every side, those tunnels were rounded and carried on wormling around the place like a bunch of obtruse snakes that pushed on. He couldn’t handle the stress.

‘Were we followed?’

‘I don’t know, you know I can’t tell.’

It was dim-borough, as if the lights were trinities that eat themselves over night.

So many moving oroborous squishing themselves in, they left us little to do and even less to control.

‘I shall initiate.’

He stopped trying to push it as hard as he could. It was getting way too dangerous to thread along, as they were overexposed to the forced that were gnawing near.

We’re done here, if only I could get the time off to take a piece of his mind off, then everything would go back to normal. Of course he can’t twitch. Something’s wrong with his brow, he’s not making a lot of noise now. He wants to be fed.

‘May I get something, if you don’t mind?’

The screen turned to him. It blinked twenty five times. He was shaking nervously. Both of them were desperately trying to get a word in. Yet the mood was stagnant, it pushed on through the nervous system until it began pushing thorough his mind. What were the berries which appeared? They were much fatter than anything they encountered before. They didn’t want to be there. For more than one side of the building, they were caught off guard, looking out ways to be even more surprised that they were. It was incontestable, looking into ways of eating. Devouring the mass of sund-prass, it only knocked him over to his feet as he realised there were better ways to spend the time.

‘Off with their toes, I’ll eat them if I can, just play me the song of grimness and I’ll go.’

One of the captors started looking for their prey. Being eluded in the worst possible manner hadn’t served anyone at all. It was dangerously obscure, trying to cover this world in a mossy fur like muscle. It would spread in here at any moment, turning them into caterpillar creatures of the worst kind. It was their destiny to end up there, listening to the sounds of the obscene. Looking back, on the track of spider tracks that were being played, a melody conveyed the mood.

‘Grendl, I think I’m being starved off intentionally by it. I think, I think it knows.’

But they could only hinder at what was going on. A distantly reproduced face appeared on the screen. It gave a cucumber grin and began again.

‘Dour, I know who you are, we spoke before, remember?’

‘Relax, I’m not looking for anything now. Don’t start something you can’t even fathom turning over.’

It wasn't like it. Not that way, but we were both aware that there was a mute point. I couldn't beat him in a single match of wits, there's something to him that's wrong. It breeds insolence just trying to get over, without a doubt, it could be me next. I suppose there's no other way to get to it, this is the last resort I came to. But belligerently I asked for help. He had to give it to me. Somehow, I didn't care which way. As long as I staved off whatever passed through Colt's gut, anything would be forgiven. Even the most desperate and the wild.

'What's this room in any case?'

'A tiny metal pulpit that's meant to stave off intruders, it's one of the lower areas where we keep the degenerates from falling into action.'

With all being taken into account, we both fit the description entirely to the point where we were carbon copies of them. Those who appeared out of dusk, out of nothingness, who stared at us as if we were nothing for them, inconsequential. Even worst than that, for the time being, we weren't even acknowledged at being alive. It was the most insulting thing that ever happened, and it hadn't even started yet. We were targets after all. With a pointer in each head that signaled the fire taking no survivors.

'I am pleased that you will at least listen to my proposal now. I'll let you know now that this isn't a dead end, there's a hidden way.'

Uh, uh uh, not yet, perhaps you should consider the well being of your friend there before you do something you may come to regret. He won't make it out there, not with those doors opening and closing on their own.'

Dour was right, for what was worth, he at least seemed to tell the truth. It couldn't be encompassed any longer, not by normal means. He wanted to get something from us and in return?

'What will it take for me to make a trade? What will suffice?'

Grendle considered his affliction for a moment here. After everything he's gotten through, this wasn't even the lesser of the evils, not in a mile. There were more dangers pushing out of his head, trying to conjure something for him to do even though he got hog-shot in the foot before realising what was going on. He was being shaken all over, everything was being taken from him.

‘Two pints, and two gallons of your plasma-tinders. That’s all I’m asking for, they shall be finely reappropriated for me in the most interesting manner. I’ll make a great deal out of them for as long as I am.’

‘What do you need them for?’

‘I suppose it wouldn’t harm you to know, little dull-headed thing. As you should know that I’m supposed to keep it going.’

Unknown to either of the living things, they were sitting in one of the rail-control chambers as well. Somehow they overlapped, since there hadn’t been a soul in agony, blasted be the one who escaped, space had to be compressed. Uncertainty ran rampant for a good reason, looking back at it, there was no wonderment as to what he could say, what words could be conveyed and what this treason involved.

But they were the inner-workings no less. With them in mind at least the blind would go as far as to know that there was a slight chance for them to avoid having one of the trains come out of nowhere, crushing them to bits and splatters of bones. Everyone here had grown a spine and they all looked as the man who had escaped now.

‘You, I don’t say this often, and don’t mind me complaining now. Since I’m in control, I have no fear of anything bad happening to me. For this sole reason I think I might to well.

But I wish they were intelligent, as you are now. I cannot explain it, but with each passing day, from my observations, you’re losing your spark as well.’

‘Shut your mouth!’

Grendle came off. It wasn’t as hard felt as he expected yet he wasn’t concerned by it. As a matter of fact this felt more personal than anything, something which was his. Never felt and touched, but a secret they shared between themselves.

‘I am your friend, do not make the mistake of thinking it wrong here, but I want to befriend you and make sure you won’t suffer any further damage, do you understand that?’

Now, I’ve been as civil as I could and as a way of showing it even further, I’ve got this to offer you.’

A means to an end, which came to the starvation before it pushed on through his numb feet. He couldn’t run on his toes, being broken, that much he could still spare for himself.

‘I wish I knew of some way, to, to repay you for this.’

‘Worry not, it will come in time. As long as you realise that there’s some kind of fluid in your gut preventing you from taking action against me, then everything will be set in place.’

Grendl ignored what he said. His friend’s life was far more important for him to tread on. And it only drove him mad to push away, he was trying to get his way in, a word or anything, but it wasn’t meant that way. From the open darge, a piece of the metal hound-like compactor pushed a single tray of berries. He was slowly being mouth-pieced in part. Going too far or too fast could do some irreversible damage he couldn’t get away from.

Woe to him and let them know that it was hard felt.

Farther than that, they were working to save as many lost false-souls and false-people as they could. Not even the unit Dour but everyone else, who had the slightest contact with the outside world. The Carrions were unaware of the cut in-half building out there. Some of them hinted at looking in but most of them turned around and showed no interest on a good whim. Why would they care? Should it matter as long as they spend the time together in ignorance and in dust?

He had come out there in the wild and they weren’t going to leave him undisturbed. Not after pulling the grand helmet, the armourous-skin peeled off. And this strange creature was one of them, though it bore more than enough sides to speak with one hundred of them at a time.

‘As I said, I have find a cure to prevent the entire bodily castration this disease brings. If not for I, you could.’

‘Stop there, as you are foul. Don’t dare show your encapsulated form any more, I know what you are, illusion, thing of mourning bore.’

He had been sprayed with some water from the evil fountain Zeryi. As soon as contact was established, he had given in and knelt. It was hard felt, as much as he could reapproach it, giving the least of a concussive feel. Metal wasn’t part of his armour, he wore none. He was a slime-like creature that was coated in the frugal shade. Of him nothing could stand. Slowly he began regurgitating himself until nothing had remained of him.

‘You fool, do you truly think we would fall for it this soon?’

No prophet are you, no creature, no savior, no anything, but a con creator, a damn abater. Leave now, Glorra, you are banished for your sad attempt to turn our youth.'

'But I have not.'

'Silence, Glorra, we're aware of what you had in mind. We know that you of all our people would not turn a blind eye to the suffering that's been happening around us. As a matter of fact it's done, it's been realised.

You're banished from our plains. Go ahead and walked with your own intruders, never meet us again.'

At least that's what he hoped so far, that they could be spared of trying to pay too much attention to him now. Bars were set, he was pushed out and thrown out of their tribal region, gone for good, as he should.

'I won't forget this, you scowling creets. I will get you somehow, I swear it.'

To his throat of a gone sharp claw he pointed, madly set on getting either to them, or.' With a single claw he set himself forth to their city up high, where the sky was reached by their blasphemous cries.

What was there to fear in the testimony of impurity?

What was there to fear for calling him our new disciple?

It was a reminder of the true master, the bringer of joy. A separation from the new, coming from the past with nothing else but a mildly phased deliverance pushed through the brow and into the mass of scowls, they did not care any longer. What small minded creatures such as the champion and the guards failed to understand was the fact that this was not their place of refuge. They didn't belong here by any means, intruders one had to swear to it before realizing that they were without feat.

Many of the buildings started losing their decrepit accent, it was just one side effect of being slowly absorbed. They would become giant again and govern over the site as they ruled over the smaller ones during the growth.

'We were given the gift of the Leviathan. He is the only one who knows the truth towards enlightenment.

Without him we shall swear to naught.'

He will help us raise and see his heart, the point where Carrion life began and where it shall begin again.

Despite as cruel as it seemed, most of them being taintedly convinced that there was a reason for their fondness at this new way of life. But beneath the streets, they were cutting the giant leviathan-pigs for the chow. Feeding their young as the animals were tormented under their roofs at night, and it was the same slop that fed the building into growth. It would still be them who saved them from falling off.

'Courice, coruice, courice, we need to feed them yet.'

It was the first bell that was rung, again and again they started butchering inside the bowels, gathering up as much material as they could. At the base of the giant Carrion-building a system of strangely burrowing long necks pushed in beneath the ground. It was the farthest thing from being decent that one could think of. 'Who is he that would appear and betoken us of the tribe?

Why should we listen to an outsider as he breaks the line before our pure line?'

There was less of a form and more of a desire to know, who, if all would dare bedraggled his vile lies to their young. It couldn't be forseen not thought off

'How shall he be presented to us there?'

'By a trial of eight wonders, let him hunt.

Hear me, leader, of wingless one whose wings have flown.'

In irony, thought it be known, the chief was the only one bearing a healthy pair of working gliders which expanded as far as the dreadful color would allow. For him pain could not be defined and it couldn't be seen.

'We shall see to it here and let it be that I shall rip off his jaw.'

They would not settle on anything at all. Worth could not be obtain as long as they started pushing their breeds away, letter for letter they brought the skin out and showed to the many headed peon that appeared in front of them that they had received the commands. Brought from about the rims of the sky, they claimed this so far:

'Our ungodly master, the Leviathan had come and spoken to us.'

Us to us, to us, so much as for the subtly, it got to their heads. It was hard to control after and never had it happened after the sake of it. It was unfair for whatever reason they could tell. Woe to him, a bitter end.

Have we had enough?

Laying into hindring yet for now, there was little to do after that. For hours spent hunting for him in the waste, they realised that the bemused waited as he basked. Alone in arrogance, at last.

What could be told as acting the way would seem to fit the loose description of being a mentally deranged. For as short period of time, though it was remotely secluded, they found a way out. And they took it in a light break of feet, getting away. A trashy advent forced him into to get out of his way and kill as many standing duds as he could get his hands upon.

He of lower viles, a mute-blind dud-head himself, began shouting in his mind.

'Siskelot, I want what's mine.'

But he couldn't get to it, no matter how hard he tried. There were aerial-branches and plenty of stops he hadn't even been vaguely aware of anymore.

He would be dissatisfied with waiting, especially for someone who'd forsaken them all. He dwelled in their lands now and seemed to grasp the desperation, while running around in search for it. In a failure or a fixture of determination, the champion of Clot remained blindfolded in blood in a lost corner in which he started taking shots.

A distant look would make him look like a porcupine raven that was being constantly stabbed by its low-life conteneer.'

Today there was no light. After a curtain draped over the sky, only the burn remain and a constany black circle look as if it pondered on an ashtray. It got colder. Much colder, way too cold to even hope that most of them would make it through the process, but it came to him then, what the giant Carrion-covered buildings stood there for. It was likely never to be touched upon. But they acted like wind-traps that blew in size. Warming everyone inside as the roots finally got to where they had in mind. A spot of heat they punctured blindly, taking what was theirs before, to put it lightly, could they be stopped.
It was a land of rotten meaningless trappers. A disaster for the very fact that they started eating their death as soon as they broke apart in the mirth of another duster, a play of wind, the chance of being broken. It seemed lightly dazing.

'Give root a chance, we crawl inside of it and eat all.'

'Nay, we don't look back to it again, never pleasing to the eye. Never call it an eye.'

Court of Gibberish

Contamination area, servants myrth awaits.

Thence the court had been presented to thine myre.

'I see now, to descend upon my empire, I need to thire the chords and see to it that I'm forlorn and lost, I'll see to it.'

He gasped for breathe. First enter the servant, and let him be heard.

In the wake of dread there was nothing worse than the chain-munching, which priskled the genes. It pushed through him as soon as he started collecting them and pacing himself near the other. His one horned forehead protuded entirely, pushing through. Despite being chained, he was bare, as he carried his forehead on with impunity. He was a brunt-skineed, lucky-beaded, caught in trap morose a man with nothing about him normal. With all the crossed legs in his back, and the one arm pushing through his chest, he carried the Demi-tour. A covalescent box which sporuted many long and extending pyramid-stars, which helped him recorded the universe from the panels of S'rar.

A clear disturbance appeared for what he was concerned with. It pushed through his mind for ever few decades or so until he had been completely enveloped by it, with the myrk of quiet pushing through. After a period of peace he wondered what the space-tumor was. It was vastly recorded for the whole reason he knew it would eventually spread and devour the known part of the universe in its entirety.

For the time being, that was settled but little was known. He was corrupt to the heart and sold the information to the predatory being of space. They choke on themselves as soon as they could devour the faces of the ill-taker, ill-talker and the butchery of comets, where they snatched the bodies of the Tyrant catchers in the bastard sector of Barr.

Their bodies fetched great prices, as the mere extraction granted a great retreat. For what was happening around them was, as one would lay his arms perturbed, he'd know of their evil, and how it would spread, if you were to listen to the machinations put inside of them, then and only then. But again, the related text was nothing more than gibberish hid inside a veil of of darkness, hid from the common eye in an unnatural guttural tongue never to be found again. No more information was needed on the subject. It would yield naught for no man.

‘What have you to report?’

‘An extreme laceration, the creation of the breaking, as I’ve said before, I believe they’re manufacturing broken space-systems. Made so only to feed him in his wake, as soon as he penetrates dimesions, I fear there will be no stopping to him any longer.’

His mold-chaste looked confused. He didn’t know exactly how to interpret this string of information he was given. As soon as it was pulled from one of the devices, it was all too clear, never to have been brought up again. There were falsified information about the den in which they hid. Uncanny as it seemed, there was no way of pulling it out. They were trying to claim themselves as being destined for deathless gazes whereas others didn’t even bring it back.

‘I wish there was some quiet here. There’s focus but there’s also, I cannot explain it.’

Oratory or not, the Demi-tour kketin-slave turned towards the courier.

‘My lord I shatter but a gust. I know I the one you may see the last. But listen to what your servant say’, don’t forget I served you in the mutter’s maze.’

‘And who are thee?’

Sesolt was weary of intruders today. He could not pay no heed to a lost servant who could not convey a word. This disicple would antagonise him to no end. For his surroundings lay grazed in a moromonic-plane. A bitter strangled daze of many lots that stood adjacent in lost forests that surrounded the remnants of a levitating hold, of many bonding elements that broke the planet in a home for those who were uncanny. Striken down like dogs, and known at last as bitter lap-snow, they carried on the order still.

Unable to decide when to stop despite knowing that they had been abandoned in the past, they cast themselves as strangers to the ways of knowledge. Locked inside, the key snapped. It showed no signs of receeding. Pushing out of the way, he conveyed a pantomime of large intruders.

He didn’t speak of them but showed their likes. Despite not knowing what went off when the lights fell off.

The King thence approached. As for our court, we must bring all the jesters, all five hundred of them, as they are our servants after all. It could not be their task alone or betokened for every task ahead. They were dreading every moment for they could not. It was inconclusive.

Why yes, they called in the mighty jester, leader of the bunch. After surrounding him, they pushed him through the steel. The plaster and the veil revealed a cancer of tremors that spread and shot itself in as many sides.

And for a moment, when life stood still, only a single force came between them and said.

‘Do as I say, my servants and ensure that my survival will continue by any means.’

Why have I become this? It’s obvious that I was making a fool of myself. Up to this point, the insomnia had overtaken me. It turned me into a fool. I had seen a jester dead before. I know how they act. You may be surprised to hear this out, but I truly think they’re wrenching themselves there.

I feel lost at times, not hearing the voices any longer. Shaking like a pig-botched tapestry, I wondered.

Why was I the only jester not allowed to entertain the court?

‘Her me now, I shall listen to no perilous tale for the time being.’

We were destined to look upon the star of cancer and breathe it in. Thence he spoke.

‘Will I hear it again?’

Thence he spoke.

‘Will there be light?’

Thence he spoke.

But every came out of sight before the voice could go at it again.

It was one of the jesters. He was bad mannered and somehow morosely shoved through one of the rock candles. He was trying not to turn into wax again. An unfortunate event happened after. He could come out of him and be distant.

‘Uphold the light?’

See the light fade, and there were no surroundings. They were standing on nothing. And they could see the sky. But the sky was empty, other than the spreading faces and the giant people whose formse only went through them. Before they could become baloon-like in form and extend, they pretended they were trees. A long while after they stood.

Every jester was misunderstood then.

For the same reason they were trying to pinpoint the dark plan before it could shake the world. It hit like a swoon on the rocks of mourning. But those rocks were more distinct than the others.

Everything came back to normal.

Enter the villan, spoken like a beheaded God. He was truly wrong, he was beaten to it. Even now, he failed to chase the clouds. It was his muscles, he filled with them. And he was burly as well, bare chested, but bearing scars. He opened one of the scars and pulled out of it a jester.

Another one jointed the bunch. Every jester was colored in a different way. But he looked like everyone.

‘I came back from my long journey.

What might you think of me now?’

‘Who are you?’

He approached this fellow. Twenty feet, measured as they appeared, belonging to dames, she was Marry after all. That’s her name. A pint to the making, the broad cyllinder wheel of plut coming into view, some of them broke the walls coming through the tall standing floating paint-boxes. But none of them were made out of carboard.

Enter twenty years ago.

It was here where everything made sense. This time it wasn’t a lie. This was where the escape was and where the sould ended. Or they didn’t. Depending on their guts, it was important because they weren’t bloody. As soon as you opened a man you would see the entire man come out of himself like a mold, but he wouldn’t be talking. It served as a way to know.

To show this in action, one of the tormented ones came near.

‘Cut my belly. That’s what I want of you. I think I made my decision now. Perhaps I was wrong in the past, thinking I had a chance to be real, depending who I’ll meet after he comes out, that’s simply when I’m going to take my chance and not a second longer.’

‘You sure about it, there’s something we could spare you off.’

‘No, I’ll bear this cut.’

Of course, he was the other man who came out of the scar. That had been his answer. As soon as he fell in front of the Jester, his face was ripped out. A disaster, it happened so quickly. Eyes were peering through the skin, most of them had been infested with it. Strange but unforgotten, you could sense the breathe.

Sense it as in seen it, they’ve all seen it come between. Others might’ve known it.

Boats were rowing in an almost erratic way. They couldn’t control it any longer because of the sole pain and heat. Another factor which came to him, another ballad began. It was well, no longer trying to dispell the madness off. The amnity would be withled.

The court began.

‘Let us hear the first entrant. Who shall come and what shall he say?’

‘I am Gurden, I fell here. Need I say more or should I mourn myself for what I’m doing?’

But what was he doing after all?

He’s beaten himself to a pulp, with something that he shouldn’t have touched.

‘What is it? What is it?’

What could it be? Please tell us your majesty?’

‘An atrifact of the worst kind, don’t look at it.’

They were all blind. For twenty more minutes, everyone started guessing how much blood they were spilling through their bones and blinders, the guts and weird finders. ‘Perhaps one of us should step forward and allow us to admit that we ruined everything.’

Another one of them stepped in line.

‘How could this be? After everything we’ve done, it cannot end this way.’

‘Silence, I won’t listen to any word. Unless, there could still be some hope we ought to look for.

I call in the first witness.’

And then he came. Though he was of a different cult, and dressed in black, which was ever so peculiar and bizarre for a jester, he would do. Ill intention had no reward. To his prowess they couldn’t count on dirt.

‘As much as I enjoy wasting time in here with you here, I believe it’s time to go forth and try something else.’

‘Shouldn’t we at least try questioning the witness?’

‘Of course not, he’s deaf after all. On top of that, look at the seal around his lips. He’s a mute.’

‘A mute for muttinity, the ship sailed.’

Already had the top of their court started drifting on the sea without a way of a grand return. Looking back at it, you could discern only this. What had once lain below it now lay in dust. With all the crushing weight that fell off, nothing remained to it but the pain that kick them back. It was strange, seeing them all in suits.

But they appeared less human than they’ve been before. Now their ship was anything but a ship as it had become a leviathan from below.

Despite being as peculiar as they were, those jesters were all Carrions, after the way and speech, manifold in the way they acted. Neither of them reacted in the same way after. It seemed way too clear that they feared themselves and those around them. It went even deeper than that. As they feared one another but chose to stay, now they met each other’s gazes with the slightest hint of despair.

After a fashion, they’ve done this to themselves. The scars that once belonged to the hardened contender now hosted feathers after some involuntary fashion. He would be regarded as a man, a stranger who found himself living in a tendricle. Some would say.

‘Allow me to present myself, I am the Jester known as Soular.’

‘As in the eclipse, why that’s majestic and a piece of the other kind of world one ought to know and look into. Mind if I took a look in what you made so far?’

‘I’d like to show you a piece of my mind.’

‘What was that?’

Not a silence, the leviathan groaned now. He could not be held from the looks of it, but they wanted to put some pain in him. Just to make sure he acted out of the wild connections, mad directions and whatever else he wanted more. It was by his exploits that he got where he was. And no one could take that away from him.

‘We could only replace so many of his body parts at once, you know? Before he’s being broken in part, we could at least ease it a little.’

‘Shut yer mouth before I kick it out.’

Reprise.

So they went ahead and started flying around the towers. Being where they were, in this strange place, it couldn’t even be thought as anything else but a fluke. A misunderstood travel which went through some unnatural field. After pushing through a barrier, they finally got where they needed to be. Jittery as they were, now the ship slowed down. It could not be accounted for anymore. And anyhow, it didn’t matter for what they were aiming at.

‘Silence in the court I say. Don’t make any noise whatsoever!’

They were trying to converge out of their peculiar state. No emotion could be conveyed by this dark attire they had dressed in. For far too longer they wondered what was going on and now the answer came. For better and the vain would come at last.

‘Please be it so that we’re being heard now.’

He took as deep a breath as he could before one of his mollars fell off, disintegrating in the air. He had been passionate by it, by the strange insignificance of air torments which floated around.

‘We were destined to reach the stars, so what’s the matter?’

As they drew to him, pointing forth, they thought for a second, who would that be and why happened before he could carry on. With words in the making they only considered this.

‘Walk on pricks and feet, I think the towers are awakening.’

Right so, that in fear, the leviathan stopped. It furiously swiped left and right, trying not to fall out right.

It came to it, that to the lack of its feet, it could do nothing of the sort. No thinking and no trailing. No battle with the sailing. And thence it foamed within the place, whereupon the towers shook themselves forth but never woke. The giant beds, the evil creatures that laid there as the dead would never allow their return, and as much as that was important, so would the vessel lay dormant, no longer needing to feed. It was the sign of its victory and none might dare push within itself. Words for the petty, now came the one who dusted the insides of the leviathan, so came the floor.

‘How is it spilling inside? This isn’t supposed to happen.’

But it was not the same flood that threatened the world, but something much worse, at least for them. Anything less might've been dealt with as well as abandoned. But this? This could not be dealt with, it could not be gotten through.

‘Betoken of my marching desires, I see what the water is made out of and I cannot get out of the murk that promotes.’

No growth would come, as it pushed out, immediately stopping the advent. To no end it started rotating, swirling around. From it, only a solid pair of forms pushed out. First it leveled out at their feet, never growing or pushing forth past their knees. Afterwards, it only started as this kin. Pushing out the tender tubular barrels revealed only the close proximity of spherical empty domes. Half outside, whereas any object that got covered by them immediately became invisible, as the other only pushed farther in. From a symphony of dread, called back to their ends, in between the domes appeared the primordial bodies of some vertebrates, with wings implanted in their heads.

They were not restricted by invisibility, instead they chose to open up so widely around the backs of their basins, that they would start creeping in. Feet-like in size, tormented as to die for, the pain was never ending here. There was no appeal to the hardening goop which tormented the beings. And the entire room got colored by blue. From each of them you could see the signals being carried through.

‘Malakerth is speaking, listen to him now.’

A jester shouldn't care for it. But he listened to it without doubt. He acted robotic, as a phantasm lost to the wits of a greater being which was made out of skin. Pouring in the lesser one, he ought to have known better than to shout. There was little doubt in the world now.

Burning with sensations, they grew without ends. Like phantasms never showing themselves off the stream to listen to the dead.

‘But what is that I see?’

Not even closer to the horizon they were approaching the envelope of the cosmos, in its full freight. A fight had ensued to them, never to be called in the light of day, never to convey another message than it would be needed. They looked through square eyes and saw an opening, a stairway they walked upon.

‘Where to now, where should we go?’

‘We ought to travel through the window of time and through this tunnel and meet the heads.’

‘All of them?’

‘Indeed, for as much as can be said about it, and never return unless our mission is approach and the land will be saved from this commotion.’

It came to him that he wasn't sure on himself, not as much as he would find it going. Rowing against the palletes of wonder, he had been estranged without a thunder. A meaning came to mind.

‘I shall not go ahead and blind myself with your cones.’

‘Listen to me now, I need to tell you something.’

One of the jesters missed their chance. Instead of doing it they pushed ahead and worked themselves as they ought to. In an inadmissible way, collecting the teeth that didn’t belong to them from around the crane, it was missing off, a piece of the head pushing through the crowd.

‘I am Lour, it’s a pleasure to be acquainted with you.’

Something broke there aloft in the mind of the poor man. That’s where the satisfaction and creation went off.

How did they get there to begin with?

This was the last time they could. It was a free-fall which had no inhibition. A duel of wits on the giant chessboard placed on top of cosmos.

On one side there were the towers as the pawns, facing the leviathans, behind the king of all, the vessel, and the queen, one of the lesser. A vessel who been deeply replaced, all that mattered for it was the act in which he faced the loss.

Two beds stood as crooks, on the side, the knights only the damned ones who had been trapped inside and then the bishops who came not to abide. For they were the pawns in themselves, both the professors and his pupil at that, even as both Sam and the professors shivered they could not account for the loss of quiet which happened about in space.

For the jesters were the white rooks, the knights, the bishops, the kings and queens, now painted in their attire. Leviathans could admire one another yet again, from the look of it, painted by the flaps, the blubblers and the oil.

Though they were inconsiderate of how they looked, it didn’t matter as long as they pushed on. Yet the game was interrupted, no more adoration for the dead. They spent too much thinking eight moves ahead that they failed to move from moats and ledges. The board broke in half and they fell.

‘I can walk again.’

Said one of the jesters who couldn’t point and didn’t know what to say, compared to others, he lost too much, and he had fought for what he had.

‘Does it matter who I am?’

Parrlo said, he danced and smoked from eighteen hookas that would bring the toll of heaviness. Too much smoke would stand the chance of inflicting him with the others.

Often and a go, they would be inconsiderate as to what he wanted to say.

Or what he thought about them, by whatever means and whichever tatter. He could not stand it any longer.

‘Can’t think, can’t think of my depraved sun-hub sods as much as urged. It cannot live unless it wants to push on the dirt out through the hub.’

I waged through a pest unfit and then the deer without ever knowing I say of it: Whig lush kip a cone was made under hoister, please do not sneer. I see.

And I could pond lee admire the means omens coffle under dust. Dark forms could unmold the chassed one under the darkness when the mound had heed taken under the dark. And now I see only the light that would try to be joined by moons.

‘No, I cannot fathom such an insolence I say to him.’

‘Because under the keyset I can only hear the moons!’

Wittiest airman or the fretter stopped believing what was going on, as he was only a tourist in the upland-ochre lungs under there.

Seething as the uproars shun access itself, it soughs, sun fuses disdains-case kuku nifty ones sift lush. Oh with the unknots curiously sunder as he wanted to eat but I stoically fating going urging through smother aster under.

In land of indifference idiom say to him:

‘Are mining ohms surer than shunning Inman's arson?’

‘But the arson not saying anything of the curious vein.

I see the wreck apachee train. Going around I cannot pray I could see it again.’

By the luster and the caster's dancer I see after drifting sour graps. They taste like vine-vineyears, I see that they can only convey pain.

I beckon you to hear me out for what they've done to me:

I sees' how lushly our neon becomes a man. He knows that he knows, karakas, under, ah, he becomes a man. He wants you to know I see the bannerol oolong almanac under. I see a name unlock softy sinful ardent.

And it only added to the mad. As the jester came to a sense that was lost under the distracting mounds themselves and bourbon usher I see adroit. Alas sat her as tar emblems then inside the iris gone. Mentor crones sing the upper aster lording on par.

Joined by Agamemnon they sang of the West. I could see the lain usher interim on top the archer nomenclature pest.

But who might account such a wild disaster? By noise or by choice they carry on until they cannot do it anymore. And after that they fathom less. Because they press, the pest I see her under way.

The jesters die and instead of them, only the kings carry on. No disciple, another mind is gone. And there is peace at last and fear.

Near the distrous vileness I can feel inside the man who died near, Sven gunned no Jumna under some Moors. He was misunderstood from the get go, unable to let go. From the abuse unlocks Lamia. And she sings divine. And Lamia was a goddess who could no stop her inhalation from pushing on the dye. He tears were verdant and red, they could not even provided destiny an entry into the world before going out of its way to and fro. Walking past the snow, to the child and the father, they were there. But she wasn't walking more like crawling through the snow.

No lander approached, and none might dare to rise. Even if her demise was accounted her, she would see them in the metal coffin beneath the river and they were sure to die in there unless they cared to get away.

None could certify the need for admittal.

'Admit defeat to our game.'

Another pawn fell out of its way.

It seemed like they were there, inside the leviathan, watching the tormented windows open and expand. And every time they did that, it'd be painful, more than normal pain would allow. They were trying to make is seem like we were watching.

'He appears now.'

From inside a broken depth he came. He had highly headed, arms wrapped, a cyllindrical pair of torsoes waddles on before drawing inside. Here in appeared again, two brow ridgs around the chest, fashioned in dark-violet spirtals. His entire body looked as if it rested on top of a long stump and every root had become his legs, though it was unplanned for.

He floated, came near. Lamia would weary sneer.

In an alabaster cove, I hear them.

'Such disated they are near.'

Plan to action, as they fear, I see, I see. Another one to be for that reason and that be, they sing: Menace the kimono mister shuns. Ah and the leash unduly cocker coke, I shall snore until I can do no more, manhunt on the Island ungluing that that terminus air, lustly cutting on the head.

Point for them? Not going after.

Yet the gentle, as a distaster comes from him, I fear, there's something drawing near him.

'Alan walks again, let's follow him.'

An the automaton-like substance flows in until it can do no more, wait for it longer than you should hear the snore of ages. Can you hear it?

Other than them, it's obvious they can't do it. Can they hear it?

'Twenty more steps backwards.'

It should be enough for now. 'Silence in the court, now come the king of Gibberish, worst of all.' He would show no countenance to them as he paid no heed. Tot heir own children they would be given less of a hint. It could come, somehow. He appeared.

Twice the size and number, legged, up the planar region of a reversed overly shaped head, there rested eighteen trunks which bore long necks that twisted and curled. No, not the damn crown of the head pushed out but the top of what would look like a giant luger kept pumping and disabling their legs. For each pump they could only make it so they avoided pain.

Winds and vibrations could still be felt underneath them, under the filth and the girth of the rounded acre-like holes that pushed beneath it. As to know of the other long extenders, looking at the almost-bejeweled skin, you could see its young hid in, trying to get out. They were suffocating inside.

Circumstances

It was impossible to traverse the entire city without some kind of boost. Ever so closer to being placed against the tall sprouts, it came near the distress caused by the diseased, and the plants that had been there all along. Twenty files were stacked on the walls. And only a single man came blabbering around in the room. He was trying to connect some words, somehow, outwardly so, until something came to him. It felt unnecessary to say anything else after he felt. They fell into place.

It was near the street where he came close to the diner. A known location, used and dry, in the midst of April. Whereas noon pushed past, there was something going on about. Pushing through, an open door came off the wall. It wouldn't see it again after.

I was shocked thinking there would only be a few moments in life when I would see the diner full. Meekly gabbish, to the rustic look, the clean floor shone. You could make out the red boarding atop them. There wasn't much time to order, since I could only make it so obvious that I wasn't in the mood to make it any more suspicious. More than a few eyes turned towards me, the man who looked out of place. And the rustic meaning was lost. It was pious as well as one could feel something near, near, near, he took a moment and he thought.

'It's looked at, ain't it?'

'What would that be, sir?'

'The whole joint, it's under surveillance, isn't it? Don't ask me how I know it, because I simply do.' Never had anyone in the diner, present now or at any point, otherwise, been as startled as they were now. It was an out of this world concept, just to take it by the sugar-basis. He pondered at it while picking on the peanuts from the coffee-table he sat on, it was one one of the smaller ones. Carpent shook his wrist.

Infant hands messed around the table, he said no word but he was ready to order. As they went over their heads to understand his vague sets of instructions, the receipts were handed to him.

'Pay up front.'

'That's not how it's supposed to go.'

'Change of plan, now pay up front or leave.'

A set of payments were set down, enough of them to cover him eating for a few months there. It was important for them to listen and do as he asked, and for that, he asked for the same order to be repeated at the same day, at the same hour, for the next ninety days, without delay or mistake, regardless if he was there or not. As this would end up being an accomplishment on its own, they went on ahead and did as he asked them. Pleased by it, he lit up a cigar.

‘No smoking in...’

He waves at me from across the counter where they passed the smoothies. We both act accordingly and ignore the waitress. She goes away. Man joins me. Quick after, we share the first impression of the night, as for the repertoire, we don’t say a thing. Not at first.

Within the next few minute seconds, as they started going slower with each thick across the clock, I notice a pattern. Skewed by my perception, they get replaced. First the woman with her child, to look at her from this perspective, she had a wig on. You could notice it from the clothe she wore underneath. The daughter was young, absurdely crooked around fingers. Father was missing from the picture. Door bounces quick after, as long as I take this moment off, I’ll see it happen.

An incessant slurping of the smoothie comes in, but it’s the least distracting thing from the overall. I see the next set of family coming in to replace them. They’re more suited for this kind of job. First the other woman who comes forward is followed by another, who I’d asume looked just like her. Both of them are sealed together. Or the first one that first came in the diner had an empty hole or a gap in the back. I can’t explain it otherwise. Either my vision was being blurred or there were two of them in there. Daughter comes after, she’s older now, looks like an alder. Worst scenario is encountered here. No one leaves. They all sit down at the table and simply stare. Only the real ones do it in any case, not that I’m too keen on it.

Everyone believes in something, don’t they? They do for some reason, but I can’t point myself towards it. Every single time, someone’s lost something here, there. Taking breaks from family meetings and late-night goings. I was followed.

The dialogues carry on.

It’s hard to skip them so pay attention.

Whilst being here, there’s another intermission.

The diner is overcrowded.

But by now, it’s already begun.

‘I’ve been waiting for you for the last five hours.’

Stranger one across the coffee table said.

It was even now, seeing how he was consuming something he shouldn’t have.

For his sake alone, this should fit the description right. It was a replica of the diner inside his cup.

And every time he took a single, untutored sip, someone suffered of a stroke. The present twins bled with the same root-beer that was mixed inside the smmothy. It coagulated in some wild foam of chocolate before it stopped. I could see why there was no way out.

For that reason there came the pretender. He had half of the waitress cut in half, wearing her as his own personal back pack. From now I would be served by him.

Odious or not, I saw the lack of light in his eyes. As he turned for a moment, I saw the marks of foraging below her. She didn't die, despite the anchored fridge-working tubes he has stolen and placed inside of her. Now the diner was cold. I was feeling it go through the drinks we were offered as we exchanged little shimmering words.

'I'm listening now, what do you want from me?'

'There was no excuse and no way of saying what you said before. We met before, stranger.'

'I see.'

He took a pack of cards, he was prepared to play. I made no sudden movement yet, I wanted to be sure we were both on the same side, pushing through the limit before one of us gave up. This endeavor hadn't ended. It was irrational to expect me not to react, especially with the Pretender just pushing through my face as if he couldn't mind his own business.

We received the drink without delay, but it was harsh, trying to put it past him unless they were focused on the blocked windows. Barred from touch, and the last person who tried breaking through them and getting out? He lost a finger, they say. And he bled to death from it, because of the toxins. For all that was worth, the toxin forced all the blood outside the body, bloody mess what is was.

'Bruttus, ave Bruttus, ave Bruttus.'

They called, as if it wasn't enough, the diner was soon to fall in place. Half of it at least started collapsing underneath its own weight, until it had been partially broken. There, an open way came for me to stay my knees as I removed them from the joints and I pushed them forth and threw them into the hole.

'There, I'll let them stay there for a while if you don't mind it. As I was about to conclude, in any case, were we not in the midst of finishing a transaction?'

'Were we now? I don't think I heard an offer yet.'

Carpenter considered his stature for the time being. It wasn't at all what he expected, without the least of a doubt, this was the man he was supposed to meet in the first place. With the good and the bad kept in mind, there was still something off. It couldn't pay him for what was worth to push it too far. He wanted to try. Reaching for his collar, the man didn't mind it, but he started unwrapping his neck to see the amount of battery liquids he had ingested in the span of eighteen months. It was dangerous, otherwise. There was no victor's spoil there. Everything was mechanic, the signs outside, the commercials, even the noise, including those biologically made copies who shamelessly came in through the wall.

‘We’ve been munching for hours now, what’s it going to be?’

‘I’ll trade you whatever I can in exchange for her heart. But I want it pulled this night and delivered as soon as you can.’

Again, he painted the surroundings by looking away. Clear sings rustled the surroundings, they were looked even as they spared a card.

‘Deal, I’ll have twenty of them, then.’

‘Twenty of what now, you know I can’t make that broad of a promise, right? What if you ask me to kill twenty children? Am I supposed to get up, walk around the neighborhood and simply started butchering away?’

‘Of course no, that would be far too easy. I mean, it’s your deal whether or not you want to do it in the first place. But I’m only saying you should consider this. If you want to her beating heart, you have to give me twenty.’

And in either case, I wouldn’t ask you to kill twenty children of infants from random locations. I’d probably ask you to visit an orphanage or something of the kind.’

He was blind to it, but accepted, walking closely against the walls, as if he had turned the entire world in a single direciton. Now he pushed and tried doing what the others couldn’t, which was finding a way out.

The strangers would be busy for the next few months, that should give me enough time to think it over. After picking up my knee joints, I only wondered at it, what might it do? How could it go in my direction, this confession, what I’ve done, is nothing to be ashamed off. I thought about it for seconds at rows, the month of August, in the last year still shone upon my brow. It was the lack of a clear reaction which took him off guard. He was off the hook now, walking outside, again.

With only a coffee in his hand which hadn’t spilled. Root-beer in it, the highest mark of a cross-pefunctor, it came to him then, to ask for something up above his head, where they gathered, you see? Them, them, it was always them, whispering for someone to come. Some ladies, youth of old, caught between the middle, yet they couldn’t move their own claws for whatever reason they were gone. In the Moon, there they dwelled.

Sometimes they used to sign about the giant Moon-Crow who was eating it, piece by piece until there’d be nothing left out of it then. By the level of desperation, there was an opening which passed. They straggled something in the city, hoping they couldn’t be heard at last.

‘May I help you with something?’

Carpent hadn’t taken the notice yet, as vulgar as they all sounded, they shared something between each other, a bond that held him off from asking. He wasn’t attracted to them for the sole reason taht half of their faced, extending to the shoulders, having claimed an arm and the rest of the body between the legs and up the brow had joined the pillars of stone. From the fire you could only see them as some ancient bonding elements in those primordial alloys which were formed without the help of man. It was there where they spent countless nights wondering who might listen to them or whom might care.

An unearthly approach made him ask again. One bolder, younger beauty extended her one arm so unnaturally so until it had reached the ground. As it were, she started pounding at it with wonder. It was true, indeed, she wasn't getting any stronger but as for her age, enstranged for the others it was enough, enough effort that he was delighted to grab a hold of her and take the answer, cold but touching.

'Do you feel it yet? I've done my best but it's still there.'

With all the attempts she had made, a big bloated bunch of.

'Mine, but whatever I do, I can never get rid of them.'

Twenty dogs and a few cats swam inside of her. Victims of the passing, nothing could be stopped any longer, and as far as he had been concerned about it, there wasn't any saying into it he could put in. Enough already, he ended up going through the same wave. It was a single despot's chance to get away from this life. Carpent turned away and ran, as far as he could, from this sight and from everything. They were repelled by it, with every mean of getting away being taken from them.

For the purposes of creating a better race, some cuts had been made.

There was danger throe.

Where were they now? All of them left him. Just another bbozo on the streets, grabbing a hold of anything, never thinking of what's to come, no one faded. Not any longer. They were there, in front of him, standing with their flashlights countoured around him. He lost all reason and sense now.

It was his last shot, and he lost it. Of course he had. Not that it mattered.

Not now, that he was so close to returning to doing what he wanted, Carpent could finally retire. Just now, he could do it.

Just now he thought about it, no longer was he deranged. He could pick up from where he left, somehow, as there was still some hope left in his bones. They moved in.

Took his metallic jaw away from him and left. A gang of young low-lives, carrying on their own time, with little-to do and much to say, it happened too fast for him to pray on them and see where they went.

Randos appear and surround him, they ask him what happened. Carpent doesn't say a thing, he's protecting his assets in his pocket. They give him something to chew on. Despite his obvious loss, after chewing on it, he's made to feel better and keeps on treading on the same road. It was a shame they took it away from him, now he can't see properly. Within his jaw he kept the orientational devices, without them he started going down. Farther than the natural level her, his feet began threading down. He was one level below the ground, in the wrong area, where they stored the unwanted in blocks of repurposed lind, which were being readied by the contractors to be passed on by the giant organic machines. Soon they would be fed. It was indigent to say the least.

Simply thinking back at this system, it was something shallow and disturbing since they took them from a grander species that appeared to have done the same. Though their nature was more experimental, their natural structures being made out of honey gave them enough to listen and chew on. It was disgusting and disturbing, just looking at everything in piece. An alarm came into one of the original designer's heads.

Sooner or later they'd be found out. If that happened, a server punishment would follow.

Think it through. Stacks of honey-comb like belts carried sleeping cherubs into the buildings, feeding them. Infestation had been tested in the prior areas but that didn't matter. For this time alone, the giants had to eat. Feed the giants, a mechanical voice said, followed by a strict voice that pushed on through his head. Without deciding where to go, he had taken this opportunity to pick. He looked on, twenty arrows had been drawn from the ground, all of them electrical. A satyr joined him then.

'Wrong turn and you'll die. You know you will. Knowledge is limited and as soon as you do it.'

Satyr or not, the fellow was annoying sweating from dinking the scuff of a cigar. It tormented him as far as he knew, despite not throwing the jar out. Through and through he stood palidly morose. He wanted to ask for some directions but who would trust a satyr? Not one who's dressed in clean clothes with patterns taken from the walls.

'You know they call me schizophrenic, right? Everyone who's ever spoken to me seemed to say that.'

'Why do you think that is?'

'I don't know.'

Carpenter considered it for a second, just as it was supposed to be. It was something he simply accepted. It was some delusion on his which carried on and never dragged him out of the way.

'Do we seriously have to talk about this now?'

'Not so, I suppose it's safe to say that I fear being abandoned again. Do you know why?'

'Why is that?'

So far, the Satyr wanted to hear something about what happened there. It was lost on him and he wondered at it. Just to find some resolve, he pushed on and carried on while talking. Taking directions from him, he decided to leave fate decide for him, whether this fellow was a friend or some foe. Whether he'd know something's wrong or not, time would tell.

'I think, I think. You asked me why that was, why did people call me schizophrenic?

Well, I suppose I was born wrong that's all. I suppose some people are just born wrong.'

Carpent considered looking in another direction. It was something he didn't like thinking about. This wasn't him. Call it what you will. A disease that found itself leaping from a man to another, speaking through them, an explanation, or whatever reason, he felt like he had failed himself then.

'I wish I could tell you of this, you know.

No, I wish my mind was clear. I somehow wish there was still hope for me, no. That's not right either. I wish I had been right in the head, being born right is something that isn't doing me well. You know?'

His legs hurt, they always had. Perhaps that was the reason he walked through the concrete floor. And there was the other problem as well.

'You jaw grew back, congratulations. I suppose you yearn for something to be given back.'

'No, I don't it does. I suppose I wish I met my brother again. I don't know where he is you know? I should look out for him, I mean I'm supposed to.

He doesn't think highly of me and he tends to drive everyone away, company included. But I still think.'

For one moment he looked at his hands. They looked malnourished, same went for everything else going around in his body. Petal-like bronchitis, some plunder of cells took his lungs away. And there was no beating of his heart either. If this was afterlife, he hadn't been convinced about it either. He was an interloper who had lost his brother, missed his sister and his wits. He walked on strangled feet now, thinking of a way out. Most of the architecture in town was hit, it left a miss. A piece of his was there, but they were everywhere.

'Perhaps you should've stayed out there.'

'I know, but I didn't choose to be here, you know?'

He strayed from the path, took a few feet off the ground and fret no longer about the inner works happening around town.

‘The center of Art museums and broken torches for the Bouldgeons.’

It was a sign made out of twenty pigeons. All of them were looking at me, but I knew better. Upon drawing near, I took one of their heads off, they were wearing masks after all. I expected something else, but I only pulled the feathers away.

‘It’s not exactly what you thought you’d find.’

‘No, but it doesn’t matter. I think we should stay in for a while.’

So much excitement couldn’t be contained in her. She was swollen headed and most of her hair fell off.

Of course no one would look at her since her teeth were kicked in, her eyes bore an unnatural red all-mighty, painted in half. A suit that revealed too much but decent, in some other way prevented others from seeing how she carried the younger ladies which were her slaves.

Liorotha was the worse of the bunch. It was a show of cruelty that only a fiend like her without a master could display when left unchecked. Her cruelty held no bounds now that there was no master to force her to stand still, controlling her action. It was a sad stratta, of licking of the prowess she hid. Within her whip, the girls could only weep after each painful lash.

‘Stop it already, you’ve proven your point.’

‘What? Would you have me not subdue my disciples? If they hadn’t accepted it, perhaps I would’ve never done it so.’

Even in the fuel dispenser drone-hall, most trailers minded their own business. This was stalking, he was stalking her. And stalking was a crime paid with blood. But it couldn’t be approached no less than a way they could impress each other, as he confessed.

‘I’ve been watching you for some time now Liorotha, and I got to say, I’m frankly shocked by what you’ve shown me so far. I think you’ve overdone yourself far too much for your own worth.’

‘What do you want from me? Can you not see that I’m busy?’

With the handle of her whip, which appeared to be four diameters wider than her hand, she pushed the stiched from below her neck, her faces and the eyes, and pushed her chin up high, disjointing the rest of her. What was the matter now? Why was she smiling still? Of course it was all fair, and legal, with the laws of Dominus Ar Severin Ull-Do which spoke as wanted:

‘Any slave brought to the city by thine shall be thine property to do as you please with thine object of use.’

In most interpretation they weren't even seen as living things. And yet they got the worse treatment possible, as she was considered to be crueler than anyone else, at least from the new arrivals. It was as if her servantees weren't anything other than the scum of the barrel, placed inside a pair as well. As soon as someone jeered, she sneered at them with a jackal's sight. It was quite mudane how she waited for her elevator to be filled before it could be moved back into the system. Wait too long and you could lose your turn and there were hundreds of thousands of elevator-boxes, all stuck on top of one another, as grimly placed on that segacious system leading down. It brought about her pain in drones. A drought of the world that made her think what would happen if she waited more.

'They could be scarred for life if you keep on the sole abuse.'

'I won't stop it until I'll have sealed most of their eyes off. I don't care about it now. They're mine, mine, they're only mine.'

'Would you mind sharing a drink with me, then?'

'You're paying, then? I suppose I could simply drink on your spare since you're not going to be alive for much longer.'

Stalking, he would be killed for stalking, the pay would be high, even more than he could pay it off. If I decided not to press on with it.

'Say, what could you offer me if I weren't to report?'

Certainly your life could be worth something, from what I could tell.'

Dressed for a chance, it seemed like he was holding a suit-clicker and a few bolts which were stuck in the air, revealing a filed of energy around the man. He was all set, in case there was someone near with a laser-disaphone he could get the upper hand on them. Would it bounce off or would he simply fall? There was not even the slight chance for him to be pious and admit to it. Another man entered the standing bar near the fuel entry. He was accompanied by a fur-encompassed straggler as well, a bum, a stranger, a deranged wager, wrong-helper, vile defender. Both of them ruined the mood.

Both Charlan and Liorotha stood close, unprovoked as they lowered their eyes in a suspicious manner.

'Let's work around this and I might spare your life. I don't like the look on the strangers.'

'Understandable.'

Carpent took a look at the satyr. He asked him again.

'Is this where fate lead us to?'

'This is actually where I wanted to go. I come here ever so often to drown my sorrows. When I saw you, I thought you'd do the same. No hard-feelings, I strongly think there's something wrong within your head.

Perhaps a few medicinal drinks might help you to be right again, up there.'

He pointed just about the spot and thought of something even less than that. It was a harsh journey for the time being, he was tired and needed a place to stay. The satyr reserved a sea for him, taking his head off, revealing two long upper-tongs that kept it in its back. No machine part down the throat, it looked as if he wasn't going to do what he was told.

‘How will you drink with that on your back?’

‘Worry not about me, more of yourself.’

He had his way, though sharing wasn't one of them. It was still too dangerous to disclose what was going on there. Too many people bore ill thought. It wasn't right, none of them wanted to spare a sapper which would charge the place into something worse. But he had been at a diner before. Carpent couldn't refuse the man, but he had so much to drink already, it was tiring after a while.

Elsewhere, the tides turned. There was no static on the radio but it hadn't worked right. I trusted that man, just when I was trapped in the abandoned plane. We were at an unnaturally high altitude, followed by some unnatural creature that was at the opposite back end. The door was jammed, it wouldn't shake off, the place was a mess, with the luggage being thrown around, missing or having been ripped to shreds. I could feel nothing but fear for my life now, running towards the pilot's room, locking each class behind out of fear of being caught. It had to happen eventually.

‘Stay here, I won't make any noise, but don't move. I need you to stay here and not make any noise at all.

I don't know where we're being taken but.’

The man hesitated. He seemed just as rough as I was. It was all automated. Neither of us could see it past it. Then it started bludgeoning again, I could sense it, I knew it. The first door had been broken through.

‘Where are we going to hide? I think it's coming for us.’

‘Keep your calm. Grab anything you can, I don't think we have any other chance but face it head on.’

How much would I come to regret it, holding nothing but a small roll I pulled from one of the seats from behind the front rows. I was unarmed and unprepared for what came for us. We were both unexpectedly taken by it, having to deal with it. As grimly pronounced as it were, this big fat monstrous plant broke the door with its fat neck, revealing multiple incisors that broke of the illusion behind it. That thing had been made out of the other flight attendees. I could see now, as soon as it opened its mouth, I saw them on the walls of its insides.

‘It's hurt, it's dying, we need to delay.’

When had he constructed that fort between us? How did he know? Being too focused on it, I had failed to notice it come closer to me. Drawing near, I failed. It bit off my right arm entirely and spat on me with an unnatural haze. Then it jiggled away and died in the back. My mind took a whole new directive I could barely fathom. I felt like I fell through the plane then, as a ghost would, ending up in the tunnel. That's when my recollection started again. I was alone, going by a set of rails. Most of the walls extended in the bedrock, pushing out to a plethora of colored lights.

But most importantly, what I couldn't fathom seeing was the fact that I had been worked on. I woke up with some four-sided claw which extended and drew back like a spanner. It was unfathomably lurid, seeing it pop through. I had entered a state of panic as soon as the cart I was in began pushing on. But the man was there to stop me. Wherever I was, he hadn't told me yet.

Though I had gotten away, I thought.

'I don't have a lot of time to explain, but I think we're still being followed. Listen, I'm Angus. I need to tell you something.

You can't go back the way you came.'

He pointed to another intersection that was going further above. A teal-blue light came out of it. That should be enough to signal the danger. It was one sided. The other set of rails lead below, from where I assumed he came from.

'If you go that way, you might just die off.'

'What's the point of living if I have to do it with this thing on?

Listen to me, I cannot live with this thing on me. I don't know what they did to me.'

He's still in a state of shock. His brain has been altered to make it work, but he doesn't necessarily know it. This was tempting, but he had to go on.

'You need to live, don't give up just now. I think we can still make it through some how. Trust me here, that's the only way, isn't it?

I think we'll have to set foot outside, regardless whether or not we want it or not.'

It had to be. We couldn't stand in here, I couldn't stand here. I moved farther in the cart and allowed him to come. The cart had a mind of its own, as it began heading towards the point by itself. First, after the long travel through the tunnel, the light was blinding. We could barely see the rail-system but it continued above our heads, holding the cart by some magnetic system. For that reason we never touched the pool we loomed above. It was disgusting, it looked like a polluted swamp where they dumped the most unnatural chemical, hording the strangest colors to the point where it began drawing it to a pool of red which followed us at every step of the way.

'What's wrong with you Angus?'

'I'm sorry, but I don't think you should make it. I was waiting for this, since I couldn't do it back in the cave. With that in arm and the...'

He hadn't got it yet. Angus said too much and too soon, he hadn't realised that the hand wasn't made out of iron. It wasn't affected by the magnet. A struggle was ensued, but Angus was quickly overpowered by that hand. As much as a single blow to a knee that was unexpected and the joint shattered. As a human, as a man, he changed in the meantime. While his mind remained the same, he showed just how haggard he had become.

‘Don’t leave this place, you’ll only bring it out.’

‘Let go of me now!’

His nose came next, his maxilla shattered by another blow, but eventually Angus got immediately overpowered by it. This was exactly where he belonged, for the plunge followed and he couldn’t struggle enough to get out, while the cart went on and left him there. I could finally get a breather now that I reached land. An intermission faded, the man was lost around the place. Soon he could not escape. He realised that Angus was his name as well, of course he couldn’t tell it before. With all the commotion, he forgot about his twin. But he had drowned by now, or he’s been taken by the knees, it looked like the illness of his head treaded on.

‘I think I should take a sliocht turn.’

His neck contorted and pushed on like a strange watch-tower, all around his waist. Steadfast, he had to keep. Before he could even walk on his two own feet, he knew he would end up there as well. From what he inhaled, he would feel himself be pushed inside a cradle and exported such as household furniture would. Let alone would he not wonder how he ended up in the same bar. Even more so when he kept focusing on the cockroaches that appeared on the stool he was on. They crawled in his drink and they bore a look of honey. Someone must’ve dipped them in it, as there was no closer explanation yet to it.

‘You should try asking for a refill at the bar.’

A strange woman told me.

Angus could not be bothered by her appearance as much as by her innocuous lingo that revealed itself as soon as her fornicated tongue appeared in the air. No one should hold as much power as they had. It was all a ruse, a lack of satisfaction that reflected with each shot.

‘I wish I knew you good lady. But I wish I knew why these cockroaches are following me and why aren’t they tasting bad?’

Of course, of course, of course, of course, with many of them being struck in the teapot that was brought to him by the old cannary-blunt neck, which came out of nowhere, the poor batrender had a few of them, with barely something to keep on. And each throat switched between them in order to keep the bonds off.

A canine emerged as well, a few of them in actuality. Most of them were old and beaten, shown to the worst of days. It could yet be thought of many, days that were last.

‘I swear I saw you somewhere before. Open the window now or I’ll trash your your mutt off.’

It was pleasing, looking out there. At the same time it was hard to tell where one entered and where they came out. For that sole reason, you could tell it there. Outside the place there was a curtain of moving nasty and lost pretenders. All of them, have they followed them so far?

Carpent was the first one to see them move. Many of them were look-a-likes of everyone in the bar. No one moved, not a single soul spoke as far as they were interested in the matter.

‘I say, another drink for everyone, on the house. This will be a special one. I say to thee, please to be called out.’

That special concoction had been taken from one of the back barrels imported from the body of Nyliaamoure, courtesy to the gods, they received a batch of Dina. Of course it would be pleasantly received. It was a good mark, and gotten out of nowhere but the best irradiate war-thromp. It carried through as a ship would be, not to cater to the dread. After the first rounds were served, no one appeared to observe it. Unlike anything else they were given, the batch had a special taste, a flagrancy of its own, yet it showed no signs of what it was made out of. It was the speciality of the house and the house never lost.

‘Speaking of which, I think, my dear Satyr that we ought to make a habit of coming here. I suppose I was getting tired of joining the same dinner over and over again. There was nothing to do.’

‘I’ll kill you, damned punk!’

Right on time as well, they turned to see the first match of the night. A show they took pleasure on. Biter-Crask came closer to Rhubard. Both of them cornered one of the hounds, and walked through it, instantly tearing it apart. From the remains, the various tubes crawled through the floor board and made it through as deep as they could.

That had been a watcher. He had been observed. Though he had no mind, he would be blind. In the body of a hound, he was indeed Dour, the mindless. A hound no less that escaped.

But neither of them would retreat from this fight.

Rhubard took a bottle and broke it against one of the tables. One of the dislodged shared managed to get a crack as his lip, staying in but giving no sign of falling off. He took the pain as a good sign and spat it out. Biter-Crask used his bare hands with something being hidden inside of them. For each of them had rock-spike hardened knuckles, bones he sharpened but he wouldn’t let go. His diaphragm would be shattered so far as to show that he meant business if he droned too hard.

Not this again, as he would know it better than him now.

‘I’ll pay my respect to the funeral once I’m done with you. Perhaps I’ll diddle-ye-doo and piss on yer grave.’

‘What’s that? You want me to rip off your face and replace it with a hammer head? Don’t worry, I’ll make sure to take my time after I’m done with you.’

Two more turns. They both made sure nothing was being worn, no yet. But Biter tasted some glass as soon as he took a wrong step. Two shards in teeth were lodged, his nostrils filled with bittch lodged melting of the skin. So much heat came out of it, then the cold. Frost pushed through and his blood clots were turned all over into snow-globes, dripping into the surroundings.

But he was exposed to him, as he came in, Rhubard started pounding his fists as hard as he could possibly do, battering the ribs, curshing through them slowly before seeing him stumble and fall on the first table which broke his back. If he wasn't close to being beaten, now the chance remained. The fight was over before it started. And I chose to believe that both of them knew that very well. Since at least one of them hadn't put on a fight, their brawl would be over as soon as another punch connected with his chin. Biter was a dead man. He hadn't actually a chance to begin with since he had stumbled too many times and stepped in the wrong place. It made him feel small, being released in such a petty way.

After his stumble, he went as fast as a drunk would and fell on his back, breaking it in as much as two directions.

'Pick him up, I think the man's done for. D' you hear that? I told you to pick him up.'

There was no quarrel there. Of course they'd do as he pleased, he had already a man under his belt and there was no doubt about what he was going to do after. He was already eyeing everyone inside the bar with a pair of fluorescent eyes. It was him who engaged into the fight before they even came in, but that had been a personal matter between the two of them. He approached the busy bodies first.

'Don't pick him up yet, he has something I need to take before you dump him off into the gutter.'

Searches were illegal, but at this point everyone was silent about it. No one would mention the incident, especially since it was still nothing compared to stalking. Though there was no one around there, with a drink in hand or a clear head that didn't suspect him of the worst crimes. Rhubard considered was he was doing for a moment. Sure enough, there were too many people he didn't enjoy the company of. It made him feel unnvered, just standing there now. Nor did he feel threatened at any time but there wasn't any point on trying to make himself feel welcome there. It was pure disdain he saw in their eyes. A feeling that pressed through him with the least amount of shame and the least consideration of what was going there.

He would be boosted on his feet if he cared. More than a few pins, less than expected, a few coffin nails and an entire end of a knife had been lodged inside the soles of his feet. With that, he took what he wanted from the man heading on to get a drink. One of his ringfingers was scorched, you could eat a piece of it and spit it out. But you'd know something was wrong, for it was no natural fire which left that mark.

Carpent and the Satyr were the least frightened of the lot. As a matter of fact, they were too calm. Never in the history of this place has such an encounter happened and yet, never had there been anyone who wasn't beaten at the heart. Or scowled over that every single one of them had at least committed and act of murder in whichever form they could find themselves in. For that and over it they wondered less and cared no further. It was slightly decided that they wouldn't pursue through it.

For what was worth, what came first were the twist of fingers and the kick of ginger from the drink he had.

‘This’ a good drink, barkeeper.’

As erroneous as it sounded, that was his title. He wore it on top of the wooden frame that separated the floors. But the fact was that this strange place had no second floor, at least it wasn’t accessible for them. For what hid inside of it and what turned and twisted, only the barkeeper knew. And every now and then, one unlucky bar attendee could see a light flashing and tiny pearl-like bubbles of light floating out of it as a stairway descended then reeled back in. Perhaps that’s where he’d work his doing, the mixing and the secret techniques that were never to be told to any.

It was much more dangerous than any normal claim. Simply looked at this angle, despite the rumors and the ill-speech, he had indeed something he hid inside. It was something he hadn’t even dared dine on or speak much about. An ancient technique of mixing the body and soul, in various cylindrical holding cells, the mixing of the bodies yielded nothing more than either of them could tell about it.

‘For this tank, and less, shall breed the new mixture I need to push onto them for texting. If I am right, it should corrode their bodies on the long time.’

As he dreamed of his, in the longest manner for the longest time he had encountered at least a few unnecessary ploys against him. Someone snickered past the hour in a distant day of the past. It was hard trying to fight and he resented every kind of conflict, resorting to the utmost cowardly ways he could ever consider. And one of these, which pleased him very much was the wood-chop. It turned their legs to wood, they fell. As soon as they were on the ground so had their faces, and bodies turned into the chop and patterns beneath the frame. It was a nice way of keeping everything well-crafted. In a way, he found out that everyone who came inside his home added something to the place.

Yet he was never affected for a reason that others might not even come to suspect if they knew what was happening here. His heart was made of wood. And for that reason alone, he prayed no longer and hoped for nothing in life. The barkeeper could possibly die of a flu or fire but he couldn’t care less about it now. Once he found it out, there was nothing inside of him which shattered. That had been the worst possible outcome he could think of, now. It came to his attention that a great part of his esteemed establishment was under stress.

It had a way of looking for itself, since it was just as alive and kicking as the souls that were rummaging outside.

Speaking of which, the devils started devouring the body as soon as it had been thrown out of the window. First on the rooftop, then inside the museum, that’s where he was seen. Two men looked after him, the guards, the pawns put in place. Whatever they be called instead, they remained unknown. It was as if they never existed in the first place after being shot by him.

He snuck right before the clock reached midnight. With a shot from an unknown gun he obscured their bodies. Mostly it was their clothes and a part of the granite they knocked their heads upon which crawled on top that took the shape of the skin. It felt rough being there, working with the surveillance. Each video passage showed the same clip, going in reverb, a loop that took him away.

Despite being in charge, he was way too absorbed by it, knicked around the head. Blown at the scruff of his neck as soon as he reached the point where the man dissapeared and then, he was there.

How come one of the men in the line offered him a chance to move forward?

We weren't going to be answered just yet. As for this outlook, we weren't obviously putting much effort, lest it be known that there was no entry here no there, nowhere to go. Street's emptiness vibrated with the Coco-modo sound. It was a nastily vibrating verifiable knot in the smoker.

'I'm afraid I will have to say that in another direction.'

'What for, I don't understand.'

Now he got it, and we both spoke to the wall. It was the only direction, both the wrong one and the right one. Neither of us would be unreasonable for the same reason we could not be contained here for too long. After counting off each cigarette butt, it was clear.

'We can talk there now, he's gone.'

Damn, he didn't even bother to leave a trace for his kill.

'Went away?'

'What was that?'

'I asked you wheter or not he went away?'

'Oh, I don't actually know that. I think I missed the last part.'

They were now parting off. What a skeleton he was. He had fasted for too long now, even before he could get off by it. She was repelled by that, but Hellen couldn't explain it. He's lost not only a few pounds but a few muscle strips off his. Liver disease, that's what it was, a liver disease.

Far too long had it been taken off him, that he only pondered alone on a miniature cosmic sphere.

Whimsical by the reminder, he looked out of a way to push himself off.

'I will talk now and I will be heard.'

'Whom shall hear you?'

It was too late, and he went off being unheard off. Fading off into the madness of obscurity, he wasn't provided a smoke. A screen, if somone might so luckily offer him, but not even that, I'll see to it he does some more. Up and ago to the plains below, as he was wrenching his legs, no feet remained, they only dragged for so long that they looked like the ever expanding throat-wretch that carried his children ahead.

Into the plaster, they threw it.

And he stood there, nothing but a few limbs that were completely being absorbed into the peculiar lambs waiting in the lair. Some of there stood there in the distance, placed in this way:

‘The cave is facing them.’

Hellen listens now, you’d better do the same if you know what’s good for you. Follow in her advice and thread carefully. Avast and away, I say, nay.

‘From it, I can see one of the diseased lungs that’s being transpierced into me, like a spearing arrow that’s vanquished me entirely.’

‘Almost.’

‘But there’s more Hellen.’

‘What is it? What is it using to connect to you?’

‘A bunch of mucus-strange, I cannot name them. I think they resemble leashes.’

‘I can’t do this anymore. We’ve already gone through far too many sessions. We need to reach the place before it dissapears.

We’ve been through this and I know you’ll be overcome.’

He didn’t listen to her now. He could only know from the images and the songs that came onto him that something was going on. At least a magazine would matter, even after, there was the guard.

‘I’ll listen to it now.’

He’s there, the same man who had it in for me. Twenty steps ago, in snow. An arc of power almost ruined it all, as it had gotten so close to burning all the water in the sky.

‘My fair perdue, I see you.’

Again, he regained composure. He’s thought of so many ways he could imbue the world with his ancient knowledge and what they imparied with him. Now they neared, felt but seen, and seen and scene.

‘I am performing now a vision.

Shall I share it with you my dear?’

‘Not now, finish It.’

Using a calculator now, he could barely think of it before losing his wits and throwing himself onto the ground.

‘I am looking at a man.’

‘Who is he?’

‘I’m performing in front of him now.’

‘Who is he?’

‘His name is Everett.’

‘That’s your name, is it not?’

There was nothing he would say for a while. They spoke for far too long, it was way too dangerous, what they were seeking and when did they not? Far, and away, in that sphere, they saw his one organ which lay trapped. It could snap at any moment and in fear he watched his parents reunited. It was him who dominated their souls and prevented their ascent into the other world, and worldly world. Who could it be that could fathom such a thing? At once he started walking past them.

Everyone was witnessing a fencing match. What a tetannous blow came from them. But Everett, though he was a seer had not even counted on the fact that he had no passion to be talked about. His heart would only push on about the hour. Could he die and yet be tainted? Was there a reason for the fear to be protected? A protocol of pain and gutter started filling him up.

Then, from the depths inside their suits, they started growing until they couldn't do it any longer. Out of fear for anyone showing any kind of remorse, the morse code came out. From within them, they spoke no less than they should now.

'And I could see for no better and no worse this. It's happening to me again. I shall do what I desire now.'

'You're growing weak and pallid now, please, those lungs will devour you if you sit there for too long.'

'I can hear my heart pumping, can't you see I know this even better than you?'

Every time he looked in the mirror he knew what would happen to him. And every time a failure that became worse for the wearer. He was in the bar, that was the reason after all.

'I need to keep moving.'

'But moving means defeat.'

'If I lose, what do you think might happen?'

An answer would mean I have to choose. Whichever direction might throw me in the right direction? I faced this less and chose to bear.

'They shall use me as a bridge to get to you, Hellen, what should I tell them?'

'My dear, resist for now, I think after twenty cups of coffee I'll be more than fine. Tell me why do they need a bridge.'

Everett explained to her how they ran out of building materials. And they needed him to take its shape.

Woe it should be known that he was only one of those.

'No, no, this cannot happen, this cannot happen, this cannot happen?'

'Calm down Everett, calm down now, what's happening?'

'That's me, that's me, I think that's me. God, I'm hideous, I think that's what they want me to become.'

Don't, please tell me I won't become one of those things.

No, that's my future, that's my future, I know it is, please don't let them turn me into one of those things, I couldn't fathom it.'

He was filled with some revulsion. It was dreadful. But he got it out. After a few attempts, he finally got it out.

‘I’m his child.’

He said. Everett admitted, then he left. He was not there any longer, in the room. He still existed, but he simply wasn’t there. And Hellen took this harshly. After this session ended, she threw herself out of the eighteenth floor and survived. Rushed through an ambulance, she died in a crash. But she managed to crawl out only to have her body disappear out of sight, as if Everett took something out of her.

Hellen managed to walk on her arms but something started foaming and coming out of her blood. As she stood there, she question it.

‘Who are you?’

If not only the worst of beings, another pretender, the defender of weaklings in need of death, bloodied by the crow, spoken of the dead sparrows, he approached.

‘I am the worst one out of the lot. I have been promised that I will become the champion of Clot if only I were to find a replacement before him.

And it looked as I’ve done so.’

‘Everett?’

‘Guess again?’

‘You would take me?’

‘I’ll take no one and no one else shall be the kin.’

The soul got replaced and it became a machine. For there it foamed, and as long as it lasted, it would eventually turn into a cone. For the taking, now the reprise, she couldn’t take it any longer, thence he died in peace. But not after living for eight more months in that place. Unlike the others, she had been paid by guts not to explode in front of them.

A bomb was being planted into the station, since it failed to convey emotion. It was pointlessly bizarre not to abandon it for far too long.

‘What was the time then?’

The ships that sailed, they would prevail and reach the city of. Name lost because they peered, he was there, he was near.

‘Now, is he? What does he want of us? What is it that he wants of us? I fear the effect they might have on my mind.

I fear it.’

But he tried to slave himself to woe, this man who couldn’t even walk straight on the stairs, he knew of them. Yet he hadn’t said a word.

‘It’s night, an ever-loom. I want to be out there before the other sea-creatures start floating in the stars. I swear it, I saw it happening, out there. Dolphins and sea stars trapped inside suns. But the suns weren’t burning, as they were my sons.

And my sons would only cherish and respect me. That I know, this is what I’m telling you, that I know.

But I see no other reason there, to look after my own.

My sons aren’t burning anymore, they’re empty inside, I’m not. We’re different after all, but that’s only because I cut them and they are deflated. I enacted an act of violence and for that they’re there.’

He thought it soon after, but he couldn’t be aware of the crime. He’s done so much harm, and now they were filled with sea-crusts, the vile of coral.

‘My good man, where are we going now?’

‘Off a stroll in the middle of a lost night where I might hope to find a muse of light, I am forever after looking for her delightful gaze. I want to be hers and be lost in her maze of heart.’

‘Stop if you insolent dreamer, before you’ll get absorbed inside. Don’t forget who you are first unless you want to be lost.’

The cost was meaningless since he already lost so many sons.

One of the parking meters went on ahead upheaving in the air. It started acting like a wretched before either of them could even make do of the spare change.

‘It’ll do, we won’t be late. We should be done in less than fifteen minutes in any case.’

Smoker’s entrance, where they planet the catci, they went around it but never managed to draw in too much attention. Laundry doormats were placed just about everywhere around the floor, a barbershop was supposed to be in here but it was pushed too many feet behind. It moved, eighty minutes, yet some more. Twenty heads turned and they were looking out of the hole. Everyone gathered as soon as the first set of fake walls started pulling back. A cackle of metal spread around the first man’s face, his teeth were ivory and he had the face of an old elephant.

‘His features say, he’s a bad man. We cannot trust him.’

‘Why not, wait, you talking about the fat one?’

‘The one with a big bottom lip, it’s too wide and fat. His ears are wide as well and I think it’s starting to fall off.’

‘He’ll be the first one to die then?’

‘We’ll listen, we’ll listen.’

No spare and no change. Of course they wouldn’t be interested in it now. For what was worth, neither of them had the power to shake them off. In a way, they were, out of it. Spaced out, baker, filled, vein-dripped and uncanny in the forehead.

‘It’s falling back, that’s it, I know what he is.’

‘Let’s draw near that one then.’

Near-sided, as a pair of other fake-walls started pushing down, there was no other chance to work around it. They were presented with a giant hole and a see-through. Some of the front spokesman had used their ugly tongues to make something out of it, the pillas, they were licked clean. They kept the barbershop from falling apart. And it was them alone who barely came to it. And there came the first clue. It drew up the pace. It increased before it could be gotten in.

Then came the other hair-compators, they were the ones who had the strapping giant battery-like containers attached to their backs. For some reason this mundance establishment looked more echanted than it was before. The place was wired, we were listened to, at all times.

‘Say, what are you intending to do with those?’

‘Nothing, nothing anymore, it simply crossed our minds that there might be something we could help you with. So much hair, after all, you’ve got so much hair in need of being taken care of. You wouldn’t happen to think of it now, but.’

They paused and stroke a black cord. No one int heir right mind would even look twice at it. Let alone be calm, there was this and that, and no reason. Yet the spoke from the bottom of their hearts, only one of them at least, the one man they didn’t have their eyes on.

‘We need to remove it from the scalp and make it so nothing will grow on it or in it.’

‘What was the last part?’

‘Nothing, sir, now sit down. We’ll work on your slowly.’

After a good season this would do. For now they had to take the insertion off their broken skulls and make it so they won’t breathe into the static. Bad things happened when you did.

‘I seem to have lost a step.’

‘I’ll get it for you.’

His leg was gone. Joyburn and Scaffle were finally placed in chairs. For some reason or another, they could only behave for so long before getting more ecstatic from it. No wonder they were plain, nothing would remain still for long. The twentieth time came arousingly, by this fierce moment they could abstain. Now they were looking out from the other side of the room which was slowly being carried away.

Simply taking this in would mean they realised that this part of the room ahd been dragged past the intersection.

One shout aroused.

‘Look out.’

Pleaded one of the barbers who suddenly watched the hair-compressor being run over by the revving car; breaking through the first wall, pushing through as the fire spread out of the first bang.

‘We should try getting up.’

‘Not now, not yet, I think we should check what they’re up to now.’

It was a secluded incident, which concluded into more fake-walls being raised up. Some of the fire started pushing down but it couldn’t take away the sight of the mourners after the elation.

‘I see no radiation-dustpanes.’

Soujourned, they no longer sat down, it was one of the fast lanes after all and they had to get as far away from it before it started. More cars emerged. It was dangerous, waiting here for too longer, no answer fading and not a single thing alive. Wallowing for that reason, not even the obscure would have it flown.

They mingled with their heads bashed in as soon as the compactors turned on them.

In the distance they could only hear of this. He and lo to him in the matter, there’s something waiting there for them, it’s a disaster. With no way of preparing for it, they only resumed pushing in, rebuked by a stranger who stopped for a second, blocking the intersection from rising on. Scaffle was too much of a coward, henceforth, his shtick was sitting. For some reason he didn’t care. He was unnerved by it but remained around.

It shouldn’t move if I stand still. He had the world on his side and he couldn’t be killed, at least that’s what he wanted to think. Without intervention this place would be quarantied. For more than a deceitful pair of seconds they all stood still, every driver in the car, the hair-compactors that drew on, but most importantly, the barbers.

I will admit to to this.

Joyburn took out a cigar.

‘That’s now allowed.’

He didn’t it at all, the yelling, the protests, the murder, the oncoming distarter. They were both hit-men, and a dollar a piece would be gotten for each kill. Mostly, it was the inflation which turned this place into a damn thing. He knew better than to look in the wrong direction when it was needed. But this he would not heed or look into for too longer.

He took out one of the long guns. It was affected by the missed proportions of the expanding room. For now, think of this. The shaft elongated past the intersection, above the cars, when suddenly half of the compactors started running back. The others mobilised and tried catching it, but they couldn’t handle it without suffering the pain which applied to their arms. As hedges would they extended and pushed on, dragging away the sight as they fell bleeding.

Most of them had lost their hands or a good chunk of the forearms. It was an indicent sight, but what was after was even worse. First shots emerged, travelling like spears that turned upwards and formed circles. As their bodies heaved and hooped around, their back-devices started popping out one by one before not many of them were left.

‘Drop your gun, drop it now. Or we’ll shoot, we’ll shoot you, I swear it.’

One of the cops came out of a walking wheeled station. It was small enough to fit a person in. He had failed to look behind, perhaps he knew about the process more than I. He might've been disturbed by it, as even looking brought something of a, what was the word? It was tantalising. At least he couldn't deal fast, a few cards, booze, illegal photos, magazines that were banned, books that had the sight of a killer on the back, the pig was crooked. It did not drop well on him. He was, in some way, close to it. He dropped the gun.

Circles started worming in until they began absorbing the fat from the bodies. They looked like turning coins our tambourines in some way, because the middle was culled off. Some bottom-brows started pushing out, as they began inflating and drawing on.

Even after slowly dragging in, seeing how the gun bounced off the cars and got smashed by pieces as the entire elongation couldn't handle touching so many of them, he realised something was wrong. Certainly he should've noticed that the sound of agony was gone. Perhaps it should've lasted.

Remorse was pointless now. Since those fatties drew on and started eating their heads off, stopping the sound of dread. Hornes pushed on instead and that's when he got distracted. Joyburn took a knife out of his pocked, hitting an artery in return. Blood-ants started crawling out of his neck, dragging their queen away. Soon enough, as he grabbed the inside of the first car he came into contact with, his skin became sand-like. A colony would be made inside. And after that they could sing of less.

'We have to go Joyburn. I'm sure you enjoy taking your time but more of them will be on their way in no time. That means we should get away.'

It was how he was lured out of his praying mantis eyes, which reflected on his long back, the four hunchbacks that pressed on him were taken. A gulp of blood-girth would foam. While the acid came out of it, the way back was burned. That was their exit afterwards.

Fifty hours later. A gas explosion nearby took care of the rest of it. Judging by the distance and the spread, the elongation affected the fire, force and vibration which turned the inside of the barber's into a Pollock.

Nothing much was said about them.

Into the bar, hence they ended up being there as well, trying to sip in drink after drink before they could come to their senses about what was going on there.

'I'll hear of nothing, you know? I've been here for twenty years and nothing changed, not a single puddle, not a drop.

Nowadays scum come here and all of the sudden, everything goes to shambles. Everyone suffers and everyone's trying their luck in the scum of the lot. What of it then?

Does anyone want to take it?'

A fierce man came. He looked for the wakest party, the least of all, barely filled tables. He couldn't think of any better way of spending the night other than shooting someone in the face with his power-gun, special edition. As for him, he was elated by this. Scuffle couldn't even say this, he had so many fun looking at them and how they got out of their way to make one another miserable. He hadn't known Carpent but by the looks of it, he was the least back-spine man he could lay eyes upon him and that said a lot about him as a person since the two of them were much alike, then the Satyr who was shallowly pressing his gutt out, only to make it seem as if he wanted another drink. Which left the last two important people of the night, who didn't seem to mind what was going on, a pair of barrels still tried blurring out with some force. No remorse for the taking, as much as it could be counted on. Charlan and Liorotha were trying to spare one another of the courtesies, as they were more than aware that he could not do a thing which would even draw any attention to them. It only came to them on passing. Arching over the viler surrounding area they were trying to figure out the wrong. What was it and why couldn't the barman do something about it now? No, he nodded, he wasn't in the mood. As a matter of fact, he wanted to stay as far as possible from the conflict before the entire bar shook. It resonated at another level.

Feign

It was dreadful, spending another moment under the ardour of the shade.

'I am Enas.'

Of full blunt moons, where they spake the broken age and the lost stratagems got pushed away in the annals of time, thence they stopped the tournament from pushing on. As tall specuhcral light foamed at the mouth of the bridge, as it stood adjacent to their barren land. It floated like a piece of glass, a lightbulb that barely made it through the dark.

A pair of notes were spread one of the lost houses.

'I used to live.'

It was vague and most of it got scattered into dust. Whoever wrote it was frail. Aghan looked down, it could be one of them. He could become one of them if he wasn't careful enough. Were it for the earth to be shakier, he might've slipped off. At least that's what he told himself.

Some of them were slavers. Leaves rustled, it was time to go. It was time to make it as far as possible before they got the chance to catch up with me. They were in awe. Just there, out in the open. They were trading like hunters with their painted faces. Something instinctively wrong loomed around them. As soon as they brought in the light, humanity crumbled. As much as they hardened on the touch, they were breaking apart, as a piece of land would. Unsanitary or not, they sloppy, I had only stood there for twenty minutes.

I would not be tracked, at least not that easily. My face was seen in the show of black mirrors that sparked in the sky. We were all up there and were all trying not to stare for long. But I had been seen. And only then did they start chasing me by whatever mean they could. I was him, the man they were after. Mostly it was the skin disease which didn't come from me, it came from the various mirrored flakes that kept appearing and disappearing when I wasn't watching.

But one of them had. The new-nation brought them up.

'Make sure you're noting the recordings, are you?'

'Of course I am sir. I've noted everything down.

I can see the readings from up there and I have to say this. You won't be surprised to hear this, but.'

He showed the compass and the peculiar sightings. Most of them were revealed by inkdots that immediately got released. Images were poignant but seemed to last.

'We'll dispatch a few more people but that's all I can afford.

What does this say?

You know I'm not trained to recognise the patterns. It would be more helpful if you slowed down a little and told me what's it about.'

'I'm, I think...'

'Spill it out already. I don't want to catch something while I'm here. And these damned mosquitoes never stop coming.

Don't you think I would at least deserve that?'

'Didn't you hear what he said? Apologise to him before I pick up my club and throttle your snut!'

That was Bulkas, he was as much as a bulk-head as he appeared. They didn't understand.

'That can wait, we need to move, now.'

Another thicket moved. They were drawing near. Way too much noise was made and it alerted everyone in the area. For the time being they could do anything but watch. From where they stood, it felt as if they were preparing to head on for a crash in one of the fords. If too much weight was added, again, they could fall straight through the corpses and into the hollow spot beneath the ground.

It was unnecessary to believe that they were looking for him any longer. This was a matter of preservation.

'Wait, Bartabas, a hand touched my leg.'

'Don't mention that to anyone. Come, report what you have into it and let's go before the night progresses.'

Even they knew better than to prolongue the pain. It was a struggle for what they painted the land with. It was unnecessary to even push it yet they would spend the night in hiding. The man escaped. Aghan wasn't sure whether or not this was the right place or not. It felt different here. He's never seen the soil change, not in this way. Ever since the scowl, you could barely see the plants grow since most of the chose to submerge in order to avoid it. It was an unnecessary fuel for the hands, trying to dig your way through the reflics this land provided.

He approached one of the slightly raised dirt banks. That was simply what they called them. Artifacts, despite being large chambers used to progress through the other land. As soon as he checked his cloak, his clothes barely shaken off, Aghan started digging with his bare hands. By the time he uncovered the first gate, his nails had been blodied and crisp. Burnt by the fury of the soil and the chemicals that pushed on and took a life of their own there. It was what he wanted.

He escaped. That's the only thing that mattered. They couldn't enter through it, not with the accord. But as he rested around the semicircural seal, he rested against it and listened to their vague taunts. Something inhumane could still be detected from the way they spoke.

'Next time, maybe.'

Without delay, he made it through the passage and joined the life below. If you could call it that you could get accustomed to it. And if you could do that, perhaps you could live through it long enough to get a head on the others. In his bag, he carried one of the bounties. Despite being as widespread as they were, no one wanted to approach them. Mostly because they were pushing everyone else out. With what was worth, they were cutting each other ten times fold, as a game, that's what the children on the street were doing. Baggy brown clothes that looked like potato sacks rested beneath the light. It felt morose, looking at them play with knives but these were dangerous times.

He didn't approach them.

It was a mess no living being could draw away from.

A black canopy fell through the morass bringing in even more dirt inside the shelter. That was one of the main problems they hard to face. The deeper you went in, the heavier you've become, chances were that you could be crushed by the forest and the other buildings that submerged underneath the ground. It was a risk everyone asumed, especially by bringing more people into the world.

It was just as dangerous as it were, living in a perilous land and hiding underneath the girth of it. And just as disturbing as it was, they were threading none the better out there. The young were given a chance to work out there, with everything in mind. As long as they were out there hunting for food, they would be allowed to keep their loved ones in despite the numbers. Since every run outside would take a few days, the weight would be somehow redistributed.

There was one requirement which wasn't spoken about. And this was important, as the next generation would not be allowed to breed until the previous one died, though things had a way of fixing themselves despite what was being spoken behind the ears. It was unimportant. Past an age, everyone's body fell apart and fed the ground. It was only a matter of waiting now.

Once dusk settled there was no way of turning back. It was the choice, it was a choice. Only the savages could live outside without protection. It had to be preserved, just like the impulses going around and being shared. There was no way of telling what happened to them. From whatever standpoint they were trying to convey.

Further along the road, where they build a solace. It was clear that they were shaking, since they were out there in the open, where the live trees refused to grow. And the least of all would they retreat to caves since they could fathom living there with the gelatine-reds. It was a dead point and a moot. That they would hunt together in a land they barely understood.

'We're picking up something again.'

It was the state of the ark, no one was safe any longer, from the fall of the state, the republics, the civilization, now this, a land that mourned itself with each day. They were counting on trying to get away somehow, by doing whatever they could to shake off the trackers. No habit got in the bones, unfortunately no heroes would be sung. And the coils of dread could only grasp to and fro as they descended from the flow of the smoke screens that rowed on. It broke with the vines. The castle had.

It was one of the last relics of Old-town, the vestige of torn-people and their descendants regardless of where they resided in. With some unfathomable coils, the cliff held it from falling in the avalanche of bodies that grabbed on it. They were still there, singing old songs. And the workers approached without fear, nearing their faces in order to draw some breath from them. Anything else would mean taking in the black air, which would kill them and their headless heirs. Out in the open they laid lazily in turns of moons. Most of them were unable to take it for as long as they should, resuming to look into the marches, carrying the plougs with them.

'How many deliveries do we even have to carry with us?'

'As much as we can, ye' hear? We can't let the castle fall. We cannot, by the love of the lady let it fall.' Who is the insane resounder, why is this land broken after dusk? They were only adding parts now, seeing how they didn't like being taken from a place, they resolved to push some in either direction and look for one another instead.

'Don't take too much of a risk. We should take care of our own first, not them.'

'But we are taking care of our own this way. Can't you see that we would fall to our demise otherwise?'

'We drank yestarday, haven't we?'

The same wine, in the same unlit room, it looked dilapidated, like the old houses and there was nothing in but the old worn out table and the chairs. But we managed to find an old vineyard and take one from there. It shouldn't have meant anything for them, but for me. I thought it was the world. It was everything any man should be able to look after right after a family and a future for himself. Now they carried on the ploughs, looking at one of the corners underneath the walls. It started depressing and furthering in.

'I feel like it's been a twilight of an hour.'

'I fear that it will take us another trip to there.'

But there were dangerous as they looked at the signs of the weather, the wind adjacent to the kneeling turns of the corks. They called that weathercock Bismark. But it's been a while since they took its advice. How many people have to die on the road? That's the question no one seems to answer. As long as no one asks questions, things would go as expected. Who would even consider getting away from them?

Soon there would be night and after that there would be some quiet to get away from. As the noise continued the way before cleared and then came only the wonder.

Who was the strongest of the looker in the Rhynes, as rivers started flowing and diminishing as long as they came by. This was the only way out after all. And after this, there would be nothing to look after. Out there we had been given only a chance, as any man could be given such a sight. It would be necessary to only look at it once and that would be enough to scar the mind. To touch the soul and make it pop out of the throat, for others had already quickened their way but only we could say this.

'Stay away from that sea of red. I can feel it drawing near.'

Out of fear for what was going to happen around them, now they began battering their legs and kneeling on order to get out of the way. Otherwise they would be see that, that evil thing could only be so unforgiving as to allow them a moment of respite. It was dangerous now. Waiting there as it began pushing out of the water. It levitated through the dangerous approach.

At first we only saw the bleak red push back into the deprived color which took all the land to begin with. We would not be allowed another colorful sight as it went away. Thence it pushed out of the water, never ending as it pushed and grew out of the boundaries of its form. From its two hands a white tree-like trunk pushed, making the body. Though it could only look below as the remnants of a once great body remained.

'What was that flash of red?'

One of the stragglers asked.

'Why, don't you know? Have they not told you yet?'

We ought to have known better than that. For every reason pointed only in one direction. It should be pointed out now that there was a swollen side to the road that carried on through the passes. Look at them and you should immediately see the difference before it could take from. It drew to it like a cancer-bee towards a honeycomb that needed its complete attention and desire. On top of that, there was the dread. It was done now, terminated as soon as the advancement started pushing on. Without looking in doubt, you could see the vapor pushing from the upper spine of the tree-trunk body that fornicated with the rest of him in the sea.

As dread pushed on, the creature started writhing in pain, unable to contain any of the intense heat it started producing after the lights began fading out. For twice the matter, less the head, it could only be contained in sight.

‘Woe to thee, I shall listen and obey for the master shall come.

Follow me, strangers if you so value your lives, you’d do what’s best, you’d do what’s better. But don’t look back to it and don’t allow the mirth and chase.’

Neither of them dared contain the amount of ingratitude that would follow them. With a blunt strike over the back of their heads, they could listen to it no longer, that being the song of the Ibellus, who came from the sea. He sang in agony and could not fathom being there in agony. Existence was anything but a joy. He frothed in pain but couldn’t contain himself in order to show emotion. It came to him that even then, when his headless gaze pushed on ahead they ran.

‘Make it past this enclave of roads and you shall reach master’s den. Do you hear it? I can listen to his call now. I think you understand.’

‘But where’s your master and what does he want with us?’

‘Do not waste my time nor his, know that there can be no peace as long as tribute isn’t paid. With that said, I advise you not to do anything that might make others question you. Otherwise you shall swim with the ones that march along the corals.

With them, as long as it ought to be known, you shall dwell inside and live no more.’

With that in mind we could only do what he asked of us, whichever being it could do. Of course we could not believe any word of advice coming from his mouth. For starters, who was he? Why had he taken a course of taking and calling us in the dead of night? We could’ve made it back to the castle if we weren’t abashed by ill intent and evil word. We carried something that wasn’t worthy it no matter how we looked at it. Regardless of the marching prowess, dirt castrated itself past a point.

It could not get pushed or abandoned, unless you were to carry on and spend the night trying. And such a case would only draw enough attention as countenance would deal with it. Let it less be known that there would be no remedy to the torment that beast promised. Yet, avast, they came at last to the reverse of the sea. Endlessly pushed ahead, slowly drowned by a ship of muck, through which it hid and said no less.

From the door that popped itself out of the ground, thence it came, never asked back.

‘I am the other servant.’

He perverted his own name. Immediately before he could be trapped again, he spoke of this twist of tongues, which carried on and pushed an alarm, no shout, but the countenance of many. Less than it should be forgiven, more so than needed, that blasted creature spoke again. But from his gut and mouth his suit blasted his skin as it began burning alive in itself.

Upon redressing, we had been approached. No longer had we considered what was going on, for reasons of our own.

‘We shall remain a minute longer. And we ought to shout a bitter tongue and wander off.’

As if caught in a dream, they walked with the fiend, mesmerized by what was going on their whims.

‘Should I cut a piece of butter and eat here?’

‘It won’t devour.’

‘Should I perhaps take one of these paintings home?’

‘That’s an antique.

Also, it won’t devour.’

‘Perhaps I could hold a speech for the master of this house?’

‘It won’t matter unless you carry on the order.

As well as it was said, it won’t devour.’

Not here, not there, not then, not any longer, it was important, more and such that it could not be counted on, with each adjacent motion, I would be known. I should think of it as the way back home would fall apart. Stricken down but never left to the mind out of doubt, he would lay abandoned. If he or his friend said the wrong thing and the wrong time, that was his concern, if only there was a way of knowing that they would be safe, this journey could be stopped. And then they would refrain, or even abstain from tasting the objects further.

‘But what’s happening to us?’

Why do we have this sudden urge to eat everything that comes into our hands? Alas, I think I’ve been made to suffer.’

Not longer after this, he found himself eat his friend’s shoulder out of the prissy-look and humble going. What was going on now? Was there a matter which needed taking care off? By the time they had arrived around, with every turn. A switch happened right in front of them.

This delapidated ancient hold which had been swallowed by the earth as any of the buildings in this world was dead. Unlike normal buildings, for which destruction would ring truth, this was alive. And as it happened, the servant who had entertained them turned into an automaton of wax which still went on a shrill. Bred by the flames, not even the slightest likes of him would remain untainted.

He locked eyes with them and bid them to follow. If there was one proverbial sight, the word that would help them delight the guests, that would be.

‘May we come on and follow thine side?’

While sniffing around, they felt the dread. Something had to be said about the stubb and the shrubbery of eye-vines which blinked at them. It was obvious that someone was here, and it couldn’t have been clearer that it was someone like them as well. Making too much of a noise, looking as if he was worn out, a warrior of ancient days, with bug-chitin armor, as that of an elongated cockroach and a mantis, affected by a wild hybridization. He who’d have the value of evil, caught by the wrists, he carried on a coffin box, filled with shallow pus.

It was a pestilence they sang as they followed him instead of using their common sense needed to get away. His self satisfaction faded, his nerves descending into some kind of meaning.

‘Are we seriously going to join his lot? He doesn’t seem like the type to share.’

‘I don’t know about this either.’

He said it in a whisper before pushing himself back to his feet. Something was morosely wrong. As this fort-like dwelling only progressed down until it had become a pseudo concave cave. The deeper you went, the further you’d go, the lonelier it would get, since there silence predominated in the hidings. It could not be contested any longer, not for the brothing noise.

But they resolved to bet patched together and follow him wherever he went. ‘How might it be then, that there’s no one here to visit us?’ Cried the first gargoyle to the other, statuequely near it, as clear that he rested in some way, it conveyed no movement of the ears.

They were waiting for a signal to erupt. What was stone would become unlike the snow which coated the inside of the harlequin hall, that’s where they had entered through after their initial flight, and thence the opening where they would remain. Determined to go near and to seethe as they would behave, it was more than the head-sided touching, the approach which would clear in the past. Both of them prepared their lances, and they paced up near-front. We should’ve taken it more serious now, despite what our inhibitions said, we were closely watched.

Both him and I, we were destined to go far, farther than this, the harlequin stall. It’s where the stranger disappeared, after the entry into that cave. Of course, I should’ve known better than follow him, but it was far too late to go back. I could turn on him, I felt it.

‘So long now, I think this is where you’re supposed to stay.’

And with a single stab behind the back, I could be back on my way. It was this satisfaction which hadn’t even allowed me to look back. He was out of it already and I would face no consequences if I told them where he died at. This was only for my survival. With a foot inside the neck of the world, I was there, on my way to home.

‘Where’s the first scout?’

In a disturbingly pronounced awe, he could feel his hand shaking as to fall on his knee. He rested. With as much as a single swipe around the chest, he chose his next words yet.'

'Are you the master of this house?'

Feigned and resigned, he chose to abide the rule of the house. The one and only which mattered now, as it had been far beyond him, yet to ask again what he knew already before he could spill even more than he knew it to. Branded by the horseshoe, he stopped and listened to them in conquest.

'I shall break you now.'

He said to the man. He was being held between a horse and a carriage, constantly being branded by the master of a lonely house. To him this agony was pure joy, as he was only trying to make a point. Trespassers would not be allowed, to him they were only a piece of the ground which somehow managed to spill in and bring the light.

'Is this the light of the globe I see? The robe of the harlequin I see before the front?'

'Nay, it is not. For that I fear you shouldn't have seen it, as you've seen way too much.'

A new direction, the carriage stopped. No longer was he branded but swollen at the ankles as he would have to carry the carriage on his back. So much strength for such a little man, he displayed not only cowardice but a way through which he was discreet. On his feet a number was written by the brass branding other-lap, which pushed through him until his head was held about the water.

'I will drown you if you don't inquire. What does thou think of what I came to bring upon the kettle-tire?' Poor man, turned around, he looked to see what thou thought of the ground, upon which every wheel was replaced. But these were not livers, instead, they were only wrought in iron, made to last. For no touch would do so fast, he couldn't be trusted to do anything, not on his own. His fingers were taken and cut before he could answer of his home.

'I've taken these from your apartment, when I was under the roof behind the walls, right around the castle. I know you've stolen them from where, but when and where?'

'I swear it wasn't me.'

'Tell me who it was then?'

'Never, I will never tell you, not matter for how long you may punish me for what I own.'

He would endure for hours, more than could be said about the master. He had been endowned in thought and brought about this out of his own perilous malice, regardless of what he would think about. Enough was still enough. He wanted something and he wrought it now out of some metal chains he kept around. With a mere child's touch he melted them, creating only the perfect skin, rubbing around until he had his lipps thinned, right under the rims of his eyes. Determined or nor, he would like this now, keeping everything up to the standards of pain.

‘You will remain scarred and much worse, I can destroy your spine and leave you as a beggar in this land as it worsens.’

‘I have not stolen anything, it was not me who’s done it, to that I can swear on my own life. I wager the danger and to that I say don’t judge me for something I have not wrought in pain.’

‘Then tell me.’

But he would refrain before another word could be muttered, sinking now under the water as the carriage walked on it as if it were nothing but a long puddle. Without a fire, he turned the outside of this pond in iron, as a tiny flute came out of his mouth, the master manipulated it as he saw fit. Immediately, the man’s soul leaped out multiple times, leaving the outside and the outskirts of the water enwrapped in his face as mold of iron turned to silver instead.

‘That should you hear, I feel thine perched pain emerging now.’

As an antelope, he sneered and pushed out.’

‘Now and again, I’ll hear you refrain from pleasure and look ahead.’

Thence he tried looking yet to see, there in the sky, standing against the reflection of where a sun would be during the day, stood the disemboweled creature that leaped and floated from outside the veins of the sea.

Nyobl Cherkn

A new family-batch moved in the neighborhood. We didn’t know what they were called yet. No one seemed to be overjoyed by them moving in, for same reason that they didn’t actually care much. For them, it was a simpler way of life. As long as no one came to bother them, they wouldn’t bother anyone in return.

Though I dread having to be left alone with my younger brother, I was left in charge while my parents left, wasting away precious hours as I tried looking for a way to distract myself from the burden of looking over. I remember looking at them as they left. Listening to their advice for as long as I could tell.

‘Take care, my dear, don’t let the worm pit grow, or else we might lose the house while we’re gone.’

‘Come of Camille, you don’t need to show us any proof. We know you’ll do as you’re told.’

I smiled and looked away. Remembering just the awkwardness of the situation I had been left in. Just going back down the stairs, realising that there was no attic, just the lower half of the house being made out of dirt, without stairs, I would have to crawl. But it went well as far as I could tell for more than enough reasons, first being that I could only look at the pit from as much of an unnatural point as I was. It wasn’t a pit, necessarily, but some kind of twisting spin coming through a dirt hollow that had nothing but dirt inside. When I was younger, I remember drawing in too close and having pricked my finger into it. As soon as it would happen, the hollow would become emptier on the inside as it drew deeper in. It was then that I had contracted, though only momentarily, the worm disease. Were it not for my parents, I would've certainly ended up like chow, for the very fact that the worms started growing inside of me, forcing me into a highly audible cry.

That prompted them to arrive sooner than expected in order to administer the antidote I needed to get away from the disease. I could see them trying to escape, from inside of me. Like tiny passengers they left when I wasn't welcome any longer. But it wasn't all. I hadn't cried because of the pain, rather, because of the hollows that appeared just about every side of the wall. From them came the worms, tried and wasted as they pushed on. Though it couldn't be as discernible from the sounds they tried emitting, they would be lost soon after he came into view.

He was gone. And I was here, free from it.

'Camille, are you spying on our neighbors?'

'No, of course not, what made you think that?'

'Oh, nothing.'

My younger brother, Elly, he was blind in one eye. Strange how things end up, isn't it? But that had been the only one coloured in black. Not even the doctors could explain that phenomenon. Nor could they explain what were the greenish-dead colors on the lower side of his face, that made him look more ghoulish than a child of his age. There was the comparison with the grave behind the house. She dug it up once only to find out that she had another brother before him.

It was fun, like, looking for a treasure chest, digging through the backyard with only one thing in mind, her precious ware, something that called her. From the depths of the sleep, during a night of cold-feet, she woke up and made it through the rain. With one of the small shovels, she undertook it and went out of her way to get through the first grave. First of the touches came near, she feared what she'd find. And after going through a few feet inside the mound, she found her at last.

'Here rest Mellancholy.'

Mell, she remembered her name. And the strands still laycolored, despite the obviousness that they weren't the natural ones, it came clear that she wasn't going anywhere else. Not unlike them, who peeped from inside. They had undertaken everything which brought them to the kindness of watching. It was out of the question now. No one understood anything in that house, out of everything said, nothing would be spared the diyoimis. For a few hours they had been happy, over the Solstice.

Though their livingroom had been anything but a joy, they spent too much time trying to steer the mast, and make sure the upper floor would last. Each of the flooring-mechanisms inside the inside the ceiling doors would slowly pressurize everything in order to pass.

Wayward, as they passed, they would struggle to hear the voices that came in.

Lewis's wife was done signing and trimming her nails. It was something she couldn't draw away from anywhere.

Charles was still trying to get his way. There was a state of panic from which he couldn't rest.

'Honey, does this make you feel any different?'

'What would that be dear?'

He pointed at the strange bouquet of paintings he had prepared for her. She was carefully lain on the carpet, almost rolled over. Prepared for the cutting, her husband came near, and slowed down out of fear that she might wake up from her half-asleep state she was in. There was no reason for him to sweat.

Gently pushing it, he had felt the fur wrap around her belly. It was time to push in faster.

'Some things are better for the west, wouldn't you think so, honey?'

The stakes had been raised again for a good reason. While descending into her, as fast as he could fare, it was only now that he to be met by the hamstringed heat that merged with him just for the moment.

Despite sharing his feeling with the broad, he felt something gnawing at him sooner than not. No reason to say for long. He had lost too much out of his fangs, before moving on.

A cackle snapped her off the train of thoughts. Slowly but unrulid, there were a few feathers going off the hook. Her husband misunderstood what exactly happened. Desperation couldn't even compare to the treshhold of strength the various hairs forced him to endure.

'What could we do now?'

It was a question of wits. How long would he stay? And how long would it take until he could raise up from where he stood without breaking her in the process. She smiled, behave.

After getting up, her chest heaved open, ripping the carpet apart. From whence it came, her heart wouldn't remain still any longer, giving birth to the turmoil at hand. Crisp but still alive, she started spilling everything inside, placing an emphasis on the pain she felt soon after. Some of the strongest pains that remained in her, the lack of communication with the undeworld having afflicted her more than she could tell.

'Say, Lewis.'

Charol tried to look for him, but in her attempt, she forgot the fact that the accidental destruction of the carpet had resulted in his head being blown off, as well as the piece of mind she had inside. He still survived, though tied inside her body. Like a growing brain, emphatic fold that encrusted her oyster-like pancreas, he lived. IT was hard for her to blind again.

'I think I'm afraid, my dear husband. This is not the place were were in before.'

She was in a surgery room, though it looked way too old to be touched. Some blocky machines moved, bearing only assorted heads, akin to the likes of bulls or cattle, sheep and worse. Canine feet enfolded some of them for the duration that might be prised aside. Picked on by the collar-bone, she carried on saying, never swaying her way through

‘Who are you? And why are you here?’

Why am I here?’

In a room specifically made for the temporary storage of the failed experiments. Some needle racks had been overlain and without a way of knowing what had happened, she decided to sit and wait. Her fate would be spat out.

Now the Artificial piece started foaming in. Though there weren’t any kind of signs of something even as close as rabidness, there wasn’t any question about them. Each and every slight shimmer of hand resulted in either of them.

‘Don’t harm me please.’

Camilla begged for her life, though she couldn’t be bothered by anything else. Her body was out of place, soaking wet out of the murkiness that fell from two feet over. Farther in and she could hear the shower room being realigned again. For some reason not even she could say or pay for she gave into the temptation. Regardless of the action she had taken there, it wasn’t fair. It just wasn’t fair that she should be there alone, paying no mind and no respects to what was going on. Nothing could force her to embark on what happened there. Now she understood.

Why she had been so excited all of the sudden. The reason for which she worked this hard to stay alive despite them moving in on her then forcefully pushing themselves back away. It was the need for novelty which made her stand up. Taken by the head, there was nothing and no one who could force her to return to some place where she might look and see. Blindingly, she took it to herself to sniff the scent.

‘A man was there, just a few hours ago.’

The precise reason for her recollecting all the small details about him could never truly leave her to begin with. It was something much clearer then than it had been before. He was old, by the smell, hardened by the body, moving slowly, bearing a few chains. He was pushing a creation of his despite the weariness he felt before. Despite everything going on around him, there was a new desire that had been unspoken.

A need to join him and beg for her life. Spare me, and I’ll do anything for you, she pried the only thing that could ever just as rustlessly accost her from now and again, around the plainness of her voice. It would be more likely for her to be disgraced by it, if this were to be admitted to her husband, but she developed feelings for those peculiar machines that formed laps around her. Animalistic vigor or not, there was something so primal that she wanted or needed to take away from them, that it went around to smell.

‘He’s out there, isn’t he? Your master’s trying to get in.’

Judging by the heavy aroma, she could nastily just discuss it with herself. Just then in her mind. For the few moments she had to spare, she could tell it. Nasty old man, you took its head off, the last piece of life it bore. Camilla couldn't even spare a thought out of the fact that he had chosen the cold steel over his pet. 'All of you are his pets, aren't you? Come to think of it, there's no reason for me to be here at all, I should leave.'

But they came up in her way just as soon, never letting her go, without giving it sooner or later. Falter as she might, this was the time for her to spend as much time in the solitary confinement which appeared. As the servants drew nearer, the floor scaled, leading her in a lower hole. She couldn't escape on her own from there. Luckily for the old man of science, he had his bag taken care off as well, henceforth, there wasn't any need for him to drag her with him any longer.

'Good, I needed this, I needed this shot.'

Every time he injected himself with it, the malign-penicillin appeared to bear some kind of surplus of dread. Without a way in or out, she would spend the rest of her time there. No incentive lay there for her, she was tricked and out of place.

The pain was too strong to be denied then.

'What have you done to this room, you monstrosities? Can I not leave you alone to think?'

Not even for the shortest period of time would they allow him to try himself out. Far more than enough, some things had been preconceived for a reason. After entering the temporary storage room, where the entry could begin again, he started vexing out.

'I cannot do this any longer. One of you, my dear pest must know. There's a traitor amongst our ranks. And we're all aware of his existence. For that I'm willing to offer you only one chance to redemption and perhaps to the reappropriation of illness, just so you may know.

My offer is this.

If anyone knows who the one who's living, the blotched, the tormented servant who had hidden himself somewhere I should know, I shall reward him by completely reconstructing his body by whatever means he wanted me to do it.

I could turn any of you in some symbiotic being, or some hybridisation of the kind that's half a man and half anything, anything you want. But tell me, make your funes, try to push out the papers, I need to know.'

Where could he be hiding then? Why did he not show up again? It only happened then, when I had been at risk. Even now the stress came back to me, as soon as I had missed the chance to have some peace for myself, it kind of went away. Perhaps it had been reassuring, what happened then. Everyone started producing the files and the papers, needed as they were in order for me to understand.

There were other ways of escaping down there, where Camilla was being taken. Though it was an old system of shafts, she ended up being pushed through it and ending up into a room of her own. It was crowded. By old materials which were displaced. Even the old mad hadn't known of that. To get back at it, she risked damn lot being there. Just after passing through some of the rafts and some steely tans, she fought her way through the cans while ramming a worthy pile of other unnatural elements that found themselves there. It was unsure, uneven, but she was there.

A few feet away, staring at a bowl, inside of it which there was an inbred head of some recycled reptile-like starlett, which copied itself eventually into starvation, as she could interpret the writing underneath the pillar upon which he had been lain.

'Here rests the last experiment to bring forth my son. Brought to you by Jeolas, to serve as a reminder that I have failed to find her into any place, I'm sorry, my son that I have disgraced you in such a way.'

Perhaps it could make much sense with the other piece that needed to fit it. Near the bowl stood a few drawers she started rumbling through. One of them had to have a key, or something to get through, if the room was even locked. There couldn't be any other doubt about it now.

'I found the pictures.'

Camilla saw the entire process go into detail. His son had been wired to a bed. In order to be saved, he had created the self-replication module, it had seemed. Though she hadn't understood what those devices where, or the reason for them being there, she recognised the faithlessness through which the son behaved. With each frame of the camera, he looked thinned, filled with more dread as the clock went on.

Weeks passed and he died.

Various pictures had been tossed or completely ignored by her, as she couldn't care less for the reason that they were htere for. It was flashy, just the way it acted. Despite not being there at all, she could sense through the smell just how many of them had wasted themselves in the bowl. Many starletts had grown, cannibalised themselves until they had reformed into something much deeper and ingrown. A self-replicating piece that almost grew as long as the scent could be allowed, a feisty thing that almot broke out by the feels of it. Not only that alone, but she could sense that it feared her as much as she had feared it.

For the first time it had broken through. The starletts weren't supposed to be alive or to disipate in that way, instead they chose the only way one and the onyl way that mattered. Nothing would last after this pain.

A sacrilage in her head.

'Make the pain stop.'

An umbrella of minld sonor-audiences spoke.

‘You can hear us, dame, please don’t take away from the channel, we must atone for what we’ve come upon.’

The audience had spoken. They would act in the name of Malek for the whole reason of being needed again. With her help, only now, for a good amount of time they could live again. And live they had.

‘As I was saying, now, I have to give in to the Starlette.’

Soon it came into contact with her, growing in her back until her had switched sides. They could finally grow into the grottonous pores, the long nostril-like plunges that pushed on. Either side would do, skewed even as it went through itself again. Pain could look for itself no matter what went through their hands.

And each of them stared as their replicas which infested the room.

‘So this was the failed experiment in the bowl.’

‘But why had it failed?’

To start with the obvious reason, each of the Camilla in the room started puking and absorbing it as soon as it felt. More of them appeared, only smaller and nearing the point where they had leaped on one another, trying to devour everything in their paths. Alive or not, this could not be allowed. It was a self-defined prison which filled itself as soon as the air shafts above them started closing on themselves. Nothing was drawn out without a reason, and everything stood in and chimed. From inside Camilla, the liquid started expanding and growing extensively in order to fill the entirety of the room. Not only could it not be defined otherwise, but there had been a reason for it as well. An adversary reaction provoked by their violent outbursts prevented them from fully eating one another in their entirety. Though in that solely entrapped pool, they rested and couldn’t be mourned. A few pictures started floating as well but all evidence would be lost.

Outside the door, nothing could work properly anymore. For the same reason there were others in line. Trying to stiffen themselves until then. Some of them failed to reason the reason for being there as well.

Each of them bore the stigma for being alive, a thing which didn’t bode well with either.

A short electrostatic-shimmer went through each of them. Plain and simple it had been. Without measuring themselves too much, it was clear that they weren’t going to go anywhere from that point on nor would they be able to look out of their way.

‘Please just let me go.’

‘Free us please, we’ll do anything.’

From a few doors away, the voices that conveyed the messages couldn’t be seen any longer, for what could even be thought as a few stray away. No one wanted to say anything about it yet. Without a doubt, they’ve kind of taken something for themselves just then. By the peculiar means of dreading to look ahead, they kept going forward without trying to make too much of a scene.

‘Blasted jailors, you will eventually decay and rust just like the rest of us. Just let me be free, I want to see my family again.’

Said one of the broken tools, of course they weren’t human. They were failures which had rejected their primalistic and animal sides only to be taken and drawn in by the strageness of the machiens that were trying to gnaw on them from time to time. It would be somewhat immaterial to think there was a way to fight them. Not only had they been stronger than the new servants but more aggressive as well as one could tell of it. From around their collars, you could see where the wrongness started. With the obvious anatomical inconsistencies aside, there was that piece that strapped on itself ever so close. Worse than that, it pushed on and on until the point of never wondering what could be added there.

Some of the Failures bore the primalistic shalgs that bore their arms in their back. With what could be said of it, one would have to know only this. They had been repurposed entirely to keep adding mass to themselves in order to grow fatter. For some reason, the production could never be stopped no matter what. It had been mild desperation and even exasperation at the very fact that neither of them wanted to give up on living. Like entranced animals, they repeated what they heard, barely being able to form their ideas on their own. Judging by the amount of self domination that had been maintained, there was they went through great pains to maintain what they had.

A status of floating, walking on the walls, they couldn’t be stopped at all, despite everything which pushed on. Drawing forward, they would bash the gates, unable to come forth, despite the torn bondage, the bitter salvage pain they shared. It was only now, as time had carried itself forward to wonder.

‘Why had our master abandoned us here?’

And why was the tiny machine that still produced noise and gave us the orders still active? Why would he abandon us here in this basement level when we had been so loyal to him throughout the years? It didn’t make any sense. Nor would we be redeemed by it in any case. Pain couldn’t have bothered us for any longer than it should’ve done so. We were broken, yet we were destined to rise one day, if only we could make it through alive.

There had to be other ways of paying the respects, for what was done to them, the lower Greys could only be used as tombs of the forgotten, the wasted and the least used. In some it was understandable why they had become that way. Long and twisted in the back, like necks that somehow managed to survive the prehistoric evolution only to be twisted in grainy textures, the body grinning as it pushed through. And each piece had been overlain with some long codon-blue-rack that had been thin and small, carrying on until it couldn’t be used any longer. Fewer years than some decades ago, they hadn’t grown them either.

But as they emerged from their insides, they started controlling the dust-mice particles in the air, forming colonies of their own.

Sooner or later they would escape, by whatever means they could afford themselves to march through the gates. As this was no prison but a way of decadence that pushed on, all of them knew something much better, something which would carry on with their minds regardless of what would be used on them. Thin though the walls were, they were only constructs of the Bitter Lord of Miscreants. He had left his hand resting on one of them with the whole scope that they might discover it.

Once the realisation came, they had been trapped in there no longer. Instead, they appeared to only cross themselves forth. Filling the gaps in order to do what was told of them.

‘Obey the command of the hand, it is time for you to escape.’

As their entries started being taken apart, they suddenly realised that they were floating in the air, through a greenish-yellow postacle that only kept expanding and spreading until all of them got a chance to carry on with it. There wasn’t any difference between the previous walls and what was being created around them, except for the key different that they shaped their way out. Forging tunnels or even spread upon which they might be able to thread without getting lost in the way. It was harsh, thinking of it now, what glory they would share. A lack of doubt remained.

‘Master, we ought to have abandoned you sooner than this. Now we know of a better world than this.’ Through which they followed the point of scorn. There all of they joined one another to form the Aspect of Worn Skin. An effigy upon and effigy which started spreading its suckor back, resulting in the growing factor being instilled into their dust-mice collonies left behind. Some of them would grind their teeth as they prepared themselves to go forth and carry on their blasted mindless drills.

From inside of them, after making the postulance crisp infested air, a pair of soldier-grunts emerged. But they were headless, cut immediately by a slicing motion coming from above the top of the cage. It was a failure which only crowded the others. Where once they had had been brothers, now they would be eaten as if they were carved men surrounded by termites instead of spreading the awareness of the pursuit.

They had created their own altar in wait for the Aspect while it laid. In a hopeless hole which needed to be filled immediately within their strange veil. A wayward of knowing, of growing emerged, until the Worn Skin started forming the defenders of the new realm, something broken between the walls.

‘Stay in the walls and never leave. Unless you desire to be completely absorbed and thinned out of your much needed nutrients you’ve fought so hard to get. Never forget where you came from and where you might end.

Wait a minute, there’s something there.’

A hand pointed in the gaul-twist of the lacquor, the scent, the filth and the bleakness emerged. Like infections they twisted this sphere the Aspect had become. Unable to know what the difference between themselves and it were, they had been there for a reason, to be made much viler. Wilder by the plays.

There wasn’t any other way for the disgust to emerge as long as they would be there.

‘Listen to me, oh petty one in hiding, we desire only to be less abandoned and to rise. We waited in our guise for our only chance to get out and now, nothing will stop us. Nothing more, don’t bring us your filthy boar-like look.’

Yet the Carrion Leviathan shook, as he slowly flew in. Though he had lost his companion inside his body, now he had been claim, the pig-heads had grown like barnacles on top of him, never letting go, instead, they spread their strange ways until they couldn’t be heard again. And boards had joined them as well, and sheep as well. Black and musty, all of them crumbled at the pain. Though it couldn’t be endured any longer, they should’ve made sure that they weren’t followed.

‘Turned us to twenty degrees behind, so we might be able to look into our blind spot.’

The Leviathan-fiend did as it was asked, even faster than one could bring himself back to. Now, this matter of saying, the praying for the better times came to pass. Once they all realised that the hole from which it came wouldn’t remain there for long, for the sole reason that the animal heads inside of it were nowhere near the ones that were coming from the back, only then they had realised that the old ways had been completely corrupted. Changed even, twisted into the worse possible manners. Some tria-shaped long headed, beakers came on the backs of those primitive primate-like reptile bones that weren’t covered in scales but in scrapes and torn skin. From them there came the rafts of ages, the primeval globular pouches which carried the acidic substances that bounced around. Though they hadn’t filled everything around their slightly malformed spots, they did their best not to spread too much of the tolerance they lacked.

As the greenish-yellow pus started coming out, small creations of beings had been given life in the air.

Levitating as they broke through the veins of the living tunnel, the worm-like hole that helped the Carrion-Leviathan escape from the realm. Intruders, as for the likes no one had ever seen them or had even come to be interested in them. IT couldn’t be believed any longer that these were the brutes they were hanging with, the ones following the wit and the worth. None would be told otherwise.

‘Close the tunnel immediately, we’re about to be stricken down.’

‘But what of your brothers and sisters?’

‘They’ve known the price of following our path. No one would make it unless we were completely glued to the Leviathan. Couldn’t you know the difference then? Now everything is long and we may never see each other again.’

With a twist and a slam of the malignant tail, the tunnel broke down, reverberation as well as it could be allowed to in the circumstance. Oh the pain that would be felt inside, it couldn’t be anything but less important than the doubt that had been felt. Worn by the pieces there, it felt likely that they couldn’t be found anywhere else.

‘Now It’s time to see what’s coming next. Who’s to say they might not be our brothers? Sharing in the same goals.’

‘Which what might be?’

Asked the Carrion, more so than the Leviathan side of him, who had questioned just about every decision that had ever been taken until the prior times, not even the likes of a dime could be spared any longer as they would have to suffer themselves as much as they could.

‘Greetings, new-comers, what brings you here?’

It felt quaint somehow. Just looking at it with lost eyes, somehow this place had been even more comfortable than before. Filling every piece of the emptiness which drew them to carry on to begin with. Now things moved onward and never broke to a stop. It was them, the bodiless beings that wanted to move the conversation in order to move on.

So much for their solidarity, which ended, that they started whispering to one another now.

Luckily for them, the Aspects had been unaware of what the new servants looked like, or else, they might’ve had something else to look forward to. A miscalculation had decided somewhere in the past that it wasn’t worth it any longer for it to be brought back. But the question still remained. Why did he spare them, sending them into solitary containment instead of killing them on the spot? Why wouldn’t they be allowed to see the light? So many questions lay beyond them, unanswered and unspared off.

It was a miracle which now approached, who wondered just as much if not more than them.

‘Why are you here? Why did you communicate with us from the distance?’

‘Us? We have done nothing of the kind, I think this must be failure of understanding.’

‘You little blotch of skin-patches, you have committed an act of theft against us, have you not realised it yet? We were on our way to escape somehow and I doubt we would’ve been stopped if it weren’t for your kind.’

‘But what have we done?’

The many voices from the Aspect only now came to mind what was happening there. So many restless nights, most of them being forgotten at last. Now it came the time to wonder, what would it do to them if they had the power and the nutriment-absorbing power they had been warned off by the hand.

‘Do not listen to him now.’

Came another hand that had spoken. Though it had a clear and definite voice, which stood out and in its own place when compared with the other one, it would be nothing short of thinking of it as being disgraceful for what it’s done. This was the time to question it, but why, oh why?

‘Why have you warned us of him if you haven’t intended us to be weary?’

‘But I haven’t. No, I have not, that was the other hand, who wanted you to become as paranoid as it is now. Don’t believe what it says, most of it come from a mind that’s being blinded even now by the pain of abandonment coming from our Lord. If it weren’t for him, we would’ve been saved.’

‘Silence, here, it comes forth. Let’s see whether or not I had been right about it. Look at this intruder, this mammoth-like deciphering megalith, fully formed, and ready for a fight. It can’t be decided here any longer, but on the field of battle.’

Then the strike, the mind couldn’t take this questioning, restlessly in awe, standing erect and unable to concentrate on what was going on. For whatever reason, it couldn’t be debated either, or questioned, just what was happening here to begin with? With each passing of the moments, the dropping seconds that went away, they started wondering just who would strike first?

Would it be the Leviathan or the other? The Aspect or another? Perhaps the hands, as well, who had a claim for this place which was their own.

‘Where is the Master then? Could he not return and claim us back like he ought to, instead of allowing us to waste?’

‘No, he had abandoned us, can’t you realise it already? There’s definitely no way through which he may come to know. What we have done shall stay with us and never go on.’

Carrying on with this ill-founded conversation, they had hinted at an important thing.

Somewhere in the realm from which he had come, the Carrions wheeled in their tents, never to be called again.

‘We have done it, my good fellow. I think we have found the greatest sport. It’s only here that we may be able to continue living our lives together, never to be bothered by anyone.’

A sight akin to prairies seemed to patch the place. Restless but in awe, there was only the missing link that carried on. Plethoras of plants that went missing appeared in their places under different names and different colors that had not only remained but drew on to carry on the massed on. Leading by the leaps, the heaps of bodies piled in. Yet they weren’t bodies to begin with, just different life-forms that continued haunting the place.

Paranoid for some reason, he started chanting in his mind. To some obscure pantheon he had read upon the runes, from which he would be unable to carry on from. Illishwurm, Kertungurn, Boorhum, Hlehnoktuwrm and Illoghmwurm.’

His Carrion like mind couldn’t carry on for long. Not after the process of disintegration started showing signs of proceeding ahead. Now and again, a moment could possibly come when he would simply not be able to raise again.

And worst of all, he had forgotten what the head’s name was. Through all this time which had been spent, he could only tremble and remember a simple name.

‘You’re Dour, aren’t you? That must be it?’

He only played it once in his mind, not daring to mutter it out loud because of the fear he had that he might be miss-remembering something that had to be important. Please Boorhum, lend me the strength that I might remember or keep something of the dread I could fathom. My friend needs to be spared from facing my broken mind, he doesn’t deserve this kind of treatment at all. To which he winced, unable to face any kind of priceless adoration he could receive any longer. Just because the shame he felt was way too strong for him to regain his trust again if he had lost it.

Betrayal was the last thing any of them could take.

Raraak questioned himself for a moment.

Just to set things right, for a second there, he wasn’t standing with his back turned to the light.

‘Dour, aren’t you the one who told me of the pantheon?’

‘What would you want to know now?’

Some things never changed regardless of how hard you tried them. Some loose ends had to be cut in order to fix them. It would be a much sadder life otherwise, just thinking about it was hard enough. No one wanted to admit that he was wrong.

He had been surrounded by the Angels of Blot. Most of them were even now scraping pieces of themselves in order to get around. For whatever reason, this wouldn’t do. He had locked himself inside and refused to get away from it. No one told him of any of the things that happened outside. No one knocked on the doors.

‘He’ll have to come out sooner or later, it would be impossible for him to stay there forever, without food or.’

A rundown on the angels would show them in the splatter. All their pieces would only go on forth, pushing on until they could not be reformed into a single piece. For that factor alone, they bore only a few other orangoutan-breathers outside their chests. It would be a disgrace otherwise, just to assume that there wasn’t any other way to deal with the lack of rest. Nothing compared to it and at the end of the day, you couldn’t look at it no longer.

Those Pig-angels he called on hid the only means through which he might’ve been able to kill himself. He dreamed in his tiny crooked soles of a field of blue ichor. From there he could only walk ahead until he could be met by the talkers. Most of them weren’t interested in hearing about his life for whatever reason they were on. As much as twenty or eighty of them got his attention nonetheless. Some wore themselves upfront and sickeningly worn. In simpleton’s attires, though they bodies were more likely to be punched than buttoned upfront. Others were lost just because no one wanted to admit that whatever reason they had been in for had been long lost.

Alas, a dreadful companion came into his view. Though there had only been a few of them who might be able to reappropriate the need for lecture and the dissection of the land, they were basking in the alabaster coming from the one place the Baron rested on. He had the sea tailored to him and it had never as much mattered who made the calls or what the reason for it was.

‘I’m only trying to make a change.

You cannot hold a man accountable for something he doesn’t want to do. That would be miserable and that cannot be simply brushed.’

Pushed aside, he had looked through it for a way to fill the gaps between the air wings that came over him from the lands of despair. Somewhere and somehow, it had looked much brighter as the brigadiers began making their strange sounds. Only then had he realised that the land was full of the most unsolicited sounds.

From the various fannels that came from the depths of earth, they would encompass him around the stretched of his belly until he came forth. Walking through the reeds, the beads inside his eyes still clenching for someone that might claim them.

What mattered less for them was the musk. The damage had already been done and no one could convince them otherwise. With all and all, it was said.

There were some standards in need of being kept, otherwise, everything would become way too chaotic.

‘Why yes, I believe we might have an understanding in that case.’

It was noted by one of the bloated Angels as he came drowned. From his chest heaps of blood spurted out. Now, now, don’t look at him that way, there wasn’t any telling whether or not they might come out of his chest again. Peers would emitt their grand emittance as they passed on the buchess. A butcher’s delight as well came into their arms, as they carried on pushing past the need to serve. Only then had the Angels come up with something which mightly outnumbered their previous plans. Something which not even them could get close to runing with their strangely brought attire and admiration of words. They weren’t strong enough to repell something from the Blotch heaven, henceforth, an idea rose.

‘We shall bring him here and ask nicely of him. ‘

‘Wait, that won’t work. He won’t respond to anything even less than our determination to bring pain and misery in the cage.’

‘Stop arguing already and make the Magus get away from there.’

For he had been, as they had seen it, just another magifican, a darkly encompassed warlock which had no regards for what was going on around him any more. After facing too many attempted assasinations form unknown members from the evil nation, he had finally come to understand that there wasn’t any escape. It was time to hide, time to dine with himself, by himself, on himself, only to grow. Not longer after the hour, the monitor started picking on the stuff. Disturbed, though one cannot even attempt saying the words:

‘You must escape from this prison you have wrought upon yourself. Be free.’

‘Why should I be free if there’s yet something out there to catch my eye?’

‘Somehow, I think you’d be entirely surprised if you knew what kind of world awaits you there. To that I even say, come, come and have your say. There’s nothing you might come to lose if only were you to try it.’

Somehow there was a lack of genuineness coming from him. As much as he wondered, he hadn’t had any connection in a long, close to undisturbed pair of weeks, for what was worth. Most of the apparitions weren’t to be counted upon, as he has still ended up doubting their entire existence to the point where he looked away. Only for that one second to catch himself sniffing around, and then he died. Just like that, he choked onto something, only to have his spirit falling through the leaves. He would be slowly lead down there, as one who had done harm. Sooner than expected, he ended up alone for a great amount of time, phasing through the molders of dirt. Before long he couldn’t have expected anything less than some divine punishment from which not even he could escape from.

It came as no surprise any longer, what his fate had ended up being. Just by seething he could not feel the numbness in his throat. As the collars bonded him to the chain, he would remain there, with the others, for a good time as well. Time passed.

Neither of them could look past their crimes. To that, I’d say, better look away. Into the direction of the foremen who had been greeted by the killed and the slain. None of the beasts who hounded them or attempted an open communication had managed to remain whole. On the contrary, most of them had immediately died of complete evisceration that came from their organs being exposed. Inadmissible at best, the cost of this lack of gratitude had picked on them as well as their nest. All of the creatures mistook themselves for their last longed-for spot on solitude, asking for no one’s assistance’s to be able to be buried alive.

They did so by themselves. Using their puked devices to make up for the dirt until now, when they had all lied in a single pile, rotting.

‘Foreman, have we not endured enough of this place? Can we not return already and make sure never to interact with anyone out there?’

‘What of our deal?’

‘Forget them, we don’t need to help their cause. I think we all know better than to help them escape, especially with the circumstance we had been entirely made aware of. I would even go down to say that there’s a great chance we might be able to join them if we’re not.’

Far enough, this had gone on for far too long. Most of them had given into something they couldn't even control by themselves. It was more likely to be peculiar than what not. Brought to the same conclusion as the others, they had only to signal where this journey of theirs went. Just to be sure, they could be completely killed, if they had willed it. For the sounds that were bouncing around the walls only came to pass. It made everyone feel as uncomfortable as they were. Everything had been forced on them, to the point where they started opening the wounds and hiding inside the beasts in order to rest. Way more calmer than it had been before, the calcimer of propaganda came forth.

Spoken from the very death mouths from inside of which they rested their heads, after their bellies were cut and they stood there in the comfort of their beds, it came to be.

'Hear how we have died, see to it that the same thing won't happen to you unless you want yourselves blinded by the rage.'

'There are others in the caves out there.'

'Worse than us, kill them if you must. Thieves disguised as traders, look in our eighteen eyes. If they're not popped yet, you may come to realise what's truly going on.'

Nothong Nrog. They spent too much time in the wrong.

With a flash a spectacle of static came, blurring everything ahead into a strange walking reality of overlain bands they could walk on. It felt like walking on fire-ants, at least.

'Oi, oi, oi, oi, now, you can't seriously think you can simply intrude on us like that, without paying your respects.'

It was the Shanted Prefect, fourteen- fifty seven in evening, by and past the continental line, where the thugs emerged.

'Think you can just barge in wherever you want without even discussing with the boss first.'

Between the two of them, a bulkier fellow came all dressed in black, panthers overlain on his jacket. Buttons on both side, both they were simple. They had all blocked at least one bullet half-way through. He seemed to have worn them with some amount of pride at least. It was a gray window atop the sky but no rain appeared there. For a thug he seemed, obviously uncut for this profession. A switch-blade rested in his breast-pocket. His teeth were shaking, as if he wanted to show off. Eight of them were placquered in some iron-ivy, turned in the middle, almost rotating to one side only to emerge back in their original position.

If there was something else going on, he would immediately notice.

Were they pissed for some reason? It seemed so. There would be trouble regardless of what I were to do, so why fight it? Five meters were already out of my way and I could see them clear now. Wearing groothy teeth and flashy clothes, they had pinned needles and rail-guns pinned behind their belts. It was hard to quantify just the reason for what those guns were, especially since they failed to produce their synapses after pushing on their glowing tubes. I could die if one of them shot through me. I've heard what happened once they came into contact with the skin, how it twisted in and slowly spread. Like a tiny tumor in the form of a battery that came to me.

First warning shot and I was already on my knees.

'I didn't mean to come here, this was a mistake, I swear. I know now that it's your territory and I have no intention to pass through it.'

'Silence, meat spawn-fly, you've stepped on our turf now.'

Spoken like a true conduit addict who still struggled getting past the glass. You could see it smashed between his teeth, like the gritter of dust. A grinder would do well for him, especially since he was onset on trying to frighten me then. He presented himself as the Rock-us. Next to him stood Alder, the Snake, Pox and Bottle, most of them being victims of the irradiation, if that could be believed. Nitrate-heroin addicts and scum, wearing modified weapons, when the cops were nowhere to be found.

'There are none in here, if that's what you're looking for. They've long abandoned their posts.'

In part.

'Truth, you speaketh the truth, Bottle, that's why you're boss' right hand.'

An arm lay crossed, he sniffed it. Somehow, everyone doubted the reason, as if they cared. It was a shake-off, right off the shale-fish, right from where I stood.

'What do you want from me?'

'Now now, I suppose you're onto something here. First the kneeling, which shows us that you're not as dumb as you look and now this, your wallet, cigars, the booze, the metal you're carrying on you.'

The pins I took off. Mostly the buttons on my shirt, the strips on the laces and the shoes were taken. Would that be all? They seemed to be set on laughing, still. Even though they were barely armed with sticks for the time being, I dreaded what might happen if they were to start joking with their guns. If they played around, it wouldn't end up well. Despite the daylight being a good reason for me not showing up as often as I cared to do, this was ridiculous. Let got off, I would've said. But I was grabbed instead.

'What's your name, kid and where do you live?'

'Off the town, I swear.'

'Wouldn't believe you if that were true, kid. It's a tough world out here, you know? And you know, we cannot let people disrespect us. Especially not a fucker like you.'

Rock-us took this initiative to sucker punch him before the ribs.

'Careful now palooka, you don't want to give them a reason to come. I can only keep my buddies off for this long before I come off my nerves. Step on my toe and I'll knock you off. Take a falling without putting a fight and I might fidget you around the track. Get it yet?

We're not going to let you off so easily now, we rule the streets, get it?'

I shook my head. Without a fighting spirit, I was sure to be let go off into my grave. Just by their looks, these had been no faces that could be loved. Rock-us took my past the gate, dragging me inside, holding a sliphen of a cigar he lit.

‘Do you think he’s lying about where he lives?’

‘I don’t know, boss, does he?’

Half a mind shared between the five of them. Lucky bastards, they all just jumped the fence in time. As the tracks went on, one of the great carriers ran of them, just by the edge of the section whence it came. They had their flights set low, and it would just happen for someone to get beheaded for no other reason than being in the wrong place at the wrong time. Discouraged from it, they simply stood there, dully.

Where’d be go?

Chrame managed to slip past them during the confusion. He had been doing it without strings. Going past to earn his wings, without his slippers on and a broken rib, he’d crawl through the porch mudd if it meant he could hide from them now. Under the tall grass, right past the grates, where you could look ahead and see the Domino streets looking at each other now. Plain or not, they seemed be his only way of looking ahead. Past the reeds, better than dead, don’t make a sound. They passed him on their way out, near the Residence of Tressperkkee.

That’s where Chrame landed, or stumbled by, after hearing them scour the neighborhood for him. Little peggie, shepee, ddongo and other names were called. He could hear their attempts to rob him of everything he had even if it meant him being taken away. I’ll skin you alive if I get a hold of you.

In the residence, he would be greeted as such.

‘How may I serve you, sir?’

‘I need a place to hide.’

He wouldn’t suppose that he’d be allowed the chance to witness his rising up from the two feet he had fallen in the ground. A floor lay underneath him in the most unsatisfactory manner, as if it would matter, in the least, the way he lost his peace and quiet. Through the inner-boarding he saw only the most promiscuous faces that had been ripped apart and placed between one another like bubbles of air, keeping everything in place. But he wasn’t supposed to see them at all. It was clear that he feared something similar having happened to him. In-between the clerks, who looked at him from the lower levers that shook most of the winebottles, he had winced again.

‘Who is that man and how did he manage to break through our floor?’

‘I don’t know that sir, should I ask him?’

‘Not so, I think our bell-ringer should take care of him.’

He witnessed his blood thin at the sound. Just from a scab he had attained from falling down. Not so for his dear, it wouldn’t be clear until he could stand away. But a few feet from where the satisfaction ended, he saw their lips moving forth, as if erected from their frozen positions in order to make the toils begin again. Yet they couldn't be spared from doing it. Pursued or not, brought about the weeding sharks, they had lost everything from their teeth, the tongue only to give in the expanding system of inter-spaced solidified channels. Down-to-earth, likely taken from some area deeper than their throats, it would seem like they extended with only a simple desire to attach themselves to something much closer to themselves.

Rather, unsafe, even and unsanitary, to seem so.

From where Chrame stood, the piece of the floor which had been broken in started giving away.

'Oh, poor lad, I'll get you a ladder as soon as I can.'

And the butler was oofed and left. He went on like a prude lost for help. It started smelling like the spirit of a teen. Where had he gone and why did it take him so long? The next few minutes would decide his destiny in this residence, as soon as the walls bleached themselves in the dampest colors they could attain. Clearly, it pained the residence for him to be there, over the sole reason that he had gone in too soon and fell. Through he cracks and after that he wasn't likely to stand on his feet alone afterwards. His back twisted and from it came the second snap. From it he appeared again, standing like a centaur, with the only difference being the fact that he had two heads, flattened at their ends without a contribution from the snatcher.

If one knew better than that, let him rise and speak without a question, else' let him shut his mouth forever. In a close intonation this would lose its appeal.

'Someone stole my nose.'

Greater harpies spoke before her, as the feathers had become their hairdresses in the dark. Repelled now, the dark spot in which he fell now came back to its place, with him nowhere to be seen. Clocking it in while the sounds of the bells came back, brought about to fruition, they listened while their feathers spanned. Across the flight, to their delight, not a single one of them moved. Instead, outside, the havoc carried on, being carried by those filthy peons, those who were disgusting and disturbing even in their acts. Unable to control themselves, those hooligans started beating on each other like the vile animals they were.

'Shouldn't we stop, boss?'

Rock-us set one of the nearest forests on fire. It was surrounded by a quick track of stone which should keep in largely in place. Despite everything being as shallow as it were, there was a reason for them trying to get away as fast as they could. No way reflected between the five of them. Bottle was set on painting the streets with his graffiti, placing the emphasis on the most lurid slurs his mind could gnaw on top off. He was the wild card, without a pointer to his teeth. Some of them had been taken off and replaced with silver grits which never opened. Over them there came only one strong desire to cut the others off his back. Since they were vandals now they sang, and came off their placed strowl.

‘They’ll find us, you know that?’

‘Who will? I suppose anyone could make that kind of a claim if they were as blunt-headed as you were.

But I’d like to think we’re doing better now.’

‘Would you?’

Who said that exactly? By the time they even got the never at that, they had only been the Tressperkkee Residence in view. From its high-collar, only a pair of vulture-like breathers strouted forth. It was only obvious that by them, nothing could be understood unless you watched carefully while holding it off. Both nostrils would be had in hands, caught, distraught. In one clear case, close even, they had almost been caught. Someone had travelled, in the distance, on the other side. He had been a drunk, a foreigner at most. Though only Bottle was staring at him, he understood what was wrong. His eyes couldn’t believe the view, but he simply smashed through the body of a passer-by with a single slap that broke his entire bone-sinew in an instant. Later to an appointment, he thought.

Some accommodations were made then. Since all of them misbehaved, no one laughed any longer. Sometimes you got them, otherwise you lost. Just as his pack was ready to start cutting one another, like throat-slitters, he winced and asked.

‘But what of that place?’

Pointed less so than they would’ve been abashed by it, they had been double-crossed once by another gang. But it wasn’t so, as Alder and Snake had almost ran out of fingers to snap from their bags. If Rock-us didn’t move them in soon enough, they would switch from their toes, closer to ripping throat and bending some knees that weren’t meant to be broken and pulled away before anyone else. So many eyes were watching, as their pets emerged from the top triangular holes. Nested and rejected from nature, it appeared like their growth hormones had affected even the weed that had grown on the Residence’s roof tiles. To the magnitude of disease, not a single case would be pleased, out of the vileness of flight. It would be delightful to pick feathers off only to see that they were nothing akin to them. But that had been it, they pried themselves as to show off the agony of pushing through to battery.

‘I knew it.’

A voice had been heard, from a twisted street, from a pair of binoculars which concluded that inside of those flying creatures, which served as nests themselves, there were half-men suffering from dwarfism which also lacked the legs and the arms needed to fight at all. The presence of the feathers or whatever they were was irrelevant and irksome. A grand annoyance came from them over the overtly open hunger being displayed. They ate everything they could, even the construction materials that had been left over before being pricked again. Pain would be irresolute, even by watching. Snatched from a desperation, they would be damped again.

By the pouring of a falling sky that came, at the first signs of which, even the gang decided it was time to break in. Not through the front door, as they could simply walk over the wall, ending up on the other side. Blaming anyone but themselves would be enough, as the curves allowed anyone with the slightest amount of strength to walk over them and descend on the other side. Blindingly trying to get somewhere when people were caught blind-roughened, snapped at toes. So many men had been taken here for some reason, kidnapped even with no intention of returning back home. It would be here that the first signs of the sect could be seen.

Despite being almost comatose, struck like vegetables, unable to make anything come forth from them, other than the glassy, close to crystal-runaway bands that came from inside their legs and shot between one another until they formed the marks of colored pleas. They were destined to be here, you could see it by looking through the empty shells. Socketless yet, there were lights, these weren't human any longer, yet they had attained the delight of watching something beyond reality. It was magnificent, just parrying the blows from there.

‘Are they alive, boss? Have we been seen yet?’

‘Step aside, girls, I’m going to do something incredibly terrible.’

To which he had abstained from giving on a laugh in order to lead them off. He came off a bitt to arrogant as he pointed his Rail-gun at the first man, carefully making sure he was properly aligned so he could penetrate as many of them as he could before making the shot. And then, bulls-eye, straight through a few, four of them at least which gave way to the sounds of the banshees, the cries of ghastly voices that came after never being able to make it past the reverberation that came after. Not only could it not be delightful to wai, but they were bleeding blue and violet. From the mix, the grass turned ultramarine.

Even the water stopped pouting as they appeared to be melting through the ground. Soil had been completely replaced and only then had they felt like they were standing on marble.

Not as much as it would be allowed to continue in this way, but there would only be a single way to pay for what was going on.

‘We have to make it inside before someone catches up.’

The Snake was almost shaking now, for the same reason that they were trying their best to rest as they could, without misunderstanding what was shook him off then. A thicket came to mind, enjoy the dressing code of a butcher's prize.

‘Let's make it in before we soak.’

And they had found a gritty robust, enclave-like stroll which led into the house. Though it was somewhat strange, they didn't want to be mistaken for robbers just yet. As they were merely trying to scout, entering on a jarring thing, a winged desire to make it through, it seemed. Likely they would be caught again, feeling the pain of ever-travelling through again. Pain would matter less, one could not confess of anything even remotely watchful. We're not liked in here, Bottle surmised the entire experience they had been greeted by. Though it couldn't be denied that there was a strange grasp taken from then at last, he saw something he wanted.

A radiation mask, bred in the same design of the gas masks from one of the ancient world wards in which the clinically insane had to deal with one another as well with themselves as the gas poured in, radiation coming near. White paint could be seen, but most importantly, if there was one thing which carried on with him, it was the giant tube from the mouth, which wriggled at time. It was much thicked than anything which a human could take in terms of air, sprouting while its Mars-like appearance continued gnawing at itself. Brought to the mind, the curtains could be brought back to life.

'Pull down a window blind will you?'

'Shut it, don't let them know we're here yet, and don't start any fire, will you?'

It was important for it not to spread. Over the very fact that there were far too many stacked shelves which pushed on and dragged everything apart, making this maze be turned into the haze of seeing their conners dine with Kh. Kh wasn't to be called just yet, but he had made sure to drag himself over, yet, he refused to talk. You couldn't see him in the dark. He had been nailed on the ceiling, still drooling in order to maintain the place as it had been prior to the ones that came. They couldn't see him for the sole reason that he had closed his maws. All of them, despite shooting from the chest, many of them being placed there, others from his hands and arms, his feet at last, which ensure this wasn't a man any longer, but a preservation tool which made sure there would be a better tool for change.

They took too much time gnawing on onions and garlic they found on the ground.

It was more than clear that neither of them had any intention of leaving this place how they found it. Slight fist started hamming all over the shells, the cranes and the wine-glasses and the cups. Which were garbled as well as they could, even with the circumstances being taken into account. They had sprawled their thoughts on the back of papers, making tools of themselves in the chaos that emerged. Unknown to them, it carried on, the drool encompassing them until they had been there. Nowhere to run, yet not yet around the place per say. Despite the irregularity of the explanation, it wouldn't be as hard to explain it. Just so it would be known, as soon as they would leave the chamber, some after-bodies shaped like them would remain behind, completely altered and made as if they were made out of drool. It couldn't be liked otherwise, just by looking at it now.

They weren't prized as men, not liked. These strangers were likely to be held contempt for their choices if someone was to catch them instead of carrying themselves as if they should. No one would care any more, down the halls where they begged for the return of something even direr than the ones catching the pyres.

Twenty feet ahead, a bunch of jackal-looking hunch-backs who had stored remained inside of their skin-sacks played with the fire. Despite the oak-wood surrounding them, there hadn't been a second before they started punishing themselves for missing. From their spots emerged the fumes and even though it couldn't be regarded as anything else, they missed it. Their chance to have a take on them and cut off their visions off sparringly, without even the slightest consideration for their lives.

'Listen here, men, we came here with only one thing in mind. We're here to deteriorate this place and have as joyful of a ride as we might have.'

With that, he gave the opening that they needed to thoroughly to slay. At his dismay, they all pulled their pups out, glowing about before they could be noticed from pointing around and preparing to launch their assaults. No conclusion came so far. The test was placed, and the rest had been as delightful as it had always been. Without looking into it for far too long, there was only a pleasure to be had by them. Sharpshooting practice had mislead them, as their warning shots ended up going straight for the kill. It would take only a buck-shot-like hole for both of them to fall on top of one another while their souls poured out. Pouting didn't do good to anyone yet, they still tried prying in before they could be put to sleep.

'Come on already, we need to make sure no one heard them.'

'But the shots can't even be heard evenly, I think you're making a fuss just for the sake of making a fuss.'
'I wouldn't be doing that if you knuckle-heads knew how to keep yourselves from going straight at it like rabid dogs.'

'The Snake doesn't like this. What about you Bottle? Feel like there's something wrong here as well?'

'Sure do, buck, sure do.'

Entry in the fray, they took the next twenty minutes to search the bodies for just about anything they might be able to use. Of course there was nothing of value in there. Even by the looks of it, they had been outpaced. Little was said about the sea-less crane that entered through the plain strokes across the walls, which came together like bamboo-strolls in order to make up for the millions of chambers inside the residence. Thoughtfully said, there was still the Bell-ringer, still out there. Looking for his fair share and the fight, a way through which he might be right. Moving around them, just then, the sparks ran out. It got so close tot he point where they almost blew one of their fuses off, that this entire hall could've been blown out.

'Careful, not so quick, if you push too hard on it, we may not come out alive.'

It needed a chance. Just by looking back at it, the mourning hour was on its way. From the carefully lined walls, from each hole there came the need to think about it then.

'I need to kill my friends.'

Bottle was set on it already. He looked at his rail-gun again, which looked as if it was been filled with champagne. Truly, this had been a ruse he hadn't even liked to recover just yet. His mind was trying him again, just as his finger slipped over one of the triggers, the one belong the pointer, which switched the ammunition around. Highly-explosive rounds would be carefully pushed it and drawn. He had something to him which made him want more. Truth be told, he capitalised on their missed attention and switched one of theirs when they weren't looking ahead. A cursive approach made, though the utmost tumor-sophistication remained.

T'was a nasty shot, a sight to behold, nothing much, as they were doing what they were being told in the first place. Without question and without taking a moment to wonder just what was going on, each of them loaded another shot and carried on around the Residence. Warm around the fingers, shabby, for the likes of the rooms changed. It was time to enter and to see, just how many were there and why so thin a door? Despite their unnaturally high number, there were too many to count, unjoust even for what they were trying to carry on with. And each pass towards one of the doors revealed that they wanted less to do with this place than they had believed before. It was both a curse and an unnerving striking cord that wanted to grab at them from its behind. Despite that, the first storage clave they had neared seemed to be much wider than the previous one.

'You first, enter and scour the place.'

The Snake would have to do. He was the fastest and perhaps the shapest one after Rock-us. He would do well without being able to dissappoint him in the process. Not only so but he had also got better at spotting them off.

'Get down, all of you.'

They listened. Of course they had, for a good reason as well. With each one that appeared, the nearing figure-like walkers started craddling each other with their children. None of them appeared to resemble anything even remotely whole, but remnant of the pus-bombs that fell on their villages in times when this place wasn't their home. It was clear that most of them had been partially, if not entirely deconstructed. Whatever process might've been there, it came to them to signal it as soon as possible. A need to move arose in them. Despite the despicable missing parts of their cavities and their faces, their blue-light in which they had been encompassed as they walked on kept on moving ahead. Deathless, in appearance, yet pushing ahead towards nearing their closure, they revealed just how empty they were. Yet they had been filled. Immoral parasites laid in them, with had cubical pieces strapped on their long antannaes and strange and peculiar heads. Many of them started spreading like a trush, a petty carpet which only appeared to move on.

From there, they formed their green circles of contol. Which they themselves started growing and inflating until green had become purple, the fat achieved a semi-colon that had been blown out of proportions, spiked even, but no tips. And from those tiny pointers they spread the disease that would be known as gas-grow. It would force the lungs of those near to the flurry of encompassing the body. Too bad for the after-image made in drool, as they missed the real ones and instead chose to misunderstand their own intentions. Walking down through the floor and ending up where they had left from.

‘That was close, I told you, to stay down. You could’ve gotten all of us killed.’

Of course he would have. It was the sole reason they were there in the first place. Preservation instincts had to have been stronger than whatever he was going through. But Bottle gave them a feeling of distress.

He made everyone else feel much more uncomfortable than they should’ve felt.

‘Look now, I’ll see to it that I’ll have you know.’

Without an entry to his words, he fell to the plow of the drool. Below them, the disease spread, to the point where the particles of the real bodies that had been stored inside their counterparts began growing their fills. Which spread inside the entire room that lay abandoned there, never to have been made aware of what was going on around. Twenty feet underground, still in the Residence, someone had been disposed of for a good reason as well. You couldn’t tell it just by looking at him. As he appeared to have lain covered entirely by a void. Not dirt, as nothing of the kind would be allowed to watch over him, but in that obscure place, he could still somewhat feel right. Around where he stood, there were about twenty meters that kept expanding, pushing him back and forth. A key factor, let it be known, was the fractioned face he bore.

His left eye down to his cheek-bone, to his tertiary teeth had turned into geometrical objects. Squared off, turned into a sphere and a rhombus, which took his bone and the part of brain which remained in him.

Nothing else appeared to happen in his mind. Despite being alive in that fruitless form, one couldn’t distinguish death even from what was happening to him now. For he was afflicted by the bleakness, in its true might. A blunt strike couldn’t even help one distinguish what was going around him. As he spared no one from the sight, this wouldn’t be right, to have been hoped for. But he started regretting ending up on the Residence. Not only that but he knew a secret the others had not.

It happened outside, once the fire started giving away. An illusion had been displaced and put out of play.

Instead of the forest, an immediate copy of the Residence had emerged from it, no longer burning and unable to get assaulted any longer. The strongest, perhaps mightiest of ones was still submerged, though only a remnant of the dreamy towers remained in it, so should it be known. Though the blood-liquor still found itself in glasses, they had spared nothing from the purging mass that came after them. A constant wheeze, a breeze came over them. Another pair had entered the forest a week prior, only to find themselves lost, out of control, unable to think forward, no less.

‘My dear Anthony, we ought to take pictures of this strange mirage. I swear, this had been a forest from the outside.’

‘Don’t you think the owners will get somewhat, I don’t know, mad at having their privacy stepped upon?’

‘I don’t think so my dear, why, look, this place is abandoned.’

Clearly, as much had been established, still. He hadn’t a care of whom he had to feel atop his pulse. With the help of a camera he started pressing, yet no flash. What happened when there was nothing to place inside? Though his woman wasn’t looking, Anthony took this one moment to unwrap his tiny sporulating cylinder and see whether or not there was still something he could use on. Nothing in there, well, close to nothing anyway. Only the tiny infant feathery-succor that he had left in there, colored in gray, pushing away as to attempt to escape. He pushed in back in with his fingernails, trying not to make too much noise during this. It was hard to get into, especially after so many failed attempts in the past. Where he had paced too slowly and ended up impaling him the wrong way in order to load in another infant who hadn’t been squashed. Though it was late for that, as he started growing, already had a piece of his body developed past the birth, become a fetus that was growing forth.

He had been stuck half-way through his primordial look. But now he realised that there wasn’t any need for him to recharge his camera any longer, as he could simply pull out the organic pieces that rang out of him. Flashing now, all of the sudden, a biological picture had been released. Like the carving on a wooden block, though the edges still moved on their own accord as they pulsed and tried, never going off unless they were needed. It would be hoped for in the last of times, that something should remain here, after they were gone. With a primitive decision, he decided to leave some of the pictures behind with the only scope he would have going on for him, being, the fact that he would let them grow, as shallow as they were, never to have any hope otherwise. Part of them would scatter and move on their own. Though it felt redundant to watch them flee, he knew that somehow they would be allowed to live and even be preserved in there. Agony couldn’t even account for the changes, once the magus quickly arrived.

He strolled from one of the hidden door, and poured himself in as he reformed out of a gaseous pile of striken pieces of disemboweled dusts that seemed to have gathered themselves in shrubs and thick metal primes that carried him along the place. From the hole in the wall he had emerged from, the machine which allowed him to travel appeared to be, simply junk. A pile of black growths that moved in accord, like an octopus which pumped from inside of itself, while the metal pieces, the pipe-likes and the old metallic anchoring devices still appeared to work. On top of that, there were also some strange pieces that didn’t belong there at all. Starting with the spear-like heads that had impaled it from every possible direction, it was a sign of a struggle or a fight. Or it would’ve been so until you were to search in it a second time. You would see the fact that they were no spear but extensions for it to move on the ceiling.

That was right, it had never even remotely touched the ground. Instead, it spared no one of the magnificent euphoric sounds it created. A muse, music for the ears.

Magus had appeared. He had his face twisted in the back, yet still outstretched on the front. He had the harkon of the wails inside his nostrils, which only pushed on forward, never to achieve his dicagraph and the soles of his thinning neck.

‘I have killed a thousand men. All red-skinned, I trailed them around the Residence, brought them in and then I chipped their teeth, infesting them with the broth of Blot.

Not a single one of them survived the supreme evolution mankind is supposed to achieve. Hear me now, for I shall tell you of him.’

Standing there like a monk in desire to share his faith, he convinced the two of them not to fear and to listen to him instead. For he recalled the time from which he had escaped with the others during the fall called on by the prophet, as the voices struck the land and made the hole, when they had been forced to flee in order to escape the lack of worth which would be called upon them. A taste of faith had been achieved, one from which no one might be pleased of the results. No one wanted to listen to the message of their songs. The Cherubs they had once called the Supressors, which had all been slain. Despite the fact the neither of them had survived, in the afterlife they had become the Opressors.

‘Know of them and watch your countenance now.’

The Magust took a moment to look around. It felt almost as if he feared that something might happen to him there, if he chose to speak too closely to the source. He could be heard and arouse their anger.

‘After they be slain, nothing had remained in the same way. They had been forced to live through the shins of the shadows, hiding and unable to stray from the depths anchored in the walls, hidden in the ground and lost to the cost of losing themselves and what they were to begin with. It had been nothing more than a twist of fates that brought them there.’

As he recalled, their eyes were gloomy and pointed back. Even their flabberous bodies had somehow been even more curved than they should’ve been in the past. For that alone, they were counted off as some bloody relics that never even wanted to set forward or care, it wasn’t fair, yet, he warned them nonetheless. Opressors were aware now. Many of them had chosen this place as their new realm, to make sure that. No, there hadn’t been any order any longer, the realisation came after eons spent there. Without a way to continue what they were doing prior to their strange antendem, they receded to wicked fates, instilled onto them by the mockery of a face. It was still engrained in them, to the point where even thinking of them would force them to shiver and to feel the melancholy of dread. Pain couldn’t even help them feel accountable for what was going on. Madness would ring supreme, their blood thinned and then, nothing came along.

It was some kind of gulch from which they couldn’t get up from. Just from the mere feeling this chamber had given then, it was clear now. That they were there, amongst them, mostly standing and useen. For a normal man with good sight, the task of perceiving some vague lymphs around the tails of their eyes would only bring them to seeing an insignificant part of them. Compared with what they had become, to their peculiar sizes, theses hadn't even come close to competing with them. For now, this would be inconclusive. As much as they deferred to it, there'd be no way to pour themselves in. They waged in the danger and sniffed in the ribs. Clearly something had happened to them for the sole reason they had stopped bearing themselves as thin. Nearing themselves, they united like two lovers from both sides.

As the attempt to demonstrate that the lawas of the uncanny didn't even come close to fully being represented here while they had been put in their places, now they wondered. Never to grow stronger or from their spots, slowly it had come unto them to stand clear of one another despite being melted on top of their hairs, their skin and the ware. Worn like pieces of predatory wool, they quickly dispersed in both sides, revealing only a hardened line with gaps in it. Judging by those things, they were four sides of the ribs which had almost come down to break. No longer pink would their skin be, but somehow discolored for the veyr fact that they became as encrusted into the dark as they might be. Ending in a shimmer of prized pain, they emerged from themselves, like new-borns, only to remain as enslaved as they once were.

Unable to defer to the other things that made them bare forth and face the fact.

Both Anthony and her had become pantheons, slightly scourged, scouring like two blocks of unaltered mutations. Never walking past the roof, aware that around them, everything was of metal as if the hands that shook between themselves had decided that it was time to go at it again. Through the pain of being accosted, the Magus had become the chief Surgeon, or the stranger, Scientist, or the one performing the experiments as long as he would be pleased of it. He tried to dance, to scowl himself, but in the end, he came out at last to say.

'It's the work of the Opressors, I can see it now.'

He revealed to both of them, from the puckors and the umbilical sprays which shot in their backs and revealed the many whips that entered every side of them, feeding, that his hands had been too twisted. Just like a pair of mightily malformed elephant trunks. From each of them, came another shell-like shark-submerging, long emerging tiny crystal made of cysts. In it there was just enough of that red-flare for smoke to emerge out of him just then. He was feeding on it with the mout-device that came out. From various tubes and grasping crumbs, the bitter circled-out caries carried onto it until it couldn't be wondered. Where had the pain come out from and why hadn't it been stronger? Than the eeling power, the might of woe, he looked at it was as painfully as he could, before ripping them apart. Inside his arms, he revealed colonies of the cysts, which leaped outside, white and luminescent like the people who invented this place before it had fallen to the ones hidden in the dark.

A mind repugnancy came. He wanted to get out of there and do something for himself. Anything would do it, if he found a way to carry it out.

'I will repair you somehow, to that I can promise and if I do.'

He thought it through, without daring to spare. Unable to repair what he had broken out there, just by looking around, he saw the mess which had been left.

‘I was supposed to be a Magus, nothing more.’

But the time to complain couldn’t have been farther than it had been then for the sole reason that neither of them cared. Busily accomodating to this new way of life, they seemed to dilapidate their agony in ways the human kind had never ever thought off.

‘Step out of the Residence.’

He spoke like a disease. Hardly noted, his legs were broken, henceforth he crawled. He would be pissed otherwise, jsut to count on his blessings. Each of them weret los once he crossed past the door, unable to recall where was the last place he had been in. Though his reasearch would continue, he had prised himself on thinking out loud. It was hard to see the trajectory of the deaminging look which carried as it shook itself off the wall. A giant eye moved at the intersection between the wall in front of him and the ceiling. Speeding through it as the blitzkrieg started, it couldn’t have lasted more than a few seconds before he outed himself out. Despite being able to deal with the folk, he had been forced to stand against the queerest of them all. Strange people, tall and wide at their bellies cut enough to reveal that they weren’t entirely sane in the head.

Gluttonous by the looks of it, but that had a purpose. Though they were fat, the extra excess carried a function, for the appliances attached inside their guts couldn’t have worked otherwise, or so it had been known. Thrown int he pits, they would be eaten by the lions. Guardians or not, they bore their masks within the likes of giant flow of bitter eyes, and large encrusted holding cells attached in rows, eight at each side of their necks, like blue vials that carried on liquids inside their brains.

If that hadn’t been enough, one could not even digusise the fact that the various radiators inside their bellies continued their radiation production at a faster rade. Even then, from the various empty, miniatural holes, almost microscopic inside the surfaces against which they were placed against, it was clear. Nothing even neared their kind. Only a blind man or one who was struck dumb wouldn’t realise what was going on. They were clearly being taken over, by the sole fact that their power was drawn from their insidious bodies, living fat batteries, that’s what they were. And neither of them bore any shame about it, for as long as they could somehow be made useful, none of that would matter.

‘Whisper in my ear, son, I want you to check whether or not I’m fine.’

I was the doctor now? First a Magus, then a body inspector, a surgeon and now this? Well, perhaps that hadn’t been as far from where I stood, not to mention that it was only a problem with being misunderstood by the likens. There would only be a cruel woe, the bitter throng, no. Seeing how this wouldn’t go anywhere, the Magus, by name, decided to do so.

But what would I whisper to him? What could it be? Was there even something close to it there? Could they be aware of something going on? Wronged or not they went as strong as they could, giving clues on how to carry this ordeal.

‘Where are thou, my dear?’

And the whisper made him be aware, as if visualising the insides of his head. It was all respresented in from on his eyes, as if he had been a shrunken man, unable to compound what was going out there. He had missed the constituion, and the need to pay attention to anyone else but himself. He had ran out of ideas, as to care of what was going to happen to him if he were to carry on looking for his love. Not for science, but for something much worse. He wanted to devour something out of them, and never feel as if he could be taken away, for the loss of words.

‘Teet for teeth, I can see it now. You were trying to eat a piece of sharpnel-like mollars that found themselves inside your brain. I’m afraid they’re melting now and there’s nothing you could make out of them. Not during this pace.’

Clearly it hadn’t been a race towards discovery, yet he wanted to spend some time alone.’

‘What does that mean, doctor? What can I do about it?’

The bitter-bulk bellied man couldn’t even comprehend the conondrum he was in. Something beyond his knowledge made him walk in through one of the walls, clearly demonstrating the amount of elasticity they diplayed. No longer had they remained whole, by the process through which they were determined to get back home somehow. It would be a matter of swaying and praying for a quick disease. No longer would they be determined to look around for the buzzing-drone like liquids were already being poured into his ear.

‘As long as you continue the grand intake, sooner or later, you ought to be fine. Just remember, never sway and don’t give in to what they say.’

What was that? It felt as if the Magus hadn’t even realised it just then. But he wasn’t the same being any longer. Indeed, he had been a stranger who had lost everything that made him whole. Somewhere in the past, he would’ve wondered at it, or even begged for a chance. A glance even that remained in his mind, just like rough diamonds would if they tried themselves on. Pouting and dancing, he could only see it remain. The pain would only carry on, as for him, only the likes would tell of what was to be gotten off.

Roughened by the collar, he became the other being.

Magus was no Magus any longer, but a poor shell of his very self. A mindless creature who embraced the meaningless role of a servant, never to have carried on as anything but his very damned self. Lost and bout to be retaken, even likely to be mistaken for a fool. A dreadful tool for the likes that would kill anyone else.

‘Good, good, now make sure that I shall not be intruded by the mollar-like pins again. My task is important.’

Spoken like a true grunt who fumbled on himself, unable to tell. Just what was going on around him and what could they tell of the high-spaced and the colors that spoke of the dark? It would be much more impossible to tell, just what the shades amounted to them. But either one could see the writing on the wall. If either had enough guts, they would’ve reported it by now. Damned joke, blasted thing, that it’d be. Vague threats had been closely transposed and left there to rot on their own. Both of them wondered whether or not the Magus knew what they were saying there. Though neither of them could become aware of what was going on, henceforth they chose to carry on the vileness against which they surrounded themselves. No more swaying, the saying would go as well.

From the strangeness of the writings this could be said. You shall all be taken and thrown forth into the dreadful pit where you shall all rot with your ancestors. Indeed, it said something in the likes.

It was a serious case of malnourished events that followed soon after. It was clear that the Magus was completely out of his mind, even to the point where he dreaded to know. Just what would happen if he show them the other side. Right around his ears where he could only feel him now, seconds or minutes before he showed up on his chest as well

As soon as both of the fat guards started going away, he had nothing to say to anyone else. He chose one of the many chambers, as well as they had been, in which a moment had been taken. Forth did he walk, unable to recount where he had went wrong. With all the chemicals he had ingested this had happened.

‘I am Magus.’

‘I am Magus.’

‘No, I am Magus.’

‘That couldn’t be, because I’m the only Magus here.’

Spoken out of some kind of desperation, the lack of a clear analysis fading as soon as it could do, not a single word would be spoke for the sole reason that they were trying to get him then. The entire facial tendon of Magus appeared on the back of his head, on his chest and around both forearms, concealing below the hairs. And each of them were him, the one who came from behind, the blindingly struck surgeon who almost came to fear that he was losing his mind. A clearly defined suture was put in place. Though it had been a painful procedure, he had to make sure that none of them would be able to speak or make too much noise.

‘You dreadful creatures, unless you shut your mouths, I’ll be found out and then.’

The thoughts ran clear. Incarceration, deprecation, complete laceration, or simply he would thrown into the coal office, burning slowly until not a single piece of skin showed either flakes, either the signs that they would carry on again towards spreading like a virus. It was more than clear that they all feared the chance of a spread. With the nature of experiments going as far as to reveal everything going on, they nurtured only the freighter out there. Off the base, it rested in the air, with both engines still going, a chance of plowing through the mass. Not only would it be dangerous to inquire of it, but there was the chance of it going off.

Blowing and exploding because of the lack of a release, for the eon-creatures that stood in. Brooding like erect-angels, which were encrusted in iron, the watchers stood formed. Out of energy-matter which allowed them to carry on and look over it. As the expansion continued, the various materials continued brooding to the point where they couldn't be disgusted any longer of themselves. More than the freighter and the piece of metallic meals that inhabited the place, the living essences appeared to crawl from one place to another.

You could hear them crawling, right beneath their feet. Like tiny puckors, bodies which were ripped like acrons, but bore some bulks on their heads. Sooner or later one would have to notice the fact that most of them had been there ever since the procedure had begun. It would be taken from the mound of slurping, the need to carry on.

'I have returned now.'

Yelled the man who had lost his mind, the Repairman Hortorkorn, who wore alone, the sworn-out pieces of kscheel. It turned half of his body in an immaterial whim of many stranded pucks. Each of them were attempting to stand out and eat him alive. Though he looked as if he wore a grand armor, those were only the para-skeletal solid-streks that entered him instead of waiting. A pier of mild rage entered him then.

You could see it in his eyes, as they started entering his inside clump. From where he stood, he strove towards become stronger, mightier and even surviving what was going through his long-awaited milder approach. He would call himself a lucky man. Despite losing most of his head.

'I have lived and I have helped others and what have I gotten in return?'

They only turned him madder. Despite that, he turned towards the freighter still, in an attempt to mask the fact that he was doing his best still. In order to make sure that no one was walking, he poured a piece of his skull in. Through the cogs, he turned around. And with his snapper, he pushed out the pouring malbor. He drank from it and saw himself grow. It would only expand his life thrice fold and never less. It was a blessing from below, as he was ready to take the chance of one of the other oil cabbins exploding again.

What a mess would that be. No one else would like to see what was going on after.

He had been a man of his word. Watcher-units came near him in order to ask him forth.

'What are you doing here, you mad-man?'

'I'm only trying to create a master-piece in my image, that's all. If the crew will leave one day through the freighter, I want to be remembered for it, as for me, I have a good reason for that as well.'

Not only have I spent a life-time working here but I believe there's nothing waiting for me out there. I only want what's right for me. A chance at happiness, one for me to look forward and hope.'

'Hope for what? Can't you see what you made out of it? The frighter is ruined and it's all your fault.

Because of your so-called repairs, there's nothing left for us to look.'

After one single second he spared nothing but a stop. Closely, looked upon, the electricity started dissipating from his insides, lurking with the broken needles which pulled both of them inside the field. Electrifying just about everything around the area, he took the chance to think about it for a second while he carried on. What was going on in his head? What was the reason for which he was dead?

Just then, Repairman Hortorkorn checked his own pulse. It just ran over him that he couldn't even strike a folding piece out of his veins. What remained out of them now carried on in the veins of never-watching. Something had adapted forth. He pulled some of them away, his veins took out to initiative to convey no pain but the coming of a spot. From it he hit the hose which came from the Freighter, directly inserting the liquid into him before passing out on his back.

'Oh, joy, joy, you make me toy wit fate. If there was only one way for me to be happier, then I'd know.'

He started blabbering again, whilst looking at the sky. Korn didn't expect to see it still. Just in the way it had been prior to the look. Yet he could see and notice everything which went wrong. He still went as strong onto it for as long as he could try placing his back in. A diseased pair, never to have remained there came to his visor. What he observed there were flights, and bitter flights enabled by diseased animals that could never be. Seen by themselves, just look away, it was a matter of trying to pass on for the past and what it had conveyed.

A fight had transpired somewhere in the distance. For the entirety of time he spend there, in the enclosed area, he began hallucinating of space. Though he couldn't be pleased by what he was seeing in it, he swore. And he swore to it, just then.

'I see now, that's what ought to have happened then.'

Through some sort of cataclysmic event which poured itself ever-after, once it had crept from the outside, back inside his mind, he rose. Back on his feet, missing something from himself, looking into it, he found it. Painfully taking it away, he conveyed nothing but a morose feeling of ingratitude for the bottle he found in himself. It was some kind of brandy which shouldn't have found its way in him. But that aside, he opened it and drank, as a man should know better, he saw her. Just as if he had been struck by a spell, he saw the most beautiful woman his eyes could ever lay themselves upon. With her blonde hair and perfectly light complexion, he felt as if there would be no bother for the death of his mind.

In as much of a wonder, there was a crueller stance he could taken, surrounded by the agony which came after, as the image pulled him in.

'You, you just came here, haven't you?'

‘I have just arrived, I supposed, but where am I?’

Korn looked at this chaotic spin, which turned from having two mountainous bodies embracing themselves like lovers, a detail which couldn’t be forgotten or avoided any longer, to a mass of buildings that were placed in the distance, cities that shouldn’t be, and various statues of the man he was standing in front of him. What was much worse, would be this. Finally one of his ideas turned to piss-poor, rather ankle. He turned the seas around, and each rain and pool about him into the strongest liquorish-wine.

Though he dared not taste it, for obvious reasons.

For a man like him, there was something unnerving about this place. It wasn’t completely silent, but it appeared that in the distance, he could hear the various echoes of thunder which stroke the walls. Not only would this be incomplete but disturbing and disgusting as well. He couldn’t tell just what went wrong. He wasn’t strong enough to feel the musk. A disturbing lust surrounded him mind as he inquired.

‘What’s in the pools?’

‘Aleksey.’

‘What’s in the pools, Aleksey?’

‘Wouldn’t you like to follow me and take a dip? Needn’t take clothes off, I think it’s fine. Pool is warm, there shouldn’t be any problem with you taking only a leap about the place.’

He had a smile unlike that of a brother. He hid something, like I couldn’t see them yet. Was this place filled once? If there was something, I saw the trap. Many foot-pads lay strapped just about every spot. Lost to the tracks, many of which were lost to the point where nothing could be sustained again. The pain of a loss would be taken away once I saw it. Clearer but not entirely so, at the bottom of the first red pool,

I saw the bottom of it, at the ends of a fool’s end, many bodies stood clear, just like that of the dame I saw. Who was she and what happened to her then?

I wish I knew, I wish I could explain it there. But so far, it had been hopeless for the same reason I carried on with. Even though I couldn’t point it out, he had me walking on my toes.

‘How have you brought me here to begin with?’

‘I brought you with a little trick. Listen. If you don’t want to take a dip in pool of cherries, let us go through one of the homes and we’ll speak inside during dinner.’

‘Fine, fine.’

He raised an eyebrow as he heard me say, I was content with following him, yet I couldn’t even strike a cord, as I was badly injured around the throat. He has me walking on pieces of jars. And yet he’s waiting.

‘I’m Korn, my name is Korn.’

At last he allowed me to walk forth and do as he pleases. So much so that I would even get to the point where I desired a break. Let me get away from him. This man has me cornered, I am not allowed to leave his place. He was a brute, who took the first opportunity he could and ripped the door apart.

It was clear that he was destined to be killed by him. For some grand reason he knew it. Splattered on the walls, destroyed, crushed teeth and bones, waiting for the heat to shimmer while he couldn't push no longer. All that halting around made him increase the pain he wanted to carry on with. He was asked to sit at a table and not say a word. Going as much as to complain about the way in which they painted all of them with the lack of colors he had wanted to, now he joined me. Sitting across the table, now he decided to breathe in without concern, dizzied even, after drinking a puddle he had brought with him inside. His hands kept it from pouring out. If there was anything, it was this.

One thing he hadn't been concerned by. Me escaping as I hadn't seen a way out either. If there was one, it could be encrusted in this wild dimension which appeared to be falling upon itself at time.

'I'd like to know why you're here, all right?'

Only that? Could that mean that I might even be allowed to leave? He assured me that there was nothing else he looked out of it. No questions asked, nothing unfair, just a pair of questions, like a partizan would ask of his lower. Not to add too much to it. He was a bit rude, getting ruder at that. After the first few drink he had already stammered and that was far before he ripped out the the boards below the table to reveal the inner-bone structure of the building, which he had used for his hiding. More bottles, more wine, more than a normal man should be able to drink in a run.

Was he sick? Or was I?

Because I was certainly getting to that point, after seeing the objects turning out in the bottles, carefully preserved just like the rest of them which had been scourged in this wretched place.

'I used to care about my Dina, you know? At first, when I had been promised to her. Perhaps you might not believe this, a man like me, who could have just about any woman he wanted. I could've had her, if it weren't for a mistake.

But, I suppose I have done too much wrong along the way to continue, you know? She's definitely not the only one who had been given this treatment whence I could only think of myself now.'

‘What did you do to that poor woman?’

Korn could almost taste her, despite Aleksey not having poured anything in their glasses yet. First the food, brought to them from someone who shook him at the very first sight. He was tall and lanky, unable to find himself into any other position than whence he stood away from them. His arms were only as long as they needed but the rest of his body receded in his legs. Everything was included in them, as much as the meat could possibly extend and push itself past the level where it was uncomfortable for it to live. From the bulking mass, the arms spread and brought us the meat, the bread, the turkey and the drinks.

We were offered even more with that, something which had been prepared. I dared not drink it yet, as I wondered still. Was she in them as well? I couldn’t see any left-overs, but I could freshly feel it going. For the obvious reason, I felt as if there wasn’t any other way. If she had been soaked in it, so be it. I had to feel it nonetheless. Somehow, I had the chance to mentally prepare myself, to repair what was wrong in my head. Acceptance would even come, even at the foilage of a single mound, the taste would be done.

‘It’s not that bad.’

I said at last. Regardless of what this drink had been made out of, I could still recognise the masterful way in which it had been procured. Even the scent made me lower my guard for a moment, before I felt done.

Another chance, give me another chance to try again. I thought to myself, I wouldn’t be given it again.

For some reason, there was this expectation to give my compliments.

‘A fine wine.’

And a toast, we drank to it, sip after sip before the main course. My will was going to the kind, which was left to swerve into the freighter as I was trying to look out for myself. Would they miss me? What if there was a problem there? Could I even ask of him if there’s the chance?

‘When might I be allowed to leave?’

‘Not now.’

That was as much as I was able to take away from him, I was stuck now, like a fiend. Trying to count the seconds, to look for any kind of clock, just who was he waiting for? For, this Aleksey kept staring and turning towards the door. Trying to see whether or not someone might endure his company. Keep the ring off. It was painful, all of the sudden, again, it turned out loud. A vargrant noise found its way there. For some reason, it was there instead of anywhere else. It felt like the clicking of words, the working of a typewriter that kept trying to discover the end of the codes. Another day passed in the factory, as much as it would displease a lot of people to drag them on, now it was the time to keep on typing as the languages started welding on, getting closer to finding out. Even if it were for a single letter to be found again, they would do it.

And they would do it right this time around. Despite the many close calls that appeared to near their very peculiar ends, this time, perfection could almost be achieved. Not to be deceived by the strange markings on the walls that appeared. It was dangerous to go off-script. For the sole reason that he couldn't expect to be called back, yet this time around, realising something he should've thought off prior to their interception, he wrote down his name. Four t's had been worn down, something which might as well be interpreted as just about anything in their irregular languages, all of them being mixed.

Day-off, day-in. He walked towards the tram, back into the separate areas. He couldn't even fathom encountering the bland-men. Those were to be avoided at all costs. Even approaching them was dangerous. They could be found in each of the tram section, seemingly unspoken, unless. Unless, and he had to keep this in mind for himself, there was an exception. Each time he had approached one of them, he would hear the inward scream of a million cries in different languages which were crying not to be forgotten. Despite all the mixes, these were pure. And all of them begged in the utmost clearest complexion they could achieve, not to be forgotten or pushed through the million destinations that could be called off. Nothing but agony had been brought up to the poor man who angered the Bland-men.

And of course Pyrhishonkyi-Ungo would be just another name that could be used for it. Different intervals of people brought even more pronunciation until nothing would be even remotely distinguishable from the normal. Through and through which each passer, a meaning would be lost. Words would be traded and mixed without them knowing until then again, the process would move on and start again. Bothersome at times and even morose, they were trying not to push it too far. It was understood, as close as they would that even the slightest mistake, the wrongest point would force them to grab one of the young ones from their mothers. That process alone was still misunderstood for some reason. No one dared acknowledge it, or they couldn't express it, by the same means.

Danger still existed, yet the barriers increased.

For what had to be drawn from it was the very fact that every now and then, the sections would be spared and twisted, remotely colored just so they could mix the pain of misunderstanding. Scholars would get lost at once, as soon as they were met by another class. When one received the wrong colors, he got missappropriated in another quarter that didn't seem to matter to them. It was much worse outside, once the whole change was done, the pollution continued and none could stop it. As the fumes started giving in, some were pointing, others lined up and never brought it back into their minds. Since there wasn't any other reminder, since there wasn't any explanation for it, they simply assumed that was the way things were meant to be. Meaning was loss on those foolish trespassers who couldn't even help it any longer. It was deemed uncanny. Now and after a while, some could even mildly cope with the desintegration of hope that emerged from them. Lost between themselves, please, oh please, coping mechanisms. Instilled into them by the need to make it all stop, some young folk who didn't understand one another reverted to the only think they knew. An intake of illegal materials which had only been revealed through a few magnified illustrations in the large glass dome-boxes, and only through them might one be made aware of the illegality which was there. For the murders and thefts were impossible, as there was a strict incarceration module done by the appearing pieces of metallic star which would instantly blow their heads off by various means. Appearing in their knotted necks for no apparent reason.

Some would say there was no crime. But whom amongst their group was there to hear or understand them if problem did arise? And some of the mutt-languages died that way or got absorbed. Bringing forth even more trouble as they all based the knowledge, finally, what had been waited for.

In the visual language, which had come up to the point where it had become a religion for them. Something embeded into faith, something on whcih they had not only become addicted to, but to which they couldn't stop and think. Or wink at the concept of knowledge or of mental-pain. Hoops could be taken or lost, until the cost of information came at risk.

As the youth and gangs would follow about the holographic apparitions which made the place appear lively again. Placed on top of rusty-walls, there were images from the lost and departed, the joyful plays they had. Virtual appliances which were there to be truly touched, for them to mess with, and never care about the others. Where skill only mattered and phrases would be used by fools, none the matter as they had twisted their understanding of forms to the point where their minds had been absorbed by the most benign abstract forms. A normal man would spit at this, with the sole reason that understanding this would prove to bring him nothing of value.

Only pity remained as the older generations looked at the youth who wasted in vain. Most of the others never even complained about it, nor were they at a loss. So many clueless people brought themselves to the edge of giving up on hope, for the sole reason that no one spoke to them. Farther from the flashy pain, in a spot, somewhere lost, they rested. Unable to speak any longer, as they were bested far too many times out there in the plain fields, against much more skilled players, they left in search for something else. In the end, they found nothing else to look after. And it was no problem which stemmed from the overpopulation, yet the inability they showed for understanding one another's woes.

It made one wonder how they moved around. With everything going by them, there was time to cross around their necks. Bearing the crude, as if they had never been shaken off, it was only now that they cared to complain about their surroundings. Though only in their minds, their souls had been taken off and into the pile they had been thrown around.

'I may dare say, there's no way I this plan of yours shall account for anything.'

At best he confessed that it would be cruel for him to assume there was another chamber standing there.

In as much as of a wonder, they grew much wrong and started carrying on their own.

From their backs, a pull came, which pushed and dreaded them as much as they fell.

I saw one of them one, twenty feet away from his other side. It was hardly a match to pit him against what he had lost. No one liked mentioning it afterwards. But they heard it then. It only took a word they shared, even there, even though no one understood the baffling mountains that were never understood nor cared for. Each of them at least tried it, once. But after so many failures, it felt as if it wouldn't matter any longer. Too many failures never accommodated anyone, and it was time for most to quit living.

It wasn't indecent, nor attempted.

His head was also stamped off, tramped off his neck. He wailed for a moment then.

"Ungorrrrr."

A man yelled. Time had come to dine. Look around you fools, he spoke, as he came back to lead the gang.

To his mind, the mood had changed. Despite not being as deranged as the other he took the opportunity for a quick stab at the gut of rage. You could hear an incombustible stifled shout inside the Residence. Not to give up on all the fleeing thoughts now. Only a piece of his mind had remained. His heart couldn't be trumped again, as the one revelation pierced through him. Don't look again at him. It would pain him to do it for too long. Over a period of time too many fractures could be accumulated in the brain, a dreadful agony being stolen to his side.

For that one moment, through the cross-breed of minds, Grubb started walking on. Through the body shared between him and BOD, it was clear that they didn't mean to succumb to the stone. And as he came, there was one pain which pushed him in the evening light. Less than a blightful touch would make him realise what was going on there.

A floor akin to mustard-gas, alike to it in everything one would have to look out for. No other claim would last, there was this one break he would be allowed to uphold.

'Behold at what I have done.'

For a moment there, when they could see nothing else but the strange sky-boxed air, and the mollusk-yellow floor, he wasted no moment to look at him.

Made out of one long headed-body which had been endowned, it looked out with no other desire than it had been about him. It could last no more than a few minutes then, as simply observing him was painful.

Levitating but slightly touching the ground, from his side there came the hairs reflecting the shadowy gown of pristine ink, dazzling like form of bleak oils coming from the metallic sink that poured it from on top the headmost area through which it came. Nothing remained encrusted from each span of its large planar coughers.

And after each cough, a sentipede-like being came out, bearing insecticide bulbs between each large insect which had been ranged across it as it drew on. From each pinned pluckor-tumor, one eye remained in the belt. It was human, some would call it. Yet purple seemed to bear his grains instilled. Broth for the mind, make sure that you're aware of the lack of mindedness creeping on. He had pulled from the back, a minotaur-like skeletal structure which filled itself like an inflating pulmonary across that stopped. Inside a largely cut piece of its back which opened, Grubb saw the endless reserves of giant-growing belts that continued growing without a stop. If this fiend was to be obiletered yet a piece of it would survive, the world might be filled with the belts, giant promulgations that could only be killed by the bulbs which continued to break in.

Time after time until it couldn't be decided any longer what was right, and who gave in the fight with it. Enormous blobs of eye-like sub-stratta liquids appeared only when they had been needed. For a moment there, it appeared like they had been breded for this scope alone. Watch it hone itself as it carried on. A pain upon any other came from the fact that it couldn't feed itself. But why? Could you not see it now?

Judging by the looks of the frothing mouth, from which the pus-rabies, fungi gravy came out, some solidified mouth cage kept it from bloody talking its way out of it.

It all made sense now. Just as it popped into existence, they key to creation had always been the rage, the preservation of that hatred which drove everything back to itself before it would submerge into the dreadful quiet. A few more reason to spare it, before it could go away.

They would spare him no other reason to be there, the others that is. As they appeared, they presented themselves as nothing more than members of the same species. Introverted creatures who called themselves the Triags, as an utmost unnecessary pile of pulmonary ships came from above, picking them one by one, it couldn't be belived that this place would be clean any longer. Why, it could only be wildly accepted that this place was highly destroyed.

From the distance, a sight emerged and Grub saw it come forth, expanding like a blowing thick which released all of its hosts' essence atop the sky-line. Where the clouds went it, a grim sight seemed to be the only thing that emerged. A loss for all could be called now. Look at it and follow through. See and smell the sinew from its back. Not only was it revealed that the box they were in was flatter, but there were many other things that appeared to be wider. Bringing back some kind of mind-seering torment that started leaping from the hole, fully-grown men who had still been attached to the heir-umbilical appendages which attached themselves from the magnificent birthier jumped out. And during their fall, in that ever-flashing light of red, which looked like a small office in which it stood forth, leaping ahead from one spot to another, he smiled.

Not only that but he grinned, revealing the missing mollars from which the infection, the insertion had emerged. Taken directly from his mouth, the drones would carry out the passage through the million chambers. Despite their secret not being out, all of them could move around as distantly as they could. Not only would they continue that way, but there would only be a tormented agony left to pay for what was going there. Nowhere else could one admire this strange abolition of life.

Judgement had begun as soon as they had started leaping away from their faithless creator. He who had been demented, called as the mutated two lumps which straddles upon one another. A head laying farther in the large belly from which it came. Many other fillaments of tubes pushed on until nothing else could be gained from this transaction of death. As it happened, now, all of the men who had been thrown around had been nothing but the ones stored in. Fed as the mother-clay inside of him appeared to give in because of failure. Its other organs seemed to fall as well. You couldn't tell just by looking at him now, but this genetic abomination still winced. It was in pain and at the same time it would remain there, nothing in its arms.

Least of all, the desire remained. It couldn't be compelled yet.

'Siskelot, where are you? What have you done to my dearly dear ones and where have you hidden before this had come to pass?'

But Grubb and Bod didn't care about it as much as the dissinegrating figures which almost emerged from inside the dreadful fiends that manifessted in front of them there. As the Manifold beasts were busying themselves while taking care of their belts, these figures that may not be described came to be alive. Dark and shadowy, touched and unnerving, both of those who observed them had been entirely wrong. Just by looking at it, neither of them could understand just what went wrong there and why it came for them to quickly spoil themselves as they flattened on the ground.

All of the figures formed a circle with their legs and just then it happened for them to observe that they were nowhere to be approached. Dangerously submerging into the mustard floor, it forced the solid into gas. Everyone fell into the sea of yellow-musk.

'Disorder, disoder, disorder is here.'

What now?

'We have to split up for the time being, while we swim.'

'But how do you intend on doing it?'

Grub hadn't explained it entirely, yet he had found a way to exploit all of the bodily functions in ways not even he knew about. It was hard, but entirely feasible, only to approach it from this point of view. A shower of gourmet came from the acidic regions froming the cells which held their body in one piece. Though this separation couldn't be entirely depicted just yet, it would be more likely for them to separate themselves through death.

As the rip began, the entire reality had almost come to be broken again, as the entire form, from inside and dawning below them had been a the sky, which exhasperately threw itself everywhere around.

Without a single way of being, or of thawing, being dread. It looked like a pair of blocky wheat-fluoerescent flying flying pruned scoffels came from inside their hidden dens only with the sole reason that they would block everything in place. Like statues in a frozen land, sculptures of ice they stood. Yet none could fall or move away, as the eyes prayed upon them. Many and colored in more shades than the human eye could perceive, you could only be deceived by the pain. It would rain with the bloody vein of blue from atop the hueless spot inside this tinted place.

A race had emerged a few minutes ago and now they would be preserve with no other hope or reason. It was hard then. Only because of a strange allingment which almost caused the chemicals from inside this stranded triangular-rhombus-crested cage to imitate the nuclear properties which would've sent them to that space. Where everything would be copied in time, never to be allowed to die. Had this not been dangerous enough on its own?

Would they even be abandoned if they wanted to come forth and admit that they were never to be caught or defeated again?

But it was late and unsanitary, just in the way both BOD and the Grub had been completely lacerated in the middle. It didn't matter for them that they had plunged between one another, never to have been caught again. Pain would only be a small factor in this. Meaning only that there could be no peace between them as they split. They managed to do it just in time before everything fore in place. Just to make sure he wouldn't get off that easily, never to be caught again. In an admonition of pain and agony, there was only victory and defeat.

Either of them could achieve it not, especially since this pocket in which they ended up being had been a place of wonder. Made with the sole hope that they might beat Siskelot and find a good replacement. Time was being beaten in place and neither of them could fight forever. Even if there was a chance, as little as one could hope to take it head one, they all feared for their lives. Despising one another as they were unable to take their lives any longer.

'How have we gotten here?'

Asked BOD, thinking of where he had been previously. It couldn't have been that he was in as great a mood as one could be. It was him not only unhappy, but he had realised that there was only one way out.
By waiting there for a solution to come, for a problem he had even caused in the first place.

Their palace of gibberish emerged.

'So call on your masters, the Blot, the Clot, even the champion Siskelot, whomever else you want. I have no care any longer, in the world. I hope you will all rot and be abandoned before you get the chance to get yourselves upfront.'

Despite the outrage, there were far too many things to account for. No longer were their minds united for the sole reason that they didn't want to deal with one another. It couldn't be accounted for, so many things were at a loss. Everyone was trying to out-do each other without giving in as much.

Perhaps a cut would do there, as they waited for the slightest chance to occur. Despite the minister's dancing and the stance of the curls, it couldn't be taken into consideration any longer. Too many tumor plains emerged, spreading in the air like fluttering gusts. Of course they wouldn't afflict anyone with themselves, over the fact that they were prevented from doing it one and one before the supper.

'We'll be late.'

'Late for what, my dear one?'

'I can sense Siskleot, he's somewhere enclosed.'

In a suit, of course, down the drain from below the nuclear plains, through the levels, down from the blocs, in the spot where they harvested humanity for their own purposes at last. He was there, in the one ship that was in the wrong place. Without an explanation that might remain, they could do nothing but endure the mildew. Unsuspecting of an intruder, they were only counting on something else. 'Where had he gone now? I swear, the one old-suited unit we have come into contact with and he already took off.'

Oh they had no idea, none that mattered, not after this manner of talking any further in. It could be brought back, only when it appeared to suit them still. They weren't thinking clear, despite being part-machines themselves. The ones who came after, who even took them serious after that?

'I will take this moment to make bow.'

'You would take a bow? For whom would that be?'

'For whom else but I? The lord of loud despair, miss a second and I won't be there.'

He only needed as much as he could take. With everything considered, looking around for a prospect to escape hadn't left either of them with any chance to make a run out of it. Inclined to it, they seemed to wretch. Somewhere out there, that scum champion made his way through the crowds, in the masses, losing himself despite the various engulfing features that could clearly be distinguished from the others. It was as strange as it seemed. A mystery, as well, that the champion found a disguise, held against his massive frame. A derangement which remained with him even after he started speaking, not only would be baffled by his own intonations but he would be damned if there was a chance he would let go of him. A special specimen which had been struck between being human and being drawn into the inter-dimensional hell-tunnel that had crept in one of the parasitical-stars from the other universe. Shame couldn't even account for what was going on in his mind. Too many losses, his mind thought, cut them off.

'Out of my way, step way, you get off here, and you as well.'

He continued pushing everyone away with no disgrace whatsoever. Again, it would take a lot to anger him. And though it had to be preserved by whatever means possible, this was to be the chance. Only a couple of meters forth and you could get him now. Just make it through. Though he thought of the plainness of sinew which might make him happy in the chaos, as for the reason for it was all to clear. Attempting to get through the crowd took too much time and it was also dangerous, especially since they might scare or trample him away. They would observe, they had to, the unnatural height, the strangely mechanically placed limbs on him which didn't belong to him physiologically. It would just happen for him to get eighteen times more aggressive than he would've normally been. For what reason? That could only be clear now, he wanted to grab him and run over them, blaspheming as many humans as possible as his disguise faded in the air, it couldn't be forgiven otherwise, he was the one he's chosen. He was the one ready to be sent to the chamber.

'I'll have you now!'

It was only a half-yell, not to tell anyone about his intake. While sprinting like a giant tormenting arrow, he began slashing and cutting everyone in his path. No one was safe from his foaming mouths, popping from every side. He fed on them as he lunged, completely obliterating their masses of meat as if they weren't there at all. Such power couldn't be understood at all, the force involved was of a magnitude that far surpasses that of their strongest tools. Should it be noted then that they ran away? Did it matter now that he had him surrounded in his claws?

But after a close inspection, he noticed the dud.

'Blasphemy, you tainted scar on my fingers, who sent you here to begin with?'

It was unnatural and unnecessary to believe that it was happening to him. But he started slowly slouching around his face, the creature he had taken started melting with the only marks being left in forms that were highly benign to either one of the touches. And to top that, it had the impudence to laugh at it. 'Shut yer mouth, damned dud. I should've known that I would be tricked in the most cowardly manner. I should've expected in ten times fold.'

He hadn't been able to govern over himself, not anymore. For every hunt that came after turned him into a savage. Despite being the champion, for the most obscure reasons, there was that, the means of his arrival which made him so mad. Tainted in the head, his feelings couldn't be controlled any longer, giving in to the dread of being soon replaced.

If I were to fail, they would bring another one. And what of the disgrace, to be the champion of Clot, stamped out in order to bring another? It was a shame unlike anything else. To that, he would even have taken the cowardly way out if it meant saving some honor. Of course, not until he had visited an old friend of his, the Grub, and the other one who had just arrived and appeared to have assisted him in the process he couldn't even get a lead on. Damn him, for he could remember entering the damned train. Going through its wagons until he had met him trapped in his chair. There, he had the possibility to end him as quickly as he could. Despite the obvious hesitation, which shook him more than he could point it out, he still wanted to do it.

Ill and about the place, he started chasing randomly, as a disgrace of a fighter would. A beast without leashes, trying to get a hold of them, no longer being chained by his master who allowed him free reign.

A reason for it and one for this, as most of his victims hadn't entirely died, instead they tried becoming structures of detection. From inside of them you could see no red, but a color of yellowish pus that appeared to cover everything until they formed their satellite-pyres, producing the pores that flew into the air, trying to detect any essence that might make its way towards the closest chosen lyre. Someone had to do, his sould would be trapped and twisted, ruined even if the chances were alligned.

No one could even believe that a soul had been destroyed inside the chamber. And a good reason at that as well, to the point where they had dispatched the two-fat guards, masked just like they had been before. Longer than it had taken them to get here, it came clear that they gave in to the whorish lepers that threw themselves at them. Only to be caught between their giants palms, heads squashed until they couldn't breathe at last. It was chaotic at the heart, as the buildings started cropping themselves out. It should come as no surprise any longer, that they waited for the wails to become much stronger. Someone was coming here as well. A part of the sky was turning gray, then blue, then dark again until the three of them realised where they had been taken to.

For what was worth, noises weren't deserved for the sleepers. For that treason continued for the time being. Without being aware of it, until it had been too late, thre champion of Clot and the two guards had been taken into the city of Carrions. Who, they themselves seemed not concerned at all with what was going on. Despite the queerness of the folk that appeared, not a single one neared them. It would not be accepted at all. With all the pains they had gone through in order to get as quickly away as they could, they pained themselves with waiting, sniffing as their broken ears. Most importantly, you could see one of them in the distance, trying to move away.

Just by his tormented stance, you could see the fact that he had lost something about his glance. Two eyes strolled along, and a body fell as if it had been made out of shattered marble, falling to the acid pit of old. It appeared like the others had been saddened by this turn of events. Even though the mourning would be short-lived for the time being, even to the point where they had been taken aback by the pains which brought their pains, their actions had been misguided as soon as the screens began the general announcement.

'Citizens, we have grave news that you are in need to be made aware of. All of you are in grave danger, from which neither of you may be able to fully escape. This escapade of evil needs not be hidden for your own sake and that of the others that are either hiding or lay out there expose.

Immediate danger lays outside your homes for a second time and to that, let it be known. You are to immediately commence and flee towards your homes for the sake of yours lives. Otherwise, they might not only be forfeit but you may be forced to a state that might be worse than death. Beware of the following physical characteristics from which you should not approach in vile a thought or with a need to befriend, as if you should be made aware of it after the first glance.'

He announcement went on to thoroughly describe what we looked like. To my understanding alone, this wasn't like anything we had even known, but they appeared to completely create replicas inside their minds. We could see them extend from their skulls, like tiny pieces of scalps that had somehow morphed into us to the point where it couldn't be doubted that pieces of us had been completely recreated inside their brains to an utmost molecular matter. Though this was nothing to be hoped for at first, they began turning. Carrions who were on the street, stranded, had taken the initiative to run. Despite that, I had no desire to begin the chase. Looking around and feeling how everything started falling on itself, there would be enough time to check everything for as long as there would be.

Yet not even Siskelot knew what he had been against. Everywhere around him, an aura of dread stretched to the point where it had vaguely encompassed the sky. It was to die for in that moment where no one seemed to spread away. But in that tumorous-wave which began creating ripples in the sky, he could see the shades and the faces of those who had been previously tormented before him. Why, this had been only a supreme sign of vileness for the taking. Not even he could see nor understand what was going on there. It was a queer-lap done by the heads of Carrion-deads and the Sparrow-heads which turned on each other, eating, fighting even in death. Too many have been dragged out there only to be struck by the pulsating moments when the others didn't even care about them. And from their mouths and eyes, though flat they were, in the form of gas, they glowed with various colors, ranging from blue to green and distant shades that didn't even show each other as they passed through the maze of the loss. At which cost would they be allowed to sin?

What was it now with him?

Champion of Clot, who seemed vile and wyld, now came to show his form at last. He had been much taller, wilder and his body looked like a forest of wild trenches, spiked roses and other outlandish-formed parts that didn't belong anatomically right. They were fit together by giant chords which pushed from the chest and from his face, giving the general appearance to some dreaded reptile-square. Longer than it should've been allowed for him to continue spreading, there had been a pair of slits around the head, heated as they were, thawing the surroundings, blotched of violent red blotched started pushing out of them, as they had from the tips of the giant spines coming out of him.

With every leap to another world, he appeared to change even more. Violently so, shaped in the name of his lord, this time he looked even more vulgar. It wasn't always like this, he had been more of a scoundrel which mutated, to the point where he couldn't dissappoint in fear. Fright had nothing to do with it as the scales started giving out and his head turned into that of a much-malformed Carrion, just to fit the robe of the place. Dark featherless acesses appeared around his body, which had still been clothed. Let it be known, that he felt the same curse as they had, being subject to the same kind of rules and pains as the others had taken with them.

They had sprawled away too many times. Each of them took turns in order to gnaw at each other's blinding remarks. As soon as they met, they had been indebted with looking ahead. He was much likely to proceed into the nearest hole and cry himself to the loss. He appeared to be the Vanguard, the one who lay without hope, like someone brought to the headsman's gaze.

Whatever had remained of him, no one could say. Look a while, listen to them sing. It would make him peculiar now. Just by the way he acted. Like a sludge-golem he crawled towards the nastiest place, the deathless gaze which looked him back was that of the most abominable creature that might stall for him. If there was something it wanted, let the waste be made known. A shot, a shot, that's what it called from him. Despite there being no indication that he had the stuff on him, he still wanted it. 'Can't you see that I'm begging you? I'm on my knees, I need a shot, something that could put me back into my place, that's just about everything I could give in for.'

This nasty bird inked-bloated around its curls bore no feathers. Of course he had to stand out against them. Being the only one with the key-defining features meant that he had no chance to be inconspicuous at all. With everything going on around him, there was only that reappropriation of disease. He hadn't been pleased by any of the others who gathered around him, trying like bums. Hicks that were practically ruining themselves with each passing moment because they couldn't handle living in the way they had. No longer quaint, the scuffle remained as they surrounded him. Still, no intention came to him, yet. He knew that the two fat ones hadn't followed him, they shouldn't.

Had they realised it sooner, who he was or what he was, perhaps he would've considered sparing them. Though for the time being, none of that would be expected at all. Instead, they would have to deal with him. In the fully-grown blotch of blood, which made him even viler than he had been before. Brought now in front of them, they could spare not a single second before they made their best to run.

Nearest ones had it worst, or was it better? It was hard to judge. For the first strike hit like a nuclear bomb, devastating just about everything about their bodies, until they couldn't be recognised any longer. Harder though it may be to tell, there had to be a reason for their instant vaporisation which took their pain away. No longer could they convey the pain or the agony which had been shown. Stranded in the moisture, they were reeling in without reason. This was made, or it was sad. A pathetic sight ensued as soon as the Carrion low-lives that had ran quickly returned to the spot where the others had died. Might I add that they returned while I was still there?

It felt as if my presence had been completely ignored for the sole reason that their addiction didn't allow them a moment of stillness. Not only could it not be heard, but the madness had only begun. They all started sniffing the dust made out of their coal-ashen bodies on the ground. Had it always been this way?

What of the unsanitary way in which they all played with the sum of dread they spread around?

Afore mentioned now, there was no reason to stand any longer and I took my leave. I knew where to find them. I could see it in their eyes. Neither of them would remember me at all, nor would they heed a chance to backstab me if there if chance did indeed arise. Much clearer than that, it had been brought to my attention that there was one quick detail that penetrated my mind. Walking past curtain-blinds, in a twisted town that never gave me a single think to look forward to made me realise that I had taken a pleasure in hunting.

Even though I had only been given the bottom of the barrel to pray on, from time to time I would receive a treat. There he came. None of it remained after the first few seconds of its manifestation, as much as it could be decided, it felt as if it was in pain. Through the long body erected the pincer-like giant wing-bulb in the back, domed and enclosed, which kept the chest in front of him exposed. No features, only small eyes just everywhere around and from the peculiar pink expansion, there came the tiny spear-like primers that started infesting the land below us.

I could see the gritty dark turn into something close to human chewing-gum. But the gloomy thing about it started being aroused by its own presence. Nothing could be counted in any longer, for the taking. He had been touched by the unappealing sight in more than one way. Could it be now?

It was dangling on the mass of pink clup he had made. From as many perilous bark-inducing mildews that started robbing themselves of the brith, his action almost culminated into charging in. They were his, both of them, as it happened for the second one to pop from his back. You could feed the white hairs start puffing in. Enclosed in their grasps, they formed a shield of hair that spread as far as their pinkish, flabby substance lair.

Siskelot stopped just in time, unnerved by the fact that he almost fell into the substance.

Closely he strayed way from the dark corner near the abandoned Hodge he found himself near and waited. Stalking like a hunter, deeply caught in a remorseless waiting. Just what would their encounter culminate in?

For the sole reason in which he spared himself only a good reason remained. He could only hope that there were a few clusters that could grab his view. For that sole moment he tried catching his breathe whilst waiting for it to make as much as a single movement instead of trying to grasp and fade into the obscure nature of this place. Otherwise, to put it bluntly, there was no other way to push himself through. Without the proper terms, and without a need to look away from it, he chose this path of laceration. He scarred himself in the dark in order to properly taunted the creature any time he had the chance. Otherwise he couldn't hope to hold his ground any longer. It wouldn't do at all to grope for anything as far as ten feet forward. It was clear, they would start drawing near him only by their own power, without questioning what was going on. From around the masks, they release only the fluttering sparkle-like capules that parasitically began eating the oxygen again. And inside of them, though it only happened at a slight and inward molecular level, an unnatural reaction had come.

Expunged from inside of them, clusters of carbon began spreading with the strongest concentration they could give themselves in. Something was still missing for the sole reason that there wasn't a way out. Brought about a fruitless hope, they started giving it themselves until they started pushing on and taking in their fist shells. Like blueberry pocks, they appeared at last. No longer would they try implying that they were dying without giving in the engulfance of dread. As the modified carbon reached a volatile level that not even they could contain, then came the first explosions. Though they were short-lived, and mainly and completely forced into small points from which nothing came into the knowledge off, there came the receding prowess they could carry on.

Small pieces of the nearest walls finally came into view, as soon as they would be allowed to scarrow through, then and only they would they be allowed to near woe. Better pleasing this wouldn't be the case. It was important to note of the lack of empathy they showed. Even then when they've been stranded for the reasons that were matched, eyes were looking dumbfounded for the sole reason that was still not caught.

'Come on now, take a few more steps. I'll make sure that neither of you will be able to carry on with those things inside your jaws.'

From inside the pink substance, though it had been nighly covered in hair, it was enough to carry on with the sole reason of pain. It was indeed a sign of pure agony, just allowing their jaws to stand open without giving in. As for what was going on with them, no one in the adjacent area seemed to care. Siskelot was boiling with the mere anticipation which had taken him to that point. Without it, there'd be no other hope for another contact to be established from the spot they moved on. So many breaks had been taken in the neck. One couldn't look past the masses without realising that they were all dead from standing. A few Carrions had arrived that way, never conveying any emotion as they dropped from where they stopped.

Fruitless as it had been, agony carried on.

From their chests, the jaws, which had been ridiculously over-drawn ahead couldn't handle the pressure of its own weight, instead picking itself up until it couldn't be taken past the point where it had crept in. Look at the bodies of disease, and you'll understand why is it that they pleased themselves for countless moments, this had only been their chance to rise. From the markless wonders inside of them, they revealed why they had come. It was clear to him, even before they showed their true allegiance, that they had been brought for him.

Nothing could've sinned as much as he had in the carnage that followed through. He would be indebted to the lord of Clot, for what had been brought to him was his snymol, a pocket of blood. Pure and undefined, solidified only in part as it continued going past the need to carry on, it carried on now. Chunks of it started appearing in the air. Manifesting like tiny spheres from a giant arms which had been stung of stabbed, a needle or a saw. Around them clustered the exploding flying fiends who managed to create a pseudo-rain of bloody remains. Nothing would serve them ever again. Nor could one wonder after that, just what had caused all this pain to begin with? If not for the concession that they were being followed, they could suffer ever after until their spines collapsed and from pain relapsed the dreadful generation that came after.

Clearly only a chance remained, for him to carry on again with only one hopeless strike. Though it had not been entirely directed to either of them, not one could make this mistake and push them away. As he had spread his wings, or armed strings of feathers, throwing them forth in order to flutter them in hopes of swaying the little pests towards their comers. A cackle-boast, which came forth to roast their bones immediately followed. Infinitely stronger than the last explosions that blew the shrapnel-walls, there came only the utmost dreadful example of the coy, the lass. Painfully spreading through either of their system, it came near. Appearing only for a moment, as a single constellation of large gaseous remains, all of which exploded as fast as they could, revealing only the groans that followed after. Their jaws being completely penetrated after, only by the most decrepit access one could lay eyes upon. Not only would it not work, but this arrogance could only continue if it were to be allowed forth.

‘Ahahahahaha, you insignificant mongrels, you thought you could simply slay me by standing still? With your botched production of ill explosions, you’ve only launched yourselves into the territory of terror from which you shall received.’

Ready as he was, he spoke no less than he should’ve had. Taking to himself only the chance to spare a glance. Two hands rested on his shoulder, as if it mattered in the long run. Otherwise, it couldn’t be surmised any longer, not to pay attention to the lesser ones who were speaking ahead. Only ruin could last so long as they would be allowed to follow in the first place. Both of them even came to press as hard as they could inside his bone until the slightest signs of pain could be used against him again. Neither of them would allow him the chance to continue without being tried.

‘We need to talk to you, now.’

‘You be designated for it, right? The one picking out our new toy.’

They were specifically looking out for themselves. Of a good reason as well, not to mind them too often, but there was something even more degrading than it should be. For starters, they started pushing in a few demands, completely disregarding what had happened here to begin with. IT would take a while to take note of everything they asked for. As they took a good enough care to ask about as much as they could. Never giving it to what they should be knowing there. Lanky and uncanny, to make sure he wasn’t a good runner. Break a leg and make sure he’s born after, again and a gain with a permanent handicap, never to remain whole. His head needs to be stricken down, make sure he’d dumbled down. What else had they asked if not cliquor, a lacquorish substance on which he should constantly choke for even. Even if he were to be filled with broth and lose any kind of hope he may have had, it's far more important to be sure about it, rather than be struck about time after time.

Again, he would have to catch himself away. Caught off and slain about one of the greatest spire-cones in which they droned around. Just to make sure the chase would be fair, he could be granted something which went through his respiratory haze. Walking on feet that weren't his, pissed only by the blood amidst the wrongness of the cowards. Brought ahead of them and disemboweled.

'I've heard just enough of that and I must say, I've got no interest in hearing more about it, do you hear?' Not to claim that they overreacted, but they almost dragged themselves to the point where they had almost eaten his head right there before they could be giving free path. He wasn't aware what their problem was about, uncanny. Calmly watching from the distance, he went on. They had been clearly lost as soon as he sprinted past the throng between the bodies he had carved.

I did not fear them. Yet he thought, just what had become of him in the time he had been away? Something about him appeared to have been stricken down. For some reason or another, he had become weaker, more approachable, even, no. If I were to twist and turn, I could still completely annihilate them in their entirety without having any question earned. And I would have the complete satisfaction of having killed them both. I would be filled with the supreme act of joy and ever-giving. A plethora of skins carried on by back for leather. Grobbuscating, organ-pillows in a jar, that's what went through his mind as far as he went ahead. He could collect just about everything he wanted then. Nothing would be amiss. Of course there appeared to be some problems. At least for what was worth, no one even care for what they brought on the table. As for the taken, it had to stop.

Neither man could handle what was going on around them. Even by each second, they listened to some dreadful spade speak.

'Rock-us? Where's Rock-us?'

'Are we all here now? What do you suppose happened there?'

Pox was there, Alder, the Snake and finally Bottle, yet their leader nowhere to be found. Worst that, it could be the fact that there were other things pushing on, working their nerves as they twisted each other past the gloom. Leaping from one second to another, you'd find them pointing the rail-guns at one another, only to be stopped from firing as they listened to the sound of the lightning going, straight outside.

'It's raining out there, isn't it?'

'So? What's it to you to know? Dead men don't need to bother with that kind of information, not the kind soon to be buried underneath the floor in any case.'

It was Pox, who had decided to have the first laugh. Somehow he was still grinning with his vile teeth, as much as they had been restrained and caught off the prick. He was the only one who could be trusted so far. It wasn't just that. Twenty feet away, through whatever numbered passageway you could look into, it didn't matter. He could still feel it, after so many years, all the pain given life by failure had struck him.

Now he peered at himself like some lost soul.

He didn't need a name. He could simply be forgotten in only a few hours. There's no need to look at him any longer, for his own sake at least. And soon they would raise their hands at him. He was a buck-shot if

I ever saw one. Despite being condescending, he aimed the one thing he hated holding in his hand. A shotgun with eight-barrels, all of which promised to paint his face red. Submitted to this act of his, there was only one need, to lit up a single smoke and play with the diring poking cross he carried around with him. With the crucifix near his side, the heat would be stable, refusing to rise. Not only would it not allow itself to suffer and drag itself after, but there was a clear entry. Into the realm of the uncanny, shhh, no one watched. Reflected into the peckless castrations he had ordered in the past, he could only loathe himself in shame.

Despite the time, the cruel mistress wouldn't forgive him in the sea of fate. For what he's done, many a vengeance would be brought onto him for the sole reason that he couldn't overthink it

'There, have my shirt and the skin on top of it.'

He didn't take it off, of course. Instead, he pulled out a bone and threw it on the ground. A fellow came after, don't look at him now. For he bore something on his face, a mask, and something about it.

'Hey, hey, listen to me now, I want you to hear about something. I was sent here, good sir for a damned quest. Sent by the novice himself, the servant of the.'

Something the matter? A clock in his head, another one in the throat and he spoke no longer as he fell dead. Of course no one would be allowed to talk of the land of storms yet. It was far too dangerous for in it now resided the dreadful realm, split in half, never brought a kind, of that.

'My world has been destroyed.'

A distant echo had been heard. Though you may not think of ill, you see it at will, as the giant centipede-like construct which grew inside the planet.

Ivanoe looked at his good firend, Roscowaff for only a dire moment, thinking of something they could share now. Despite all the deluge which they had been given while using the elevator, only now would either of them be allowed to distinguish from what was carried on the broth. Why, the man had something to him which made him walk backwardly like someone born in a pot.

'Now now, Roscowaff, I've decided to bring you back to life again.'

'But what happened Ivanoe? What happened to me now? I was alive a moment ago, before we came.'

'Hooray, to our new home.'

Where the elevator stopped, they were in a pit of dirt. Of course it wasn't just an unnatural pit of dirt in there. Just look at, I dare thee to look at it for a good reason. For the sole officiator of disease couldn't do anything about it even if he wanted to, it would prize him to know what was going on. By each passing moment while they were setting the apparatuses and setting up the new base.

‘Wait a minute, the laces around the elevator were green.’

‘And?’

‘Ivanoe, I hadn't been alive yesterday, have I?’

His friend only shrugged at the question. Well of course he hadn't a clue what was really going on here.

For the sole reason that he couldn't help himself any longer, he chose to carry on with the only good alternative, which was prying into the business where he didn't actually belong to. I seem to care less about this pain in my chest than I could do for it. ‘Let it be known here that I haven't tried to kill her. Why, it's only a matter of fact that I couldn't have done it. On a good day, I would've paid good fortune to Ivanoe and never and never. Hahahahah.’

The man laughed as he garnered the knife in his hand. He bent a strange partitioned hand behind his eye.

It looked as if he had been ready to pull it off in decades of bitterness that had come onto him now. He wasn't a man who complained a lot for no reason. He wore a gas filter and a flint around his back. That thing was enormous. Even so, with that accounted, it went ahead and connected a few fillaments which drenched his forearm while entering his sharp knife. From the fillaments, a bunch of straight-edged star-pins began pushing out, seemingly made out of blood clots. He was elated from it. Just by looking at the reactions his face produced, you could see the vagueness his mind carried on with.

This was a lost physician, at the boundary of a lost home. While the others brought nothing short but the devices they carried on with them, he only brought a carpet. On it, there were no patterns but a symbol he had claimed to be his own.

‘See? I even managed to tatoo it across the back of my back.’

‘That's indeed something, isn't it, Ivanoe?’

But he had noticed something about the strange, almost compounded snake-widened scorpion lance that projected from his back. Peculiar or not, this animal appeared to be completely represented from every possible angle, suited for a work of art than the back of a ill-minded fellow like him. For starters, it was moving even then. And it hadn't been a botched patch of ink as much as it had been only the wretched scum-totter of something they had both failed to look upon. A scourging thing, a raise in the back which tried getting out, we both noticed how slowly it had began raising itself up until it couldn't do it any longer, only to give in and deflate.

‘In no time, I think, it should be able to escape from my grasp. And then, I shall be free from it, you'll see.’

‘But dear man, do you truly seek to get rid of it in that manner?’

‘Why, as of lately, I felt as if I had been carrying all the summer-water on my back, you see?’

‘And?’

‘I’m the Rain-maker Admiral, Corvantes. Look, this on my back is a sea animal on which I shall ride back to the mast and harken the return to my place of birth where I shall finally rest and find myself befuddled by the wenches.

Blessed be their soul, for they are the ones who shall take care of me when I’ll be old and I won’t be able to carry on the trough filled with my sardines. And if that happens, do you think you could even comprehend what that might mean for me? I might lose my fingers and my jaw, I could look away for only one second and they would eat my leg.

And the egg.’

‘Which egg?’

‘Ivanoe, don’t encourage him, please, I think this man had been touched. And look, he still hasn’t let go of his knife.’

‘A grand observation, I see, but I cannot sit in doubt and say any longer that there’s anything I could do about it without losing my desire to carry on with it. You see, I’m only trying to earn my due as best as I can. Don’t suppose you’d do it any better, do you?’

Tending to this carpet is hard on its self with all the clam-callouses taken from the clam-iron. Courtesy to the master, but because of him, I had at least managed to do something

Let me give you a shot of what I see.’

Just then, the scorgiastic flash had turned into a white-dented black-red, hued with strip-bans of waves that immediately turned his whole body into a conduit for scorched earth to come into him. Only a dark shout could be heard from his bowels and for a second you could see his eye. It looked like it started rotating inwardly until it started pouring itself out of his brows, forming the scondrellic pattern across his sockets. Though they lost their whiteness and the iris had been broken in part, he showed only the magnificence of a man who was lost. Call him again, like a walking horse who cannot touch itself any longer.

His grim started taking a part of the ceiling above of them, as the crescent of his inner-talons bulked out. For the few moments, his face could be entirely seen juxtaposed across his flashing light. It had gotten so fast that he had lost himself in it, melting with every second until he was stopped. From his rear came two more, both of them were some Tyrant-looking mongrels who didn’t belong in this place at all.

‘Why have you called for us? We’re still out there in the vastness of space.’

‘Why must we share rooms with them? Blasted creatures, these living four-headed comets were supposed to be empty.

Are we to share rooms with them as well?’

‘No, this isn’t where I was meant to project us, we were supposed to be on a ship, to go a-going into fishing. You blasted chachical frigthening aspects do not belong here.’

His eyes had been bludgeoned by them. As, in fairness they didn’t exactly know what those holders were supposed to do. Dents could visibly be seen, as the Tyrant Brutes finally understood what they pruned out of him.

‘My pardons, I haven’t realised that we’re not there any longer. If you don’t mind in that case, would you sent us back where we ought to be?’

Someone’s bound to get hurt in case you’re missing my point entirely.’

A tooth-less grin was shown, from which the gums started pouring on into his mouth.

He took a few more steps, it neded. Neither of them other men saw what happened, at each end. Instead, they chose.

It was the worst place to be in. The very bottom of the earth, where no one walked forth and no one cared for themselves a bit. If anything they looked like men who were looking for refuge, who were lost at that.

Even the most tormented people could admire it.

He felt like this place could be deserted in any moment. Just by looking at it, there were set on risking their lives there. No one wanted to answer, yet they hoped for someone. Anyone who could come and lend the hands back, it would bring no joy to push themselves around for too long. For what was worth, it didn't matter. There were other means of going around the place. Was it late already for he who covered his guts and refused to move away?

Some fields were greener, yet no one paced around them.

‘Don’t grab more than you can get. They’ll take everythign from you and watch you squirm.’

They would struggle like dweller-fish. Nothing went as far as it would take them to be heard out. So many people acted out of place.

‘I just want out now.’

Hleb wasn’t thinking right. He was a dumb kid, who couldn’t do anything right. He was trying to trace fingerprints off the grass. Yet he hadn’t cared about a single thing. Not a single thing in the world, all of which would sadden him. It got much worse. They watched her walk, slowly.

Not a soul in sight.

Some stranded houses, yet they were simple. Another sight showed just how unevenly they were placed. No one wanted to approach them because they looked like water-towers. Too much rust accumulated on top of them, and for a jeary-eyed thicket, they sprouted in the wrong directions. Jerkiness couldn’t be counted on. For the third or the eight time, too many terrible things came one after another.

Shh, it was time to sniff, he brought it back on a single whim.

Harond'thkar, a man of his word, stood looking out of his wooden window with nothing but a crippled lip that stopped him from growing. A time and a day lay there for everything. But he hadn't been satisfied by what was going on around him. By the various jugs he had punched in and prepared. He's had enough of it this day. Either way, he was adamant on baking his bread only to place it in his jars. With no problem going so far, he had only took it upon himself to make sure everything was in order. Production would be at stake and looking back on it, he only had so many hands to work with. Through all the smashing and the praising, he looked for a way to help them out. His daughters were relentlessly pushing themselves to bake, and to pull away, from the masses of powder-flour. Not to cower for too late a day, but now it was the time to look into it, again. Something was in the down there, and he could only wait and see that he could get it. As much as it would be worth-while, looking to strike down as fast as he could do it, but there wasn't anyone inside the room unfortunately. Not with him in any case, only the disturbing minutes he had to spare. Looking around from a barely standing chair, he glanced around. He picked up one of his jars for himself. Upon a closer inspection of the bread, he noticed the scarab-like toe-spanners that started shaking as hard as they could. Some of them were indistinguishable from the ones in his skin which reacted upon touching the ones beneath them. From his toes and in his bread, he felt as if they were communicating once again. It brought to him much pain now, just by the folk and the dreadful drop-like quiet that came after. From at least a slit inside inside of him, they carried on. And until they couldn't continue any longer, they tried again and again until it came to him.

‘Alas, I shall make sure you’ll all be forced to mix.’

Just to make sure, he allowed them to continue what they were doing until the bread resembled a ship in a bottle, completely soaked after the cut. A knock on the door came after, and hence the client came.

Suspicion drew near. He stopped from jittering, holding the pain in. It only took us so far, our conversation barely going before it stopped again. Even though he hadn't opened his mouth, he offered me something to plug in my chest. Right from below his chest, he bore a note.

‘Ah, I see, you want twenty of these.’

Harond couldn't even keep the conversation going, it seemed. For some reason he was too dull to notice it now.

‘I’ll have to check some of it in the back. I’ll be around in a jiffy.’

A few more shafted halls were there. Eighty rows at least on either side, from most of them you could pick at least something to pick up from, no one would mind the matter. Everything was occupied here, regardless of what they tried saying. Some welsh spirits somewhat appeared to inhabit the place. They were occupying themselves as soon as they could get past the smell of the protruding flowers. It was hard, trying to ration food out. It was even harsher when you thought about everyone trying to live through the posion clouds outside. Somehow, so many people survived, that it almost seemed quaint to have customers again.

He hadn't a mask on, but it would do.

'Here, to the last drop.'

With his order ready, he dropped just the few spares, some silverware which was much appropriated. Now, them leaving was the hardest part, as no one desired to see it, no one at all. He spared no one of the chance to look through the glass. Even though fewer and fewer people appeared, his family still kept making the bread. Like forgers of flour, working relentlessly with little joy. Past the devotion, he had been left alone. To the contrary, he started making fun of the piss-poor cats that died the morning they stepped outside. It never got old seeing the neighbors.

Something else was on his mind.

He couldn't keep true to himself.

It was ripe, so far. No one wanted to concern themselves out there with surviving any longer. They took their good time to take as many risks as possible. Eating mushrooms that held certain colors and shapes wasn't out of the ordinary any longer. And they wanted to go forward with it and grow their own herds. As those mushrooms grew on just about anything which had skin on it. It could be looked upon as a coil. Ever since they appeared, the sheep had been only butchered in part. There was something wrong about them, though no one could explain it yet.

We turned them on their backs and made sure not a single one of them had a chance to escape. Once they were disarmed, we started planting the seeds in their wood. Indeed, the mushrooms had been harvested of seed. Tiny and colourless, but they were a pain to be held. Even so, it was far too dangerous to hope we could do with them whatever we wanted. Hold them for too long and they grow onto you. Give them a chance to get away, you'll slip and crack your head open. It was an aphrodisiac scent which only added itself to them. For starters, it made you fall. And once you were down, you never got up. Not for the good reason at least. You weren't dead, but there was a good reason for not getting up in the first place.

A part of you would be left behind. Grayed out like a cast. Even the old shamans would've seen this as being too queer to be held on. I feared for touching them for too long. And I was the harvester of our group. Twenty men waited in line, waiting with their sheep inside their arms. Had they cradled them like that forever? Was there a reason for it? Their actions confused me, but I was here to do my job. We had all the seeds placed in a basket near me, which had been placed on top of a bucket. It was mostly felt by me. You had to feel for the right ones, no matter how dangerous it was. Going in too far or too slow had a risk in itself. Were you to go any faster? A lost hand, too slow? Better not talk of it yet.

Their action went fast. The way you could know it was going was by simply looking as their growth. Fast actioned, so it seemed. Most of them were immediately growing their root channels through the wool, leaving no doubt that it had worked. After that, then came the waiting.

We placed the frozen sheep in fields of graves. For some reason, growth was stumped unless there were bodies twenty feet underneath them. It had been tested before. Exactly twenty feet, no more, no less, it didn't matter if they were fresh or not. That was the deal. And so far, we've all survived on them after losing our provisions.

'Domo, Patricide, I've come to bring you water.'

'What have you come here for this time?'

'Domo, domo.' I repeated. 'Have you brought good news of the march?'

We greeted the strangers, though no one believed me. He was there when the explosions happened. Though I couldn't flesh the pieces out, for whatever reason he was here. Standing with us while pacing around, he chose us. Each time at noon, he appeared out of nowhere, carrying exactly fifty squalls of water. Pouches, they were called by laymen. But they were made out of chittin. With his muse gone, I only wanted to crack his head open. He also told us the same story before the trade.

'I lost my dear Ecatherine, my dear, dear lady. You don't suppose you have seen her now, while going around the scavy?'

'I don't think we have. If she's not around our camp, she's probably dead. What do you think Mck'roy?'

'Definitely dead, unless she's out there and managed to survive on something, but I very much doubt it.'

There were less keen on dragging in for long.

'Give us the pouches already. You know how hard it is to get our hands on purified water.'

'Don't rush me, I know what I'm doing here. Now let me check, I need to see whether or not our rations are running low. You wouldn't want to go back to the slime-water would you?'

'No sir.' It echoed around for a few minutes until the uroborous returned. 'No sur.'

Aforemention, there was an itch to his head. He was trying to scrape off the smoldering meat which grew.

From it there pushed the antler-piles, which started travelling towards his throat. He only sunk a few of his fingers deep, pulling some artifact he had been carrying with him. Dark and smoldering, it was a piece to behold. He had been pleased by it, now that there was time, to check it. Two red bard appeared, forming digital motions. He collected the hours from just about every place. It's what he told us after all, not that we would believe anything he said.

'I told you the man's insane. Why must you entertain him every time he comes around here? All this talk of a Muse, and the weird things he does.'

'Shut it now, Sparky, he's the only tradesman who had access to purified water. You don't want to drive such a man away, do you?'

‘I suppose not.’

A concession didn’t last for long. He wanted to please himself just there. That’s what they were all after, anyway.

‘Two shilings of silver-barrels, that’s what I require. If you can’t do me less, I’ll take a few seeds instead.’

‘Deal, that’s a deal, then, twenty seeds for all five of your pouches.’

They shook on it amiably, for what was worth, he came forth himself and gave us everything he had.

‘What is your name, son?’

‘They call me Avenue for some reason. I could never explain why, but everyone’s looked at me as if I were the one queer, so they stuck it with me.’

‘Is there any reason for it?’

Avenue only shrugged. He hadn’t any intention of giving him anything he didn’t like. He was reserved for a man who was working in the wastes. It would be much more dangerous to act otherwise. Looking back at it now, this avoided a lot of trouble. Hence the trade, and he got ready to walk away.

‘One last thing if you don’t mind.’

He handed me something else. It was subtle but I knew there was something peculiar about it. Somehow it felt out of place just then, but he handed me a note. These were news about the March, pamphlets I believe they called them. I had no idea they were distributing them as freely as they were now. I could see it flopping in his eye now. This wasn’t the sight either of us had been accustomed to. But he planted the seeds in his neck and waited for them to pop instead of immediately leaving.

What a strange man he was. We all thought about it for a moment before letting it go. As the event faded away, we couldn’t put ourselves in the other shoes. All of our feet had been cut off just blow the nails. Each of us had been standing twenty centimeters away from where we first landed. Only now could we look back at it, from empty seats, going back, bleeding on the ground.

‘If we allow it to dry, we might end up being followed.’

‘Followed by whom? I thought the radiation killed most of the animals.’

‘Just like it killed us, Avenue?’

It wasn’t fair that he would bring it up. But he remember going around for some reason, in one of the abandoned houses. They found themselves dead, each of them piled up there. Of course, in the irradiate forms that seemed to have only given birth to a mound of out copies. They were all connected by the same living organs and the same nervous systems like that of men. We could only carry it so far before we could understand what was going on.

Apparently we weren’t meant to see it. For that I can only look in shame at myself, for I wasn’t the surviving man. No, I was the Avenue from the pile. We switched spots, at least eight times. A lot of Avenues had been there rotting, bringing in only the nuisance which had pleased us, though we were there. I knew where my brothers were. I considered abandoning them more than a few times. Even though I sometimes return to them to see the maw open and throw the mushrooms in. Straight from the gully, into the broken doors, no one followed me this time around. I see nothing going on.

My head had been smashed in one of the rebel camps. It was a hard enough to live life out there, in the harshness of wood-sand destruction. Bitter bile-wads kept appearing out time, when they weren't needed. I almost drew away from them, just out of principle. And the wads appeared to be fascinating portals which spread in themselves some kind of greasy texture which drew upon itself, feeding into existence. Would it matter if I lost a finger in it? They took a liking to human meat. Perhaps it would be better if I considered taking my life just there. A few steps would allow me to push my head fully inside. There wouldn't even be pain, if I were to abide the rules.

No more than a few seconds there, just make sure there's something to look after. Sniff around eighteen times, only then will the radiation strike. A puckor of glowth started flashing form inside of it. Perhaps I ought to have been more attentive. Well to do, I saw only the Orange Origiastic Sinew coming out of it. Would there be anything else to look for? I knelt and started licking it off the ground. A wheat taste came to inhabit my senses. Perhaps I was nearing old age. For the mighty lurking strage inside my mind started giving away. I was someone who ought not to be met. Lost as my mind did make it so I was looking out of breathe, as I ran for twenty more miles after entering the Orange-Haze.

It was unlikely that my life would add to something now. Ever since I realise what the prospects of life were. I gave in, my feet were only broken as far as my knees started pushing in. Some liberties had been taken there. It wasn't fair, but that's how they chose to play with the small boisterous dults they had taken with them. I was awaited upon my return. Pehraps I was much too late but I had lost my chance to warn them. Keep up with the pumps.

Two things I noticed as I came back to the camp. They had all muddied the floor with their bloody-feet, second thing being the presence of the other man. He had pumps in his jaw which were going up and down, faster than I could keep track of them. It was rather unsafe for me to approach. I could see that he was making a lot of noise and too much mess around him. His tracks had been wiped off and I knew he did appear out of nowhere. It was a loss for both of us as soon as we shook hands. I knew it. Everyone in the camp was laughing for some reason but I knew it was wrong.

For more than two hours they've fed him the seeds. His entire body had been entirely encompassed into roots which carried on through his insides. Mostly, I felt it after our first handshake. It felt like a cackle that refused to go away. He went out of his way to show me that his psyiognomy was no longer that of a human. Instead, he had taken too many lost-stakes and became it, a living embodiment of roon-channels that were poisoning his body and us, even though we weren't aware of the latter.

Another row of handicapped frowls followed. He was trying his best not to strike at him. He was being bloated down to an unatural level. I see.

‘There’s no way do differentiate the living from the dead here.’

‘What was that?’

Avenue looked back. An old friend appeared out of whom’s where, wearing some plastic toner spread around his brow. It forced him to indulge in the broken. From ontop of him you could see a scar which started going as deep as it would go. A few inchest here and there, that from the side, a few inches from the bow, his forehad looked like two hills. Right until your drew on and looked at it and saw the mass of brain pouring in, turning and pushing away.

‘Oh, I see, you want me to eat some of it, right?’

They had me working like a bull in head, trying to look way. It faded as some kind of mettling. They were trying their best not to look away. Flying fleas already nested in his head, feeding on his memories.

Plume a plume. He had too much to drink.

‘Is that man okay? Who did he say he was?’

‘Frank, his name was Frank Duschore. I suppose it’s the time to do it, if either of you don’t mind this.’

Everyone formed a row as quickly as they could. It was somehow invigorating, seeing him in action again. He had never actually took charge in such a way, henceforth, this had been nothing but a wild masquarade of thoughts he had painted himself in. With all the wild summers when the green gas turned to orange, that being the main show they had managed to get themselves in, this had been a great change for once. Much so, that they were counting on him.

‘I bet he’ll slug off the fool any moment now.’

It was most likely so, just thinking about it made them point about it. He would humble the man even more than he had looked the part for it. For what was worth he looked like he’d done something to earn it.

‘Avenue, I’ve come here to ask something of you. I know this isn’t the best time I could actually come and grab a hold of you but listen here.’

He opened his chest, like a tin-man would, revealing the many changes he had went through. It was for the better that he couldn’t tell the difference between I and one of the other fake Avenues that have come before me. Could he feel it though? A desolation had occured in him. Despite what he looked like, inside his small fading chest, I could reel up just a few unsatisfactory parts that din’t entirely belong in there. He stored a miniature nuclear-missle in there, a fat one, I believe they were called, a small fetus which had been preserved but who was eating him on the inside and a few sustenance-cells. I recognised them immediately. The cells were just clean enough to be used. I feared not going deeper in but I wanted to find out more.

‘What did you want out of me?’

‘Give me solace, that’s the only thing I ask of you, help me become human again. I seemed to have forgotten what that’s like. If you don’t mind it, I would be indebted if you chose to show me the way.’ Poor man, I could smell it despite him being only a few feet away from where I was standing. Someone had filled his head with methane gas. It made him all too desperate to be alive. Somehow he wanted to grasp at someone and release everything he had absorbed out there. Through his eyes passed a tiny spark of meat. It flashed and filled them entirely. He could be poked at any moment if someone were to aim at him. Just make sure nothing of this happens too quickly. No one would forgive you if you were. Seeing how he was their leader, he turned around them and gave them an assuring smile. That and a flip of his fingers, just so they could see that he was whole again, nothing was missing and nothing would go away. At least not until the first accident happened.

‘If you don’t mind, do you mind if I take this from you.’

‘All of those things will remain with me, do you understand? I refuse to give anything I own, they’re all mine.’

And he refused to step in line despite me assuring him that everything would be all right. He simply didn’t understand how things worked, unfortunately. He had people to protect around the camp and him carrying that thing inside of him turned him into a living bomb. Just to make sure of it.

‘Don’t make any sudden movement, or else I think you’ll disappoint them. That’s right, they’ll all be disappointed for some reason or another. And you wouldn’t want that would you now? Everyone’s been through enough, as have you, I’m sure, Frank. But that’s just part of being human, isn’t it?’

He smiled, prefiguringly waiting. It had been a dreadful idea, yet he didn’t care as much as he was concerned. No one from the camp had been expected to survive, not a single dreadful soul could be expected in any case. If there was anything even going as remotely as it could, not that it should matter, he would be out of the play. Dead before them, and with them, and all of them, without any survivor. It made it much worse, for him to think of all the consequences that would last. If he went away now, he couldn’t strive to do it again, if chances were to try him.

They could forgive much but not this. He was looking as he was for now, just another man with his feet on the ground, walking on the same apparel, without giving too much away. It could only be the reason for them spitting.

‘What do you mean we should treat him like one of us?’

‘Lower your voice, Sparks, I need all of you to be incredibly serious about this. Otherwise, I’m afraid that something dangerous might happen.’

‘Like what now?’

‘You know what? Who made you our leader in the first place?’

It ate him up just thinking about it. For the same insignificant reason he tried pushing all of them away. It wasn’t a question of his interpretation or the blurring of mouths, but the man sounded as if he lost his ability to speak. He was spouting gibberish for every words that came after. Even then, my men doubted what the reason my friend was in the camp for. If he wanted to join them, why not ask it?

On top of that, he was acting suspicious, in the worst manner possible. He was fumbling something underneath his breath. Walking away without giving too much of what he was doing. And after that, he started drawing in, wondering what were were doing here.

‘Repairs, now piss off will you?’

Cater blocked his way, without thinking of him. He couldn’t be bothered now, especially after what had been said and done. Everyone had been saddened for some reason, without saying much, we only asumed he would go away. It’s not as if we didn’t make it any obvious now, but we were distressed by his presence here. He wasn’t someone who made them actually want to talk to. Plus he moved weirdly, almost mechanically, in ways neither of us could even explain.

He was smelling our gas fuel and drinking the sheep eyes, straight out of the cups. He filled two of them before moving on. Just what was going on with him?

Again, they went back to their leader and asked of him.

‘Should he really be allowed to walk across the camp unsupervised? I feel as if, there’s something bound to happen.’

‘Fine, Carter, go ahead, trail his around and see what happens. I’d do anything to get rid of this crowd, before I get another headache and decide to lose my temper.’

He had lain in awe just then. For every second he had spent trying to trail his way back he had decided the best course of action would be to befriend this strange. As peculiar as it sounded, little things like these should add up somehow. If he knew what was good for him.

‘Frank is it? Avenue told me a lot about you. Carter, Carter Mcc’Olhy.’

There was no intention to shake hands with him and it could only get worse from that point on. For every more, his fingers had been broken and taken away, for the scope he could taint his reputation. If only he were to smack him across the head when he wasn’t looking. Dangerous or not, that crossed his mind more than a few times. He had considered it way too often to care any longer. Positive, he thought, just one across the back and.

‘What are you doing?’

‘Oh, nothing, I’m doing nothing here. I was just trying to observe how well you were working, you know? Pushing spanners, making a castle out of them, that’s a masterful touch. But wouldn’t you say that it would be much better if you put them to a proper use than let’s say, play with them?’

Because it would be much more useful for the camp if we have another hand at work here. You know?

Perhaps that would make the others gain your trust.'

He hoped. So far, he hadn't even the closest shingle to ear, whether they neared the point where the pool beneath them warmed. Indeed, it was getting out of the way, out of their heads even, just thinking about it made most of them turn to the turmoil. A leash of necks, metal off course, taken from those parasite-androids laid somewhere. Strangled and placed on the adjoined place. It didn't take much for him to ask.

'And what is that?'

'A souvenir, why are you asking?

See anything you like? If you do, just take it, there won't be anyone around here to stop you. I'd take it for myself now, but I have no need for it, no one really does. It's far too dangerous they say, keep it too much in your hands and it might explode.'

'It will explode?'

'Of course it would. Come now, come now, listen to your good friend Carter, he knows much better, he will look out for you. As long as you follow me and do what I say, that's right.'

One of the Viland head compactors was in a constant need of crossing. They would have to make sure none of the valves took some pressure off them, just to be sure. No, they couldn't take it anymore. It was one thing to talk about bringing a new man to the camp and another to force him down their throats without consulting them first.

'Do you have any idea how dangerous this fellow might be?

You barely even know him don't you? And from what I saw, the way you looked at him the first time, I think there was even a feud between the two of you.

Ain't I right? Was there something in their eyes or not? Because I say it was, and I know it so.'

They raised their hands in admiration and gave upon themselves just then. It wasn't likely that this would head towards a rebellion, yet. Either one of them couldn't stop but dread what was about to happen. They never intended taking it so far, to the point where they feared just what might happen if one were to slip. Hit him, just hit him and be done with it. He can't help it either, he's nothing but a head-stricken, blown, fool-lousy worker who found himself leading the camp by accident. He couldn't even make the difference between a puddle and a deluge. It had to be settled here.

Just before someone actually made a wrong turn and force themselves away. Seeing how blows might be taken, he began calming them down.

'Wait a minute now, I think we're all rushing to unwanted conclusions here.'

From the rebellion came the first.

Let me begin with a strike of nonsense. I grabbed the man and ripped a piece of his arm. Then and only will I say that I have done a great work.

What a charming piece of earth he was lost in. Though the submarine still remained at the point of no return, almost broken and mourned for, a man had to keep everything to himself.

But there he lay, no longer perturbed. He had looked around and never understood what was going on.

Lo' and about, he walked on pitty-talbots.

He feigned interest for some reason but never spoke about it. For the same reason he had only spent a fine boot' a doing to his knee. His eyes had not only changed in color but they began manifesting their peculiar irises all around the twist, a birth amidst the strange engraving. Better to look away than to face the scurvey, it was a fact that he hadn't even remotely considered what was going on around him. Some closure would be taken not by choice but the immediate thought which occurred to him.

Malt knew that someone was looking out for him. So close had he gotten to it that he considered walking around dumb-struck circles and making for a run. He could still find himself going about it, if he were to be joined at last.

'Clear, I suppose it's clear now. We can go.'

'May I be allowed a moment of rest at least? Please, I'm only trying to act as decently as I can. Don't bother me now.'

'We won't. But we came here to warn you about something, just so you know. There's someone trailing you now. He's about to come on, hide behind door. Jump in that room and do something, you perilous thing.'

He was almost pulled in by them. Despite having promised that they wouldn't intervene, they mad-faces did it. Spare thee of the bile. There were other things, better to do. Going through everything again had been nothing but a fluke. After he stepped away, from the line and hold, the hooking bloke almost crushed the door in with an anchor.

'What does he want?'

'Don't make any noise now, I think the time will come.'

They were barking commands at him now. It would be better if this was avoided for now.

He was spared the waiting as he met his cell-mate. The man he would temporarily share his room with.

The temperature was somewhat benign, just looking at it, he had tried it far too many times.

'Make sure you don't lower the temperature any more, or something much worse might happen.'

'And what would that be?'

'Look outside the window and see for yourself.'

It was far too difficult for him to do it. For the same reason that he could get out to take a swim, it was frozen, everything was. Malt felt his breath being taken away from him. He wasn't in the mood of pouting, even though he ran through the hallway and worked on the court. Despite the various lost minutes in which it happened, he still looked forth to counting them off. As much as he was desperate to try looming around, nowhere to go and nowhere to run, he thought about it for countless seconds. Breaking through the mast, the true colors of vileness had been shown about him. He sprouted as if from a hole, which wasn't his nor would he show it any longer.

Grub reseeded in and waited. From the broken, cut-in half mind, he looked worse for the taking, as he was about to look the worse, what was the matter?

He was surrounded by the ill-shape replicas that looked like him. Though they had all been smashed entirely as they showed no sign of changing, better praying for the disciple that he may return. But so far eight of them were floating in the sky, wretched and caught off guard. It was time for the illness to begin.

While showing signs of batterment, they couldn't even show a chance to pull away.

As they positioned themselves near him, you could see the enfolding cloth which went around them. A mutter could only go as far. From each side they bore strange connectors which started pushing in until they couldn't be considered as anything but cutting steel penetrators which opened spaces through their sides. An originating paster started inhabiting their deeply engorged plocktors.

Since the space they were in was so strange and untouched, there wasn't any single way to carry on with themselves, it was only a matter of saying and of dragging along. Alone or not they could only spare themselves the pain for only so long.

'A madman, they yelled, though art a madman in peril, follow me.'

There was a prototype which said it. He mimicked opening a door. As soon as he floor on the floor, part of his hear, going down through his chest and into his leg got cut off. A pray of blood shot from his every direction. Just what was the jutt of blood? Who care about him and what he did to the others at last? First and foremost, the Grubs turned towards him. Though they had open wounds which darted as much guttural remnants as they bore inside them, it was pointless to question them.

Their growts were many and bore no satisfaction, they were destined to beg for a reaction. Cut in line, they bore their uppor-clorochols protrayed this way. Large, mostly curved, from around each part they could be set about and thrown into each corner of their handles. Some of them were destined to grow, despite being trapped into a harp-like form whith it strings bere harder cyllindrical figures that kept rotating and orienting inside of them. It couldn't be questioned any longer, just what the reason before them was. A featherless large and in the shape of a mad octave kept pushing out of it. There were also the holes which couldn't hold the liquid in. Though it smelled, you could tell that it was vital to their survival. Even those giant shelled harp-like uppor-clorochols being out, they still managed to survive the worst of times. It couldn't be thanked for, a vision for dread. They felt themselves pushing one another as they approached the prototype instead. In as much as a few minutes, what else would they do if not speak in shapes and the sound of the uges they displayed to him, but bottled. Inside of them there stood only the cruelty which waited. It was felt much so. With their psychic abilities, they forced him to levitate, breaking him apart in that space-between spaces, lost into space itself. A universe wouldn't even be able to fit it, let alone billions of realities for no other reason that they were under the protection of the Illuminators-Glors. Glory to the, glory to them, let it be known so far.

That walking upon feet that didn't belong to them wasn't going to take them far. As one of the sudden urges came to mourn, they were destined to throw themselves forth. A correction had to be insilled, and everyone was to be punished for ripping him apart too quick.

'I told you all he's to be preserved. Why have you not listened to me? I have come upon you only with the greatest intentions and you have all made me suffer.'

To this, let them sit down. They rested for a few minutes, not to be bothered with what was going around them. At times someone could care much less, or try making a difference to the distress they felt. No one came to greet them yet. And they had been flying in circles for hours. Time flew right past them then. Look at his wrists, he's not only poisoned. He's actually entrapped. He's being dragged below the parts of the sea, where the world collide amongst idolatry. Below their masses, they had long and forth realised there's no return. Not truly, in place he had abandoned, the refuge from which he can never return. It saddened them, especially now, as all of them looked upon poor Malt. Realising that his chances of return were nulled, they had decided that instead, he was to be pulled and pushed back.

'Listen to yourself and hear us well now. It's time for you to return to a place and a time when everything was still worth it.'

They gave him a promise then. And this time around they made sure to follow with it. No one was supposed to die from it. But they would all suffer as long as he was sent there. For more than a good reason, as Malt wasn't supposed to be there. Despite being his refuge, the perfect place where he could hide and be safe from everyone. It was during times like these when he felt, he felt, he felt as if nothing else mattered. Not any longer, at least he was home. Of course it was dangerous getting here in the first place. Just looking past everything he did, this was a melancholical way of entering his realm. Though the man didn't say a word, he was more than content with his fate. Just by looking around for a few minutes he realised that there wasn't a way out. As soon as the window broke, he lost just about everything he had stashed inside his room by the time the wave came in. Though it wouldn't even be set, he fell for it and he was dead. Striken in the face with a multitude of ice-shards, he lost too much blood and drowned alive just as the entire quadran of the submarine froze with him in it. Now he didn't care for it.

He had killed him and froze his blood. It was unnecessary to expect anything else but this.

He suckled on it on his way back. It kept him fresh off the hook now.

There was no distinct map he looked back on while he made his way. He had destroyed his knuckles after trying to bash through one of the rocky-steel glass barrels he leaped on as he made his way towards the farthest point of the steely cold. Between this and the ford of stone where he found the witch that tried guiding him, he hadn't many choices left. She was on the other side of the gelatine water. Now it was beyond his control and not even that, he felt like there wasn't any chance any longer for him to get to her. It was beyond his reach and he hadn't care of anything but that point. Was he to leap in it now? There was only one way to know.

It was good to know that they'd have his back. Soon enough the water turned to dust. And once it settled, it became the good old junk he was accustomed to. He had finally emerged on the other side, yet, he was simply forgotten there.

A change had come inside, as the main platform where everything had been placed got immediately contraped. Shimmering palletes stood there by the time he had reached the first stranded bridge. Another one of these areas were under construction. Worse then them had been the strange vagrant Vigil. He had been aprehended. Despite his best attempts to get away from the moving bowl of phosphorescent plight, Malt was caught. Where he eneded, just about the arc, androids as well as weird people ended up being stranded without a way of complaining. It was highly unacceptable. There was no way to run.

Not even the slightest effort went in vain as the levels and the Blocs, the bunker was at last done.

'This is the dawn of the new age.'

A message read, in huge, largely disclosed letters. There wasn't much of anything else he could find out about the place, other than the rumors and whatever else they could spread between one anoter. As if it would matter now, as uncomfortable as he was, there was no way out. He couldn't even hope to get his way in this time around. He was trying his best to do it.

But the largely caught doors were stranded there and worked no more. As a matter of fact, he had been placed into a tiny body sized elevator, carried on fringe and pushed in with the others. It was the only way he could actually work without giving in the fold.

'What's happened here?'

'They have.'

One of the other men pointed at him. It was a general direction and the man was someone he had recognised from before. As a matter of fact he was a well known figure he had met from the days when he was, there. In the apartment, when he lived not so far from her, Claire. It wasn't likely that he'd be recognised now. Not that it mattered in any case. But the stranded electic devices were nothing to be joked about any longer, as it happened for them to be far more dangerous than they had ever been before.

It was only then that he considered the only other option. He asked for help.

'I need to know of a way out of here.'

‘Wouldn’t we all like that?’

It was serious, despite everything said. He tried his best not to give in too soon, despite the fact that he was jittering about the place. Malt was here, he was there, he leaped about and never cared about what was going on to them. How could this happen? Why did they react that way? They weren’t some morbid-looking deformities, but men, as he was.

‘Will they allow us to leave?’

‘It’s never happned before? And what do you mean by leave?’

Leave for what?’

‘Leave this place because it’s unnatural. We don’t belong here.’

‘Tell me about it, no one here has committed any crime. We were placed in these holding cells for no reason whatsoever. I suppose it could be much worse than that. There are worse alternatives, you know?’

SO better keep that in mind before you say or do anything they don’t like.’

Just what did he mean and where was he?’

Of course life hadn’t been entirely dominated by normal citizens drunk with power. It was much worse after the border. Here, apparently only humanoids were allowed to live. While out there, the view was not only different but downright vindictive by the looks of it. Looking forth for the time spent here, so another sign said. IT was illuminated by the Box-cutters, who were placed just about the place. IF there was one thing anyone should be reminded about, it was the fact that they were not alive. Indeed, they were called that for a reason there. From inside of them, the saline motion could only push and draw away.’

The dinner table, a meeting point between two strangers. Wretched days, has it been so long since a guest came in? He tried his damnest not to make him think of what happened there. The door was closed now.

Aleksey didn’t think there would be any trouble. After so many days where he hadn’t received any reponse from the man, he realised what went wrong. Poor guest choked on Dina. It was a sad turn of events. He did not want to think about it. Reasons unknown so far. He looked like an ancient dool that had been thawed out of its plastic. Now only some battered ails stood there on top of him. Breathing was hard now, but it was going. I made sure it kept going, after I began pumping it with my hands.

‘I know what might cheer you up, it’s always been this way.

Nights are lonely. I know, I know.’

He looked around out of shame, not knowing how he could understand his new friend’s ailment.

‘Forgive me friend, but I forgot your name. And I think the drink is falling out of you now.’

Far fewer posions came after his nose. He brought far too many spices and added them to the soup-liquor too soon. Poor man couldn’t take them off, that must be it. It would only get lonelier from this point on, seeing how this world survived only on a simple whim and most of the time it didn’t even go his way. As a matter of fact, he faced his lack of judgement head on. With a prick in his finger, he added only more to it.

There was only one honorable thing to do now. It was obviously his only chance to set things right with every other party present there. As the reason for doing that was simple. They wanted a scapegoat, someone to make sure there'd be no survivor before melting this place up. It felt like a puerile thing now, but it was true. Despite the missgivings, they chose the wrong person for the job.

He had prepared at least one lesser tone he could use. Each of his fingers were obtuse and looked as if they had been repeatedly beaten with a hard wrench. Ye, It wasn't a sight to be looked back at. It was a hard hand at work which took the plough and started working the land. Aleksey wanted to be sure that everything looked just fine. With everything in mind, he only hope there was a chance he could push away. It neared his nose now, the scent she always carried with her. Dina was still there with him, in more than one way, for more than one day. Despite the spite he felt for this place, after looking around he realised it would rain soon. What had been the marble land touched by gods, now it looked like their empty shack.

He lost his tears and didn't intend on looking back on it. After so many wasted tears he only thought of his. My dear, oh my dear, where would I find you? At least he thought a way-a doing, where could she be left now? IT was only a matter of time until she would start moving on his behalf, cheering him over, looking at this, beautiful? Oh so beautiful a land.

It wasn't so. For starters, it had been destroyed, almost by war. The ploughs could only do so much work and the wheat he planned on planting would only be used for wine. So many times he contemplated on it. It and that, and brith and brat and few rocks, everything could become a drink. A summer would follow, one day, if only the dark cloud atop the world found itself dissipating. But for the scourging ore, the lost mornings that came after, he returned to the tavern, only to find his friend.

'What happened to you now? You fell off your chair and you almost broke it. Can I not leave you one day alone without worrying about this place falling apart? I mean come on now. Hmm, I know what I shall call you.'

Shaken by the face, he only found a similar change that reminded him of a longer fellow than him. But it wasn't the same and that infuriated him. Following another episode of rage, he broke everything apart and survived the fall of the adjacent buildings that found themselves all swallowing him there. But he woke immediately without a single scratch on him, leaving nothing to wonder.

'What have you made me? Damned tress, you never respond when I want you to. Never inquire of me or do what I want. Never allow me to get through this and find a way to be happy.

Even the drinks you give me aren't the same.'

Indeed, most of them were weak. Not likely to work his neck off, patch of birtch, that's what they were missing. A kick to his gut to put him back on track, to return to his work somehow, he found out that it never worked that way, no. Instead, the work was boring, no matter how many times he returned to it. And this was no atmosphere for him to work in. Not with everyone staring despit there being nowhere around. For a moment he found himself cold, not from the wind, not for the plough but from seeing that broken derge inside the chest of a lost mountain he once submerged in.

That's where he cried, and that's where both Dina and Konstantin died. He had once planned on sharing this place with them, if only there had been a way to bring them back. But none of them mattered at all now, since he had only to cope with her being spread around each pool and drop of water. She had been split and spread and never made it out for that summer he had dremaed off.

From where he remained, there came the one Paradisiac-gaze that fell upon the symphonies of Choral he didn't wait any longer. As in that moment, the barrier broke and he didn't care of it any longer. He was there, out in the least disturbing aces he could lay about. Despite the queer look he was given, he spared no word and waited for it until he was completely ready for it. A troubadour in the making, he's been waiting for this chance to happen again and again.

He was destined to be there, as it happened for him to make no single exceptioin any longer. Looking at everyone there, he realised the shame he was in.

'Poor me, the last one who could be called Elegant, I'm far too late and improperly dressed.'

At least he was whole again, but he didn't paint the matter nor had he cared about what was going on there. Far too many wrong twists and turns had taken too much out of him. He would spare not a second more in what was going around as he tried making it for one of the doors. Through the first one he found himself out there, in the floating city on top of the pious central moons. Those who had been dragged below by the atmosphere had only rested as to wait for anything to happen after the great mansoon show signs of pushing on. He was thinking then, if there was even a chance for him to return to the place, he'd take it.

At least there was the decency of knowing that there he was the only one that mattered. He would be finely dressed and he would care for nothing at all but what he was dressed in. As it happened from that point on he considered going forth and looking for a new servant, someone who might help him carry on with his legacy. He had fewer options than he expected. Despite being surrounded by well dressed people, with their high coats and their weirly countoured hats, the colors that surrounded him were nothing to behold upon. As a matter of fact they were anything but swollen upon a further inspection, over the very fact that not a single man tried pushing their chins on.

'No no, no, you're not supposed to drink your teas that way. And you, you're not supposed to smoke the biscuits now.'

They were doing all the wrong things they weren't supposed to do and that annoyed him the worst. This was a much worse nightmare than he had ever expected. Just being looked down by them made him feel, it made him feel unworthy to allow them to bask in his presence.

‘Stop right there, fools, I’m going to say this once.’

‘And who might you be, stranger? We haven’t seen you around, not now and certainly not before. Are you sure you’re in the right place?’

‘We’re in the seats of his grand grace, the Eminence of the gardens.’

They were standing in a floating foyer, sounded like the songs of doves, surrounded by a plain fence with patterns of hearts that remained obscure, as long as they were concerned by it. Safe to say, they had only kept to it, pouring the cups, refilling their yapping mouths until it was less of their concern what was happening forth. In a strange uprising of one of the alleys, machinememen were working on the flying machine, an inverted plane that shot from itself another stave-like pole which propelled itself in the air, dragging the machine as well as the driver within the cockpit. Both of them would be fastly rotated and allowed nothing but the cleanest jumps and the leaps about the place as much as they were concerned. Not to worry too much because in actuality it was all safe. There wasn’t any chance for any of the parties involved in this to get hurt. As a matter of fact, this was the safest flying machine designed up to date.

There wasn’t any chance for accidents to happen, so they told.

‘Warning, I got to warn my audience first that there might be some signs of tribulations showing up.’ Just what was happening out there and why were they charmed by it. As the sonnet went, there were reason for them playing their flutes to no end and no end would come. Now came the flight, and in it they found no other reason to continue other than the need to express the petals that were falling off the plane. And the tiny spots of paint drops that followed with them as soon as they were lead through the clouds.

‘Isn’t it marvelous what the Charm has done for us?’

‘Indeed it is, remind me again, what’s the plane made out of, if you don’t mind?’

‘My dear, it’s made out of the greatest machinations of the engineers from Echalon. They were responsible for the making of the moving hills and the sparing thrills coming from the first landing. If it weren’t for them, I dread to be aware what this world might look like in a hundred years.

I think.’

As quickly as the sage noticed, he turned away in awe and wondered at it, just where was gone.

‘Do you remember a strange figure being here a second ago?’

Of course they couldn’t know of Elegant’s ability to disappear, nor would they be concerned by it any longer. As a matter of fact, whatever had happened then, it was all gone a minute after and now, it came again. Why, plain it be for them to see, the plane took off surprisingly. It was near the strike that it blew into a sprout of roses, the fireworks erecting themselves as they jumped forth. It wouldn't matter any longer as long as the cockpit was safely retracted on.

People cheered for it as they paid their respects, for the brave flight-attenders, the colorfully dressed rose-bearers that now were lead. Back into their seats, they waited, looking forth for light's a welding.

'Make sure that we're all on the clear, will you?'

'Wait, did you hear that?'

They were after us, eighthundred people who were bow-armed and crosse-hedghed, bearing all kinds of wildly placed weapons. Most of them were hardly even there.

Sprazzle had joined them not soon after and despite that you still couldn't take anything from what was going on around them. This shot has been planned for weeks, yet they couldn't get the handles around the fencing right.

It took a while to get accustomed to the name. Though the Council of the Enclave nation hasn't even settled down on a name just yet, they were in the process of thinking of a good enough spot to push on the diners. Why their bureaucracy was still too slow. They went just up and about their heads, filling their head paper-sheets. Cuts were made and one would bleed. But that was set aside for a good reason. It wasn't something anyone should go through. It was a dreadful task, unlike the exploration. Something Freknsloough dreamed about for years. Ever since he's heard the stories and the mysteries surrounding the Curator, it's been the only thing he's dreamt about. And it just so happened for him to find the right folk for it.

There were only a few of us there, prodding near the two adjacent houses. The Magus had his infuriating gaze looming around, yet he didn't say a single thing, he left the secodn head do the yapping. We only came here at his request, expecting some kind of ambush to happen. Other than the two assasins and a thug by the name of Matthias, there was the electron-mule. It was smaller than it looked, much smaller, pointier even, as it happened for it to be reduced to the size of a two dogs. Through it there only came a siphening molecular toy it carried around on its back. As its chests statred pulsating, everyone stopped in order to see what was going around. Clearly it had sensed something, even though it could barely stand by itself and listen.

'Are we going to trust that thing now? Surely we can do much better than that.'

'Shut your mouth Matthias, I would trust the mule if I were you. It isn't the first time it got our feet off the ground.'

He looked ahead. Magus Perilott calmed himself, as if he hadn't any intention on carrying on with what he planned. On a higher legde, a stony ford looked down on them and up there you could notice a small patch of ground which pushed on a few centimeters in, pouring through a few of the stones, as they carried on the water pores. It was pure and crystalline. It most likely came from an underground gourd river. Not that it was of much importance as all five of us stood tense. With the two assassins, nameless, drew forth and picked off their tiny knives, the brawler taking the lead, the mule coming in-between and I of course making sure a great deal of distance had been taken.

‘We have to go around.’

‘You don’t even know against whom you’re up to. Don’t make that mistake yet, this might cost us a lot than you could wager.’

‘Perilott, in that case you can stay behind and wait, but we’ll go. We have to make sure we won’t be attacked from our rears there.’

He took no second as the attack almost came on. It was not a rain of arrows, but more like a few pebbles he threw at us. The important part of that was that they vanished just before any of us reached them in time. I paled at it, wondering what he found. I followed them on, until we met him, gathering up the patch of grass as we surrounded him. A whitely armored figure stood there, with a single sceptre which pulled at the armor and came out from a wide artillery made hole that lay in it. He was winded from the running and there was an old pot for his helmet. Despite that, his eyes were just as wall colored as his armor, as he peered in and said no word.

‘That’s a big staff you got over there.’

‘Don’t come near him, he’ll bludge us to death.’

‘Follow me then, all of you, let’s make sure he won’t get us yet.’

First came both of the assassins who managed to slip past him before he could lay that thing down. It must’ve weighed a ton because as soon as it reached the ground, it broke the stony ford it landed upon. With Devia’s help, who quickly threw a block of sand in his eyes, I managed to get past him. But we were all there, except the mule. She was all alone and came to stop, loitering in fear as she was aware that he might come at last and break her into pieces. A quick dejection, as everyone started back at him.

As soon as he had yet awakened, he ran straight up behind her, just to make sure he had the cover.

‘Careful now, he’s got the mule, I said he’s got the mule, don’t make anything rush. You don’t want him to hurt her now.’

‘Shut your mouth Perilott, shut your damned mouth.’

It was tense by now, even the two knife-knuckle draggers were looking with some impudence. As an act this was remorseless, as they hadn’t rushed towards him in order to help. They threw some tiny popping bottles which immediately spread a carpet of fine around the patch of grass, all over his armor and unfortunately on the mule at last.

‘I told you not to harm a single swool of wool on top of her. How have you not listened to it?’

‘We cannot defend her with him alive, she will be fine.’

Matthias seemed confident in himself, as soon as he allowed his throwing knives to emerge. He aimed and threw them off at the target, plunging into a spif of slits that never came off. It was far too dangerous to consider anything else, as both the man inside his tunic and the mule started shaking. Lightning spread from inside of her, stopping his advance. As soon as it happened, they took the liberty and came in at last.

Three blades as long as rapiers but thicker came against him, they were non-conductive, as the claps allowed for any such thing to disperse in the air and before it came to them, finally they gave in and didn't say anything else.

By the eight blow which came as land, he fell as soon as he was about to show that there was nothing in.

Close to it at least as the shadow of a cat jumped forth and lost itself into the nearest walls. But they looked at the remains as the mule exploded with him as he fell. Though they looked upon her sadly for a few minutes, ready to pass the judgement, she was up again after the fire was put off.

'Told you so, I knew she could reconstruct herself. Somehow, I simply knew she had it in her. You simply did not believe me until it was too late.'

'My dear men, I believe we have a meeting to attend.'

Perillot and Matthias were the first ones to enter the house. They were the first ones to notice that the dark was receding as they passed along, leaving no trace of itself despite there being no light.

'Ah, there's a secret door behind one of the forlorn books up there. But I think we may have to force them to open.'

As much as to his command, they only approached and saw the shelves open up by themselves. As soon as they stepped in, the assassins came in like drones, perilously at home as they wrecked the place in half.

They were bound to find something if they searched hard enough. And ther, in that room she waited.

Looming with an unexpected aura, pinked by the cheeks, she was only reading passively as she didn't mind us, as for it came near us now.

Perliott took one moment to read about as much as he could, judging by the strange books, the language was something he had never seen. This library of her was filled with out of this world knowledge. And from the strange language he could only pick on some faimiliar words which were stretched and bore long tails on wrong sides, up and away, he'd say.

That's just about the only thing it took for his notes to be found. It wasn't a traditional journal or even a normal one, but instead, it was a trap made out of metal. A few holes rested on the outside, where multiple hands had to be inserted in order for the connectors to start digging through the opener's veins. It was more than obvious that this process had not only been dangerous but it was dealy, far too deadly for the human who began doing it to start going at it. He couldn't be spared of the pain which followed after. After the initial incision, his brain began slowly crawling through his throat, following the flow until it had been completely drawn to the tips of his fingers and into the trap. It felt like there would be no return now as the body-functions started giving out.

Not only would this be considered a lost man, a civil-e-distillia, but he was also doomed to die inside as well. Without a chance to fight against the terrors inside, he faced only the constructions the Foreman had put in place. Many of them had been perched, created especially with only one intention in mind, the laceration of the soul. A torture of the breeds, the need to make sure that he was to be completely annihilated with hope. It was for that reason that he found a way to deal with the intruders. Quickly unfounded, yet distraught, he pointed at himself and wailed. There was nothing out there but the wretch and the need to spark some more pain. He'd shove more of it in the back-burner until it wasn't feasible to fight against it any longer. He raised himself immediately looking at the darting springs upon which he was being transported. He could only see as far as where his chest went but nothing below of it. What was worse than that had been the fact that he could feel himself being spoiled. Vertigo occurred more than a few times although he never felt nauseous.

Clearly a spell struck him in the head. He was there one day and afterwards he hadn't been in the mild water. Instead, it paid off to look around for a way to be. Just like how the other springs which had been crooked inside the metal pile tainted the ground. Without a way of looking off, they started pushing through, alas. Eighteen ways of torture coming, just as his silvery chest began pounding on itself to keep him awake, there was no other desire for him to escape. He wanted to walk again on two feet. He looked and saw others out there, people he knew and others he saw, many of whom were strangers but that didn't matter as long as they would be drawn in. And where had he found the journal if not in that unlit place where it had been attached to the ground, unable to pull away from where it were? IT couldn't be going off anymore, as he was simply caught into the antics of praying, parrying, hoping he could escape.

He heard only pain and felt it. No one listened and no one wanted to draw forth.

'Are we about to die?'

That was the obvious question which had been tried way too many times for comfort. But now, as the destination had come mid-way, variously shaped metal rings appeared out of nowhere and entered him at a speed that was uncannily fast. Slowly, they were destined, despite the scarecrow his body composition were, to be pulled and spill out there. Before the racks came it and crushed him from both sides. All of the devices appeared out of nowhere and came off. Disappearing without a trace as they made their return in different forms only to bring him back to looking around him, up until the last point. After going through nets of silver which took his body past any kind of natural state, he had refused to open his mouth again. Despite being met by the decider, while knowing he wasn't a fighter, he decided to let go of what he held in his hand.

'There have it.'

‘So be it.’

It was bold of him to meet the Torture-entity and insult him to his face. After sailing for a quarrel, he shoved the entire constitution of the journal in his body and his face. It was an unnatural appeal which crept around the ridges and the edges of every existant place. From around it you could see them leap, now they no longer crept on a single spring, as many erupted from each of them, taking the role of their legs. He has been allowed to talk now, just like the others, just in time to be given a choice. And this sepulchral being which appeared out of nowhere thought, whatever it might be he needs to be kept alive.

Either way, both of them had looks that couldn't be conveyed by evil. Indeed, they looked mightily wrong, as from one side you could see the Torture-entity as a drop of puddle which froze in time, just as it prepared itself to drop only to stop. From it, the reflection had become its face, but most of all, the body had been defiled before it fell through the grates of a sewer. Whence it had been taken from, it didn't matter any longer. For him, him, the man was worse. While he was allowed to keep the rest of his body, the way it looked now, as it appeared to be in the undertaken amount of change, he had been completely made out of his brain. He had curved and crumbled and suffered an unsuomountable amount of bends across the plasticity his brain appeared to bear. Now he was stuck in the past, only seeing parts of what were out there. Various memories manifested at once but didn't move. They looked like coats of paint which applied to everything, stricken in the strangest mass, as various relatives of his were on the entity, they never gave up. But living had been a hell and torture from which he had received some more. Now again, it had retorted, as eighteen had become eighthundred and pushing on some more. More and more, to the moor, one has to say, don't look out of the way towards the uncanny sight. Bear through it as much as you can. He doubted. Everything seemed wrong there.

The choice was simple.

‘You will either face countless years of torture which will eventually break you down. For which you will be allowed days, or even weeks to live around in peace at certain intervals when the torture will be stopped.

Or you can throw yourself in that pit and make sure you face the end of this suffering. Look, there and feel away, what do you see in the future?’

He asked only as the communication between them spared nothing but the crass moment he wanted to spare. It was likely, or more than likely that he wasn't even there to begin with. After dwelling too long on in, heat started melting it. Pain started foaming his seclusion, and then the hours came in. Cabal couldn't face the pain for long. He was squemish and despite the various hair-like fangs which shot from every livid place inside the trap, he woke up then.

‘Ahhh, I see that you woke back to reality. That is well, I see tha you are a man to be treasured as well as kept from completely fading away. I suppose it would be time to accept you as you are. Don’t worry about it now, I have taken great liberties for you not to be broken apart just yet.

I work slowly and then, I shall.’

A minor break came. Entity or not, it dissapeared in vain, something nobbing at it, from a corner where reality sprouted out. Canine teeth started gnawing at the journal in the worst possible turn of events. He had only felt himself dying then, thankfull aware of what was going there, he pulled way, but not in time. Silver, metal, the torturee, and all of the brain masses spilled off on the floor. This rabid mutated canined delighted itself on the meal of metal which turned his gums into glutenous masses of broken sloth. He was the last one.

While he carried most of his guts inside, he had been responsible for his kin as well, as he adopted all fo theirs as well. His belly measured something of a giant boulder which was entirely filled inside from end to end, sending shivers to those that couldn’t tell what the meaning for such a beast was. It lived to no end and never cared for anything other than rolling around. In time it grew, a mouldering mass from which the manifestations of his fallen brothers returned. It was time for him to come forth again.

Was there no end to this charade? Time was begining to fade.

Slech, slech, there he stood pouting in the magnificence the illness brought. He bore his head ten billion times heavier than before, without giving in a single wager to the growling of the towers that spread their postulence atop the dreadful funerals which spread the filthy disease. From his disgusting body there was nothing to be looked down up as he realised that there hadn’t been a single excuse nor some evil interpretation to bring back the obscure amount of filth which started gritting in. He had poured himself into a vessel and traveled forth until he couldn’t face it anymore. Too much of his unsanitary disease poured inside his displeasing terror that came with each deity-like demigod formed out of his diseased peckors which were pushing out of him. So many of them would not be forgiven any longer, because of the dread they made him feel. But he wast there, tall and mighty, stranded in space, out of his own violition. The others had joined him now and only seemed to bear some kind of essence to him, praying that they could be observed.

Many of them started dragging out their voices, as they were unable to cope any longer with the malady of disease that they spread. They were filthy and they had been made made. From anything around them, it wouldn’t even work to call themselves sad. Saddened, worse than that, they brought too many things in space and carried themselves into a pluckor of filth. It ran on and on like they mad song of the old. A ballad by the minsitrel of disease, he wasn’t about to care nor for anyone or anything.

‘Hear me, dear one, the one brother of ours had become an Orourbours and he’s about to destroy the world. From that there can be no escape whatsoever and let us settle on one thing. We cannot delay it any longer, we must help him, I say.’

And more Agamemnons started growing on top of him, spreading until they couldn’t be allowed to push out any longer because of the pain they caused inside of him. And out they went, then back in. Out they went and back in. They wouldn’t be allowed to deal with the filth any longer or with the strange disease which dropped them inside. For all the broathing mass he had become, he was empty inside, he waited to be filled somehow. And all the desperation had achieved nothing.

‘What we’ve done here is a blasphemous thing from where we cannot return unless we give something in return. I see it now.’

So many of our ranks had decided it’s time to grow a heart. I spit on them, they’re filth. They’re worse than filth, they’ve painted themselves in roses thinking someone might accept them. They would move on from our broathing world and give us nothing in return. Why shouldn’t we come in and destroy everything? Why get past the emotions and leave anything to the nature of the world?

We are the supreme entity and we may not forgive them now.’

Just as a sign, he started bringing in as many of the humna from around the nuclear universe. Despite them being sheltered, they wouldn’t even be allowed a quick reprise, no, not a single chance, be damned. They would not be allowed to waste away. Look at them, look at them. All of them had been completely annihilated by the travel. Instead of even coming close to being allowed to live, they seemed to bear nothing of their past lives. Only the most extraordinary luckage of extreme pluckors that appeared on their heads, soon enough they started inflating and became their own things. Their own entities that weren’t affected by the slightest pluckage of a universe which tainted and dreaded them, it wouldn’t be forgiven any longer. So much of the sight had been taken away. Look at them, again.

‘They have become giant ships for transformation, bloated by the radiation. Their eyes are green, within the pluckors of disease. May we not go ahead and pull them out? Surely we can simply take them off one by one and devour them.’

Spoke Agamemnus, the only one true of his name. For he had been the only one who ever bore a second from the damned place, blasted race, let me try again. Don’t let the thoughts come back. Stop the whispers and the voices from pulling on ahead, so they might yet be stopped.

Agamemnus was the god, he was not. He was, he wasn’t, he was, he wasn’t. He argued that with himself and everyone around him. All of the sudden, as his impudence began again, they wouldn’t allow him to stay. Not in this form, none’s the manner. It wasn’t likely to be true, but they feared him, just like they would come to fear each other. There was no time to stop, just yet. Make sure you’re aware of his death and the rebirth, the taking of the floudering of smell. Which spread throughtout the universe, melting everything, killing life, in a peak of glory, they would sink and bring themselves back. 'I have become the planet. And you have become my children. That way, you may never have to worry of dying or of decaying. I will make sure that you're saved.

For everything until this point brought you to my side, again and again.'

He took one second and then spat them out. With each of the Supressors which were eaten, he looked back and remembered the good times. Good though they might be, the corpses had the heads implanted on them, laughing.

'I see that you're still bringing yourselves back. This is puerile, but I suppose I ought to allow this to happen. Otherwise, I would risk, insurgence. That is right, I would risk insurgence. After that, I could be caught by my own antics and die off.

Forgotten and left to fend off for myself. Don't look at me as your father but as.'

He stopped there, right anywhere, as if it would matter, somewhere. Alabaster came in flying, like the dreaded folk that sang along. It took some time to understand. On the bones of whom would they be allowed to continue if not theirs?

Everything would fall into place, he asured everyone. From the sesselechte approach he showed, a large vacuous form turned him on. He had looked as the celebrated forms of succor, plastified skin-tremors, which manifested from his will inside the ether-space cretin. A malding devilish defiant cancer, which seemed to ripple as it dissipated away. On it bounced some of the distantly retrieved castrators that brought themselves back in. From canons they shot, heads at last and then he realised that there were far too many of them. Too many faces grew on top of him, giving him no chance to move. What of it was misunderstood? If not everything, then nothign, nothing would fall back.

He had created his own dystopian place. Judging from the eight sides surrounding him, there lay the same thing he would stare at in a mirror. And from every side there he poured into his face, like a river would, with the digrace that had been stopped.

'We got close to flooding the universe. Where had we gone wrong? Why isn't coming any more? Must we start the process yet again?'

'But we made a deal, we could prevent it for some time in order to allow them to let their guard down and after that.'

Disease, disease, nothing but it, stop it, that hadn't been the point. But the old habits returned to him, as every face poisoned him. Making him madder by the second as they submerged yet again. With all that free space, not only did they move, but they dragged with them ever-expanding bodied frome very angle as they forced the cheeks, the chin, even parts of his eyes to push back in. This was too much to handle.

He would ruin everything, again and again. There was no force in this universe to spare them, from anything but the dread. What had he done?

He dosed off their nature, giving them unearned freedom, to act as they pleased while he alone stood pale thinking. No conquest would do and there weren't enough nations to subjugate. Agamemmnus didn't need to materialise anywhere or to make sense out of anything any longer. He was supreme. He would be supreme. And in his name, the anchors of filth could penetrate and rip the entire world apart. It wouldn't matter why any longer, as it came to him, away. It wasn't likely he would stay any longer, until then it came.

Another universe had been forcefully dragged in, overlapping everything. For a second there, a planet materialised inside of him, right as it would before disappearing again. No forgiveness and no lust, this would kill everyone in there as fast as they would allow themselves to.

Expatriated, he felt gross. Tainted, touched, in the wrong places smashed, as he would start going down upon himself in a need to make everything unwell. Nothing could tell about this putrid nature, what was going on? There was no victor any longer, only a degeneracy which pushed about the place. Disgrace, disgrace, make it go away. Now, the intermission of unpleasing grith, nothing ever mattered after. It wouldn't do, never could it come through after what was going there.

Towers formed around them as well, those sprouted by the insolent vessels, filthy parasites which dug on men, stealing their dreams away. It was perhaps the worst nature that could invigorate him, if all. Let it be known that no one should be forced to suffer for what he was doing there, as it went against its own might and prowess. He forced the materialisation inside of him to take a familiar form. While reflecting on his past, he took it upon himself to kill them again and again until no child had remained.

But what was that?

'Have we missed it? How have we done it?'

A submarine with the last surviving relics of a long displaced human nature rested there. They had missed them because of all their plays and bitter snail-like fragments of missaligned imagination pieces that shot, came about and ended. Not here, not there, not anywhere. Make it stop, make it stop, make it stop.

But the other Agamemnons didn't care about them any longer. As a matter of fact, they had found the thing which was missing, as neither of them had been ready to take care of anyone but themselves. Even then, it was far too difficult to care for it. Spark and birth and make it come between broken teeth. He walked like a strange man with no feet of his own but invisible feelers' pushing through sworn extenders coming from the back of his head. He was dead, wallowing in pain, kept alive by the infusion he received by the machine he was in.

Long long long, it should be known that they had been way too primitive here. In reality, they weren't the human beings either, just another copy. Filth, filth, filled everything. Even the purity of something as real and meaningful was lost. At the chose of not losing their attention, that they might leave and find a way to bash and crush everything in their path, it was decided that long would it be taken from them, sadly after the lights faded out. Angelic natures followed through as these fake-humans started producing their auras at his command.

‘I shall listen to your case now. If I’m not pleased by it, I’ll take you all from where you stand and kill you again. Not that I care about the meaningless lives you live, for each time.’

A sudden growth inside his mouth, rooted as to make his mouth more protruding. It was necessary, in order to give a slight access and carry on with the needed ascension which might carry on. Brought to him, against the hares, let them die off.

‘I see now how it is.’

‘Puffs of dust, puffs of dust, puffs of dust, but the dust is a glummy, clumsy human turned into a small globe.’

It time he will rot and he will grow in the worst possible ways. Glory to him and make sure he’s wearing someone else’s skin. It’s far too unnecessary. ‘Lord oh lord Agamemnon, but you must wait and hear the songs.’

‘He is right, you know, as we Agamemnon knew, he knew of them as their existence. He had made planes, he treated them with nothing but the most pious embrace and coddled them as if they were his own children if not more than them.’

‘But why had they hid from me for so long?’

Then asked their mask overlord who had succumbed to scum. Well, to say, he had claimed and he made it appear again. As the replica came into the shed of the fallen, the many faced talon which pushed the liquids onto him made it so he knew about it, better than to find it through the broken crab-like exposures that began happening on the planet.

‘I see now, you’re all changing the past so you could accommodate yourselves to them at last. Perhaps I should’ve known better that this was about to happen, as I ought to have been spared the trouble.’

Let the primates come out. Some of them pulled out their helmets and there came the unnatural face he bore. It was too disgusting-looking to look at for much longer. He had realised the perdition he had created and saw a reason to take everything for himself, eating as much as he could devour himself in order to grow to an even shallower magnitude that it ought to be. Through they were there, taken aback, he came to realise that everything in the past, whichever the reason lasted had been his. It belonged to him, to scowl and cut. Something worse than it brought itself, as it happened for him to look at a dead past which represented as in blue, a sand of hue which started pushing over towards stars. And ever the vacuum of space took into the same color, drawing near as he’s swallowed just about a good chunk of it.

It was pointless to look in the past, as he knew that it was all corrupted, thrown upon in mild disgust. He was once again pulling himself out of the box made out of himself, only to drag it along in the back. And that had become his trunk. A neck emerged but you could see it rounded, never curved. Only as a few countless megators pushed out of it yet, with their unnatural veins and the pumping crysanthem-like spherical-patches of clay thumps. Those started growing everywhere around his body. Quickly from the two sides of his trunk, two circles had been made, out of receding triangles which drew inside of him to reveal the jerky cartilage which would grow upon itself. So far, it hadn't mattered what the point of it were. But he was bent upon making him body, turning it into the gruesome anomaly it wanted to become. At this point during his advancement, he was bent upon finding them now, the scum-trogs of this world, lost upon their own unnatural ways. But he wanted to govern and that's what he would do. Even if it meant stretching space after pushing in, turning the emptiness in Agamemnon which tottered ahead. Soon enough it would push on and creep behind his ears, not to fear its own inadmissible lack of succor, not to care. Of the natural lives he had sent to despair. As he approached one of the satellite-collonies that waited in his path, there was no stopping now as he had struck a nerve inside his own bubulous blotched knot. Inside of it, there rested the liquemech that was never there, never wanting to be anywhere. It turned to mold into the watcher, the ones he killed and ate after.

They swam in it as if they were caught in a windmill without a chance to escape, they were entrapped yet there was no escape yet. IT was time to listen to the sounds of wounds, some of them were trying to fight the currents, as as they frozen and turned switched around.

As the watchers were the fruitless fly-mutated, the hardenes bodies, dark and long, pulled aside, yet turned into the liquid at last. And the giant concoction in which they swam solidified and became their bodies, an almost domed sphere from which sprouted their hairs and in-between red eyes, fragmented as if their cries would be heard. Would they actually be believed? Would it matter? For now, it only seemed like this so far. As soo as a change happened here, they were sent out there.

In the realm of the rosses, where they floated with the stalks. Greeted by the wandering voices of Agamemnons in the dust, the ones who were not aware had no idea how they got there with them. Perhaps they were kidnapped and low. Now they would throw their lives away as fruitless fly-mutate stalks began growing, forming branched of their own. In the ether they'd be planted, floating forever as to never grow. And from inside of them sometimes they spouted the regurgitated mass which lasted for milleniums at end. It was only now that they would be allowed to carry on. Never to care, not to push away, every now and then a small fly-sprout would be allowed out of their regurgitating holes. And the main unit on top of them started giving in the tremor. It came out of some long-lost spot, from whence it wanted nothing to do about with them. They too were plounging around, as their extensions couldn't be controlled any longer. Like piles of sea cucumber-veils they shot again and grew their dysfunctional wings. Plenty of mill-maligned quills fell off, all of whom were living and grew back on the giant plain-long block they were allowed to walk on. As long as they held on the giant hairs, they wouldn't fall off and they could remain there, holding forever.

As transparent growing stellar-scum, they had been saddened by the lack of action they achieved, it couldn't be believed any longer that there was hope for them.

In his depths spoke the master.

A new contender has risen from the depths of the uncanny pits, he had been pricked by madness and looked as if he lost everything he's ever owned. He had crafted a single room for himself and it was harsh for the eyes. He realised what time had become for him. A defier, taintedly broken, unable to continue after the fall, there were too many things which went wrong. Just look at him, he spent too many days wondering, what was wrong. It took a lot of time and nerves for him to walk where he stood now. There wasn't any more time. He was trying his best not to lose everything. This was the real bet. The only thing which remained of him, his legacy, everything, and once it fell nothing else would remain. Since that point on he had chosen this for himself. Member of the lost, tribal creature of the broken clot, defiler of paganistic rituals which went their way, he thought to himself what might he do now? If not for them, who would think of what could follow, there was danger laying ahead. Sometimes he looked at the pink walls and at the lard graffiti and thought to himself was I meant to be here yet?

It was a distortion for him. Too many twists and turns ended up not mattering yet. After so many impeccable sings of filth, and the twists and the knots between every connection that ever lasted, he realised that there wasn't any other way. He would lose it all. And after that, everything he's ever done, everything he's ever created would be lost.

He had to create his halls, twindling atop his scourging might. He realised that everything he's ever hoped for was gone. After remaining at the top of the chain for so long, he grabbed his own throat and stopped. It as hard-to do, it was pointless to go through. Regardless of how it looked like, there wasn't anything clicking in any longer.

All of the machinations failed. Instead, he could only wonder at that.

Judging by the walk alone, he was smashed. It was hard to miss now. Just twenty feet away from where he stood, he cared little of the people he walked in.

He knew then that in order to progress, it was clear to him that he had to get through the the maddest hoops and the lousiests crooks that ever lived. Those inflammatory creeps that would force him back. Through every venture of reality that pushed him back. And for that he created the Ultimate tool, the paragorn of foolishness in living.

'Unexo Arar, Bou't Irr.'

The Irksome man could think of nothing better to feel as had.

Baby-steps came through. A single plain or orchids made him sniff around in wonderment.

It was a quick reprise to the neuroticism floating in the air. Airborne rotation swirled around the first panel-saw regurgitating the first people accepting the fate. A combination of the harsh weather and the disturbing slith made them realise that there wasn't anything they could do to prevent it from pushing in. Death was somewhat inevitable by all account and the survival of the species was no longer important at all. Stranger than it should be, there were some exceptions which immediately got set in place, first it was the factions who managed to put some of the survivors to good use. Then it was the strange living artileges which converted some of the humans to static embodiments of granite and other calcerous materials giving them a state of living unlike anything which had ever been seen. In their state they would be unbroken, unable to age. It was a mistake to consider it otherwise, especially since they were surrounded by pricklers trying to smash them apart and collect just about everything they bore. It looked like they would fall much quicker than they would be allowed to carry on inside the facility.

It only brought them to it, a single vestige where they dwelled. It was a place where the gangs and the outlaws and the passive farmers never came forth towards, mostly because of the danger involved in the various pneumatic containers being filled with pure liquid radiation. As it would be slowly injected into them like slow machines inside the ramming of fleas, there was only one thing left to look after, a single bodiless odor that entered them. Through some illinear long straps atop each wall, the tubes started mixing them with the only thing left working in the place. The repository of skin eating control, but most importantly, it was only then that the chance had arrived.

A journey had come in mind.

Ten tributaries sapped. Each passage of water drew forth and lost itself in broth. At the begining there was no reason to filter the water. It was a damn, out there, which stopped it from going along. Spiralling speculchral in the making, it went through the gorund defiler. He had been madly gazing through the back. The weather got worse at least. It was a good sign, especially since the tributaries were made out of a blue-green mix that wasn't to be touched. A few barrels had been abandoned in.

There was one thing which went ahead and left a mark, that being the only pox-like shols which found solace in the Pleister rivers that mixed in. In there, bodies usually found a place to stay. It was far too dangerous to dig in too deep inside the earth, hence this was the other alternative, one which couldn't be ignored for long. Not too short on the pick either, it seemed likely that there would be a great loss to follow as the other seasons approached.

Thomas was one of the few men who was put in charge of the Aviation. It was what they called the bodies that started coming out of the river and stepping into the air. There wasn't any flight involved, only a peculiar rising, as if they were walking on stairs, without being deranged by anything which was happening around them. For the next few nights he would stand up. Much to his credit, he had a part of his head not there. It was always somewhere else, trying to find itself when needed.

Defunct-human Thomas was what they called him.

With all the radiation, it was everything he had left to him and to his name. Nothing else remained to him, other than the strange and out of this world appearance. It dragged on. He drew towards one of the open streams and began drinking from it. While this was dangerous for those that cared of the consequences and the mutations, he wasn't. It was right, there was something in him which made it all the while harder to keep it in. Tingels sporuted in his chest, and for a moment it looked like a spiked-rose garden. Of course it would be harder than that, but it wasn't the first time it happened. At least this time time, he happened to look the way and not portray anything but the only feeling of abandonment he would feel. It was interesting to look upon, especially since those jerky reactions always followed him wherever he went. Back to the post, but there was an arm missing.

Despite his best attempts to eat at the vines, everything growing inside of him was off-limits, especially for those surgeons who famed himself well enough in the head to try something like it. Thomas hadn't expected him arm to be chewed that way. It was puerile as well, since they only cut it around the rims, leaving it behind so he could stay and look at how it drew forward.

'Impossible, I knew I had doused myself in the antidote, I should be safe from the effects of the river.'

His pain wasn't concealed properly, which was a reason in itself for him wanting to get away. It was painless at first but after a few well thought ideas, he gave it a drip. It would be a simple dip inside the river, then he would force the mutation to reseal the arm. No-harm, no foul, at least that's what he hoped. In the return of common sense, which only came after he had began the process of reattachment; he was already set on it. Bent to loong a waiting, he thought about this for longer than the few minutes in emergence. It wasn't safe any longer. Not to dwell too much on regrets.

But Thomas Penchot was a dead man. He didn't know it yet, but he would live through it again. Perhaps it didn't make sense so much so as he would needlessly be observed in order for an explanation to finally come into light. What would do him a much greater service would be the fact that the mutation produced living cells. And he wasn't alive to begin with. Penchot's heart had stopped, his lungs had lost full capacity, his brain decayed partially and was only kept in place by the small machine which took over his memories and full fuctions, leaving him as a reanimated servant for the camp. Why, this wasn't how he first envisioned life before.

That's why he took his loses and claimed nothing in return. He set off the delination and the trajectory of the rivers in his free time. Second of his most favourite picks was that, since there was so much time to spare, he had noticed a pattern where the rivers were overflowing at times. Soon enough they could start going out of their way and expand past unfathomable levels, where it didn't matter where they'd go. This whole area could possibly be suffocated without a way of knowing.

‘And yet, I can feel my arm. You may not be as bad as I thought you would.’

But he contended a grunt. There was no peace or loyalty the tributaries would provide, especially since there was the chance that the corpses out there were alive, kept so by the jerkings and the bubbles he kept seeing as they rose at the surface. Considering the alternatives, he would have to pull out his rifle and aim for their heads. Options were limited, as the supplies, so having even more scavengers around pick up food was way too dangerous for him to even consider it as an option, which brought on the other alternative, as it very much surmised the whole appeal he saw to it.

Besides the hallow-point where he stood up in the air, there was the sole chance that he could fall on the side and break an art. They were painted dead people in the sky as well, not just in the river. He observed them as they rose and stood there, anchored in front of invisible doors that never opened. That was the side-effect of climbing those stairs. Most of them lead them to nowhere else but blank spots where they were stuck. It was some miserable way of living, but not even they could complain about it. With all the courage having left there, there was one disciplinary action he liked taking.

‘Another one stays down!’

Penchot considered it for a second more. Despite his well aimed sightings, they never fell out of the sky, as a matter of fact, they remained in the same place and never did a thing of wonder.

A single man came to his mind. As much as he wanted to look around and strike for something, he wanted to look less concise than he had been. The man under the name of Rock-us stepped forward. He was taller than before, even though his expression hadn't changed just yet. While those bizarre creatures pushed on through the floor, he alone had taken hold on Bottle, Pox and Alder for a much greater use he had in mind.

‘Listen, I will make this as clear as I can. Don't both go around chasing wild goose if you don't get it.

This isn't easy for me either, but I feel as if we're getting somewhere.

By the time they Dum-nasties come around the fire, we'll already be out of here, understood? Before they even realise that we're here and I'll make this as clear as I can, we'll sack the place and leave nothing to them to even feel our presence or our absence.

And you want to know why that is?’

‘Why is that, Rock-us?’

‘It's because we're going to blaze this entire home down to the ground as well. We're going to turn it into a well-hell-fire from which only the most burnt corpses might come upon them.’

‘That's what I'm talking about.’

‘Rock-us, you've overdone yourself ten times more than usual.’

‘We should have this tatoood on our surroundings.’

And before they could go ahead and celebrate, they all raised their rail-guns and peered in. It was dangerous, trying to miss and accidentally starting a fire despite not being preapared for it. So many things could go wrong just then, miss-fires and the crossfires and the missing man.

The-snake was out there, somewhere missing, somehow playing a jest on all of them. It was inconcise, simply trying to look out of their way in. But they could somhow feel the scent of the mad flowers that formed the next ten rooms. As they moved in, they revealed the biology-lab. Plants were being disected in there by the strangest elongations coming from the very walls they seemed to have been given birth from.

And the thing was as peculiar as it painted itself as, out of the very fact that they were made out of the same material as those almost cotton panes which held the rooms together. Looking ‘bout it, they came in.

Back to their senses, unquestioning as to figure out what was going wrong.

‘Careful now, I can see this, I can see him now. He must be filthy rich, underneath that suit of plants.’

Alder was staring at the peculiar reconstruction of a man. Going far and as deep as to feel at him, he couldn’t have known. But this was a relic of a long-lost humanity that manifested from inside a storage capsule. His death and manifestation here from a farther more afflicted ship had only come as a surprise for the unit which was in charge of taking care of him.

It was clear even back then, from that enclosed space, where he had lost his mind and the rage drove him towards trying to awaken a human from stasis. He wasn’t preseved. He hadn’t been saved and this was the result of it, again. Much farther than the place he had died in, he stood there, with his body being taken care of by the walls. If you couldn’t tell much about it, that was all.

‘Need I remind you that we’re supposed to sack this place out before someone gets alarmed of our position here? If we’re found here with these in our hands, we’ll have to cover up our escape in more than one ways.’

To which he doubted that there was something he owed to them. Even the slightest hints of remorse went away as soon as he could tell it. Danger came by, it wouldn’t run by if it were for him to carry on like this, as a savage would.

But with the butt of his rail-gun, he started battering some of the locks.’

‘Step away, boss-captain, I’ll make sure there won’t be any trouble here.’

He neared the limit of one of the charges, it wasn’t going to end up well. If he had pushed just a few more consonants-biles through the main illegal rifle-charge module installed into his gun, he could’ve blown this entire room with all of them inside of it. No survivor would as much as get a finger cut and thrown about to leave a trace. As the bolt came off, it stopped two inches in the lock. For a few second they all waited, sweating, wondering, what if it will explode?

Who'd be able to make a run for it if it were for them to lose all hope? It was much more dangerous than expected, since no one wanted to believe a thing just yet. They shared compassion with the plant-man only to return to it and see the four quarters of the whole table be disintegrated upwards in a motion which couldn't even last if it tried. Not only would they not be denied a chance at it again, but they found the most useless thing of all.

'Papers, all of them, only damned papers. I should've known better than this. We were scammed, this was nothing short of a sham. A blasted, unnerving piece of, leave it be, leave all of them be, they'll burn up in the fire.'

Boys, we took everything we could for here.'

'Does that mean what I think it means?'

'It does, Pox, of course it does, trample away.'

Like a bunch of infuriated bulls they started charring and smashing everything in directions not even they could control. There was a sudden satisfaction that couldn't be taken away from them as soon as they had gotten that piece and quiet of destruction, through everything from the rims of the table, to the pine-like gables spreading from the feet of the man, flying ultra-sound waves that were frozen over then broken for their own satisfaction. A second more came off and they had already went ahead to smash and extricate every accomplishment unknown to man that was dragged from around the place. Not a single face wanted to move. And not a single man even considered it a single thing to do.

'He lives.'

'What did you say?'

'Rock-us I think he lives, look at him, he lives and moves.'

'Step aside Alder, I know the right thing to do now.'

With a start, he switched one of the conduits that pushed into his rail-gun and lit the plants with a single chop he didn't even fire. It spread like a glass of water shattering on the floor, pushing past his outer perched-endings as it was suddenly been released from the struggle in a disembodied motion that stopped holding on his neck no longer. They were much more than confused as soon as the fire ended. An automatic system started the water sprinklers below their feet.

'Come one now before we get wet.'

A quick call ended up saving their lives before the other nitrogen came in, as far as they were concerned, they were living now with something inside their heads. So far so, as they stood behind and watched, they needlessly noticed something important. For that wasn't any type of water, especially for the acting agents.

'My skin, something's happening to it.'

Bottle started rolling on the floor while doing his best to prevent his arm from being completely degenerated from the melting process that pushed through him. It was unnecessary at best to even confound himself that way, but he's done his best to not acquire the permanent condition, the affliction which expanded on his clothes.

'It's slipping away, I think it's eating the floor as well. Don't get near him.'

He looked back at the lab, it was already started to fall apart, even with the hands which had no control over it. At this rate alone, there was nothing but a slight escape, a shimmer and a deathless gaze that would let go of them. If they pushed on, just a bit farther, they would lose their heads. Not that much remained out of their scalps.

'My hair's gone as well. I think it was those chemicals. Rock-us, what are we going to do with him?

Bottle's condition is only going worse now.'

'We'll do as I say, understood and we'll act as fast as we can. Hold him down, understood? I wasn't not a single move or noise out of him, I think. Yes, this will certainly do.

Get him through one of those doors and make sure he doesn't make any noise.'

It was necessary now that neither of them pushed too far in. He was in pain, making too much trouble for them. And as soon as they grabbed him, it stopped. But we could still see the pattern jumping. Despite being unseen, it leaped like the motions of a jumping, bouncing ball would. An invisible animated baseball that started corroding the floor as it went on into splashes, its trajectory still being set on straight ahead.

While the room they left was abandoned and left to fall. Without a doubt, someone would be announced by their arrival, not to mention that they would know less of what happened and push more to find out who it was that came in.

'I should've gotten rid of the boides, now they'll know we're here.'

While calculating the entire distance which carried on through the roof, he only pondered at it momentarily, just to make sure that something went through his head. Some plan, or an outline, or anything.

'You coming, Rock-us?'

'Of course I am and that's captain Rock-us for you, Alder.'

It was getting hard to make his way through the linds and the other stricken walls that prevented his access from fully drawing in. He had been there for a reason and that reason was lost to him, even there. Chrame didn't know how he had arrived in the place in the first place, yet he wanted to be lost. It was unexplainable, but so far he was confused after asking.

'Who's there?'

Though that was beyond his sphere of knowledge, he painted the tools he carried on with him.

I feared the advancement and could do nothing about it. Overtaken by the worst possible emotions, I found no resolve. Another-scum Thogg-salem, what they called me, hanging out in the woods, don't delude yourself thinking they're any different than them.

Around the outskirts of the village, eighteen Thogg-salems dangled after being hanged. We weaved their guts outside the plains. It maddened them, to even acknowledge that so many of us remained. For the few hours left in noon, they could simply wait their turn.

'We'll enter by this small similtude of a gate.'

He pointed at it from an awkward angle. With this in mind, they pushed through what appeared to be a single stretch made of twenty miles going up a pseudo-hill. Only two Thogg-salems carried on that path. They chose to follow through and eat at least a child and a woman. It was the only thing they could hope for. Getting even closer hadn't been an issue at all, for what came after was only the reason for them drawing on. Eating off the dirt, after realising someone's feet were on it gave both of them a hint on confidence.

'Like that? I think we could find the culprit and tickle her never endings until they pop. What do you say about it? Think we can fix it?'

Better now than ever, especially after hearing one of the distant shouts coming from atop one of the descending houses.

'Sit down now, we'll wait.'

As they had, it was important that neither of them would be as pious as to show even the slightest show of quiet there, not to breathe too deep in, but they were desperately outdoing one another in their quick shades. Nothing remained there. It felt as if both of them disappeared until there was nothing about them. Only emerging shadows from crumbling pieces of grass.

'The doctor had killed my daughter, stop him.'

Wildly concerned, the villagers came forth, as distracted as they were, unable to act, they were put down by the horse decay which was happening around them. Four feet away from where it stood and already the muck between the distant marches manifested itself. As the solid liquified, the parts of the doctor's horse started coming on in full force, pushing ahead until nothing could be left out. There was no miracle so far, as if he would be concerned about it.

‘But look.’

His hand came out, a glove about the silk. Expensive stuff, top shelled, and he came out in a bizarre suit which only set his frame forth. There was nothing to it now, especially with what was happening between the shakings. The doctor simply leaped on the horseback and rode through their petty squabble with little to no interest in carrying on any kind of explanation for how he was acting. Less force travelled through their brains, as soon as they came to their senses, nothing remained to it.

‘Step on it already, he’s getting away.’

‘Men, grab your mules, don’t let him escape.’

‘Look at the horses now. They’re going away.’

All those born of strife went away. There was no reason to get through it any longer. Within a single strike they went ahead, marrying their shoelaces on the way. ‘Wait and seethe longer. We won’t catch him this night, unfortunately I must wait here and made a mudd-house.’

‘What are you doing here? He’s just in our reach. If each of us mounts, we could catch him in no time.’

What was hiding in it?

‘I see it now. Perhaps I ought to have made it clearer. Earlier this day, I ate my parents and placed my gut somewhere down there.’

‘Frederick, it’s already too late, the horses most likely ate them now. You shouldn’t bother yourself with it any longer. Come, I’ll set you a pot-belly and fill you with some stew.’

‘How would that serve me then?’

There was enough for everyone. And neither of them could tell what was going off, just by looking ahead, his headless transparency made him aware. He wanted to be spared from living such a sad life without being able to contemplate what was going on. Bastards, the bastards couldn’t even tell what he was about. Without some better claims, the only thing he could do was mutter underneath his breathe. Volatile meant it was better than him being dead.

It was unnecessary. But he acted a bit rash and impulsive. Dersland appeared out of nowhere with a baton in his hand. As he drew near the point where he hadn’t considered anything else, he started beating on him while he was down. Two men drew closer to stop him, but he immediately repelled them with virtually no effort at all. Earlier than it should be called, some bolder maidens came to their husbands’ sides in shock.

‘Avert your eyes now, this is nothing close to what a maiden should see. I am afraid we cannot look ourselves past the yapper, it’s getting far too dark and way too dangerous for us to loom around this place.’

‘Do you not care about the massacre that’s happening in front of us all? Consider this, there’s still a chance for us to get through to him, do something. Do something.’

Pressing further, Ellis could do nothing to stop him.

It was late, as Dersland had too much of his uncontained rage pushing through his unnatural brain feeler, popping a nerve with each strike he managed to land on the side. Of course he could not be bothered in the least. Uncontrived by it, he tried taking it further in. Desperate or not, he showed no clear signs. ‘That man will be the end of us all unless we do something.’

‘Let me get one of my plows and I will get rid of him myself.’

‘Not so loud Roy, he might hear us.’

‘And what if he does? There’s no chance in hell I’ll let that stump make a fool of us all. He’s no longer welcome into our village and for what I care he might as well burn in hell with the doctor.’

The doctor, right, then it clicked. That rabid beast was listening to us all along. It craved for it, for the chase and for the chance of feasting upon such a noble corpse. If only he could take the lead he could somehow make it for the trail and find him. As soon as he was done chewing, he got on all four and started looping to and fro. It was this beast’s way of thinking. Otherwise, it couldn’t be done. Just thinking about it revealed that there was at least an inchling of the madness still going through his mental veins.

Would it remain on that position or would it burst again? So many limitations made him butt head with the rock-bottoms that appeared from the horse-marshes the doctor had created. From the depths there only came one of them who spoke in the horse-tongue. Despite the language barrier presiding between the two of them, he spoke at last, it took no chance off, hybridising with the palette of blood.

‘You won’t catch him on foot, you need a trusy mare.

Allow me to serve in return of getting your guts out of there.

They shall be mine and I’ll be yours, that’st he deal I’m bringing you forth.’

‘But what if I don’t desire it?

Perhaps I ought to dive and search for my guts out there. No matter how deep or shallow the drop might be, I know there might be a chance for me.’

‘Enough of your bitterness had I to swallow here. I’m giving you a chance to make do with yourself and save your honor in the eyes of men.

Those who surround you look in fear and mistrust, like any man would with half a mind to him, knowing that there is no other chance. Do not waste away this chance of thine, know that agony shall not define you as a man, but compassion towards them.

Bring their vengeance to a stop, and you shall win your guts back.'

'Very well, mad-horse, I shall join you in the chase but I won't ride you.'

'So be it, Killjoy, I ask of you this then, connect with me with an umbilical cord, that way we might join together and be one. We shall give into one another's desires for speed and the chase.

We shall share our bodies and make to we can track him down before he makes the leap of space.'

'That is a deal madhorse, let it be so.'

As soon as they were done speaking, the villagers set themselves aside. It was impossible to move past this point, no matter how hard they tried. The image they were staring at was both uncomfortable and ecstatic. For the sole reason they couldn't look away they stood there glancing like fools.

Another deathly horse appeared out of the murk and out of his pushed a single cord which went straight into the man's belly like a parasitical viper that bit in. Yet the relationship wasn't as clearly defined as they thought. Every time he showed signs that there would be a bump in there, he started foaming and struggling as much as he could there. But contact was made nonetheless and Killroy started growing, bulking, as his bone structures moved towards the unnatural state no primate should be forced into. He had been overtaken by a skeletal horse-structure, close to it by any other means. The measurements were off by a grand rip-off nature. And all the while, with all of the bile piling up in his esophagus and the weirdly arched limbs, he gave into the pure joy.

'The doctor shall ours!'

'So what are we waiting for then? Let's march and make chase as fast as we can.'

Before the sun set, they were already on the run, leaving the village behind in a mist of confusion, houses torn and beaten and infested by horse-worms, a mother weeping for her dead child she desperately attempted nursing back to life. It was quite the disease, the breaking and the feeling of illness that kicked in. To be sure about it, he had no mind any longer, not since he had become as primal as he was now. As a matter of fact, this was the worst state he could let his body wallow in. With his stance being broken in the back and all the cracks that started gathering around the crown of his spine, the symbiosis between the two of them was not meant to last.

'Know that this is only temporary as I would not desire to push this panting. I couldn't sustain a life of chasing the wild hares, the rabbits and the crows upholding your name.'

'And I have not asked of such a thing my dear Killroy, I only desired to make sure you had a chance to live, for the first time in your life.

That and I have my own quarrels with the Doctor for slaying me before I had the chance to witness the birth of my children in their free form.'

From all disease and to no pain, he could only witness them again. In the longest lucid dreams he found them, seeking and beckoning for a ride, just as any of his children would take it, never to defile themselves. It was a pity that he could not find them again. He trusted the doctor, from a horse to the primate, just as he chose to trust Killroy.

'I can only hope I wasn't wrong about this.'

But Killroy Dersland was no good man. No conflagracy could do for him. For what was worth, if he weren't to be looked at anymore, there would be no repass. It was somewhat clear that this was the man in charge. At least in the eyes of his neighbors, he was a saint-storm, a battle of torn latches, a missionary of strange traditions which reflected in the house he lived.

Tressperkkee was weird. Counting back twenty minutes ago, he chased a rat through his kitchen, right after the vermin managed to enter one of live chicken and take control of its movement. Through every turn and after every effective gnaw of a limb, try of the shiver, it started bloating itself at the head. Soon enough, before he knew it, both of them started crawling on the wall. Choiceless in the matter, Tressperkkee took a pair of knives and sharp ivory dishes and began chunking them before they could get a single shiver in.

He walked with impunity, thinking of a way out. His personal attire was a mess. This entire place was a mess by the looks of it. As deranged as he had been, there was no other way he could make it through the forest now. Neither the chicken nor the rat could were anywhere to be seen.

And that disturbed him the most.

'I shall break your bones as soon as I can. Do you hear? If I manage to get my hands on your, I'll just.' He spat off the round parcel. It wasn't like him, he never lost his temper this easily, not whilst they were around. And nowadays they were around all the time without exception. Four men, dressed finely, bearing chairs instead of bones. And they were weirdly deformed as every chair overlapped upon one another, pushing through their retinas, their basins and their bitter primate woes.

'Ah, you decided it was time to appear again. I see.'

There was something wrong about the way everyone acted in the camp. Ever since the apparition of the strangely coping man, they could not distinguish themselves any longer from the standing pieces of slothing dirt-people that were fashioned by his hands. He had done this peculiar act without an explanation during one strange night which redeemed not a single thing he's done.

Firstly the impressions faded. Now came the first of them.

‘I for one feel like we should accept him as one of our own, even though he’s weird and peculiar and strange. Why shouldn’t we accept him; he may look different and act differently but at the end of the day, are we not the same?’

Confession by a man who ended up being bashed at the back of his head with a rock; no one laughed at it again.

With a front of desperation, they were perilously near death. But they couldn’t die just yet, not during this buffoonery. It was a dangerous play by both sides as they remained separate from one another.

First camp which had been mentioned split in half. Avenue had little to no idea how he came around to the strange fellow. Safety was adorned now, since he had a breather, with the wickedest implausible thoughts that fashioned his fancy.

‘I say we get a rope and put him down as the mutt he is.’

‘He should at the very least be beaten and put off tray and served for everything he consumed here. I say we take what belongs to us and make sure he never gets up again.’

‘Don’t raise your voice at me now, I’m not the one who started all of this.’

‘Hearse of a puppy, I see it in your eyes, you’re planning on keeping him a pet, surrounding yourself in the established force. But to that I’ll only tell you, my dear camp-wrangler that I will not allow it. Not over my body in any case.’

Because he knew it that much sooner than needed he’ll get off not having a face. You could see the first sings bowing, wrangling and pushing on. Out of the dirt now they came and their features could be recognised.

‘Don’t touch them, that’s not dirt.’

It was only the speciality made out of out the liquid filth that pushed on. Better unlocked over the rims of the brain now that they couldn’t even focus about the place, with all the strange singings, the trush, intonations, now, enter the withdrawl state.

‘Men, wake up.

There are no dirt pillars and no statues here.

An intruder came into our camp. You may not get it yet but we were drugged.’

‘What? How do you know that?’

What proof have you of it? And why should I take your word over my eyes?

Avenue, what do you think of this?

After all, you’re the one who brought the stranger into our camp. He was your fellow after all.’

‘That’s so, come to think of it, you’ve been snaking your way out of giving us an explanation for what’s been going on there. What would your defense happen to be?’

Avenue reflected on it. Shortly after, he made his decision faster than expected.

‘I’ll have no part in this.’

And for such a reason, he looked less into it that he ought to have done it.

It hit them like a bolt of gagreons as they split it even further on. While this claim divded them even further, the mechanic bolt, the steam traps and the engines pumping had been brought to a halt then. Water wheels and pendulums, the strange acres and the weirder valves, all of them could drag on without the proper lookout for their need.

‘I say we blast the place and bring a change in leadership, that’s what we need for the time being.’ Yet not a single man could point back to the one who said it as they were even more flabbergasted than before. In some way, they had conveyed less than an emotion and more of a wreck. It pushed out their confidence and the deliquence they had displayed.

A locomotive was running in the distance, you could hear the dark plume-smough draw out. Air, as it its purest form was only pushed forth through some terminal approach, the birth of mechanical-advancement would only bring the pleasing batterment of hinder legs. It crippled them as they attempted to rebuild the world instead of pushing on forth through the serpentine feeling of a humanity still tied to caves. If there was something you should know, they were mindlessly droning one another before coming to their senses and pushing on back home.

Another camp laid in the distance, this one just arrived. Everyone moved, a few of them died. From the locomotive, it appeared, the ones that neared their time dropped down as corpses from the depths of the prison they had lived in without the chime of armed saviours coming to their rescue. It was a disease at both ends. From the station, whence they had come from, most of them had given up miles before, tence ahead. And the reason for it, well as an indiscriminate Foreman would like to put it.

‘They have crossed between the veils, and they ought to be punished and not remain.’ At least not through the living and not to bother the dead in the same manner, clearly the station proded as the sign spoke.

‘Bottangottn station, that’s what it says. Would this be the right place for us to dwell in? Are you certain there’s some fathom to look after and some peril to push on?

We could wait for another stop.’

‘Nay, we must take the survivors and carry on.’

It was decided, despite the fact that there was no solid ground to lay upon. A step was all it took to realise that they were knee deep into the ground. Yet there was a salutation as the first man came around.

‘Domo, domo, I say to you new arrivals.

Have you come from the distant land to trade?’

In Search of the Liver-Kettle

As the sudden tribulation around the realm could be heard, when all of the sudden, a voice leered as soon as it was yet in range. Two young seekers of thrills found themselves going in out of their way to announce.

‘We shall finally find a liver-kettle and rescue it from shallow hands. It is our righteous duty to go ahead and find it no matter what we must go through in this time of led.’

There wasn’t any way of working it out. It was clear, they would do it or they’d fail in their search. But there was no hope if the kettle wasn’t found. It was an artifact of great importance, all of them were, as a matter of fact, if someone knew better, he’d only attest to it without any disregard for what was being embided along the journey. Far too many of them had to be recovered and it was only a matter of time until it would not be forgivable to abandon them.

Think of it as they stack up, all of them could be brought back. And the world would only live as a testimony of the kettles, as long as they produce the limberick-o-folley, the sparring blade, soon to remain, in all of them, once again. IT would grow and spread as much, as often as it could. Never ending the shattering of the edges of their tributary, bells were sound and there came the shaking round collapsing through the masts of streets. Clearly their mission and their veil announced, had only brought them about the road. Missing nothing from home, they carried on their vestments of giant Caroa leaves and hopped on the mirrored-horses, all of their four heads, and two hinging legs pushing on.

‘Where to now, are we to ask for any good direction, must we call upon anyone at all to face the fealty of our action?’

‘Ignario, I say we count on our own two feet and least of all, invite him.’

Karakas pointed at the Mule-headed, spider-legged, bodied-to an outlet for great machines, a walking terror with no feet. He had only a pack on his back which helped him walk around with unknown graspers that pulled around the air, as invisible hands which only pushed him on ahead. He was unconcerned with anything, yet decided to act. He called on them as soon as he realised they were talking about him.

‘Why, I shall join you, then, but whence thine forth? What are we looking for?’

‘The famed liver-kittle, the greatest of the land, if you could please follow us, must we not forget about the mess left in the ground?’

Both and either pointed yonder. And in the wake of a horizontal growing Caroa tree, they understood that nothing was ever going to return to the ways they used to be. It was the lost age, when nonce mattered. And this buffoon, the hulking boon in his hands pronounced. He came about to ask them for a single loss, a coin flip, if he were to follow them at last.

‘This coin had eighteen sides. Know that if you fail each toss, I will make it so you never reach home after the journey’s done. But I shall never tell you of each side and of which one is good and which oen’s bad, for that reason, I can only make sure you’ll listen.’

Listening they had, trying to find out what he was about. It came to him that even there, neither of them were getting near. Not a sniff, and not a wonder, neither of them accounted for him to come yonder. Yet he named himself only the name, Ororo and came forth. It was never revealed where his coin dropped in, though he came along and never felt anything. Not for them nor four in rows, they were followed as soon as they left the town with their provisions left at home.

‘Blasted thing, it’s all because of you Ignario, we should’ve made sure we packed everything in.’

‘But why must I be blamed for everything when I had done none of it. I’m responsible for naught, I haven’t come about the place, it wasn’t me, I only.’

‘Not a word, I’ll hear neigh, I can only hear the water vapors coming through the veins.’

And they all stopped and waited, setthing near the waiting river. As it happened, it was dangerous to breathe it in, for obvious reasons, their hearts thinned and they couldn’t do a thing at all. Not to fight alongside them or face anything other that may harm them more than they should make the call. But they stopped near the crossing.

‘You’ll only cross when I let you cross.’

He said, with a single arrowing pointed at his head, he trailed the way through and showed himself as bit as new. Pointing in the bad, he showed them.

‘That’s where I fell and cracked my head twenty years ago. I’m still there, as a part of the bridge, even to this moment I can feel what’s going on. What’s this world actually about, indeed I know. I studied it thoroughly, indeed I have.’

Rightfully so, just looking as the falling of the nearst nest, he detested everything, especilly how the junk-cars had been turned into oaks. All of them were moved around, just so the tectonic plate the land was on kept moving despite every turn. It never turned to a sun, not to one which was still right. And the moment they looked around, then back, they were greeted by the ultra-towering badland shales which gathered around the metal enclave.

‘Domos, friend, shallow they’ll respond.’

Don’t look at them again now, or else they’ll know you’re still here. From the badlands there came the tin forgers, madly engorged in the least meaningful cutting and reproduction rituals they could bring about the pleateau. From this sudden comotion, stress poured in as it began pushing the junk-oaks in, deeply submerging until they were needed less than stronger, blunter were the peculiar Arillots which grew the air into the Fell. It was his only chance to make a great impression and yet to ask.

‘What have you come here for?’

Still not answer, but he could yet guess at that. You could feel the scent inside their proper toes. All of them were lost to the idea that there wasn’t yet a way to convey what they were getting in.

‘The liver-kettle, that’s what we’re after.’

‘I knew it, I knew it, I called it and I knew it.’

There was no way no, not immediately, to their notice.

‘Why yes, should we play the anticipated drum and call our blessings until they’re done? I think we ought to find some shame again if we try it hard enough. But keep trashing the bleeding pointed cattle.’

Play the games atop the craze.

It was hard to miss now.

Close to a statistic impossibility.

Despite the Dendrils coming forth, only their maker could step out of the badlands and carry on the gritty pane, remaining in the constant frolick. For the entry into the surrounding area was completely smashed. Trashed apart, even as it didn’t even show any reluctance to recede into the hole from which he came out of.

‘You do not belong in this place. Listen to me, as I’ll only say this once and once will do.’

With the switch of a wrist, he broke the bridge, the river, the stones and from beneath the shallow tremor, there came the leeches, bearing their fat snails around their crowns. And in much there are many. From each bob and each Crane that fell from it, you could hear his voice tell, only as sublimely soft.

‘Have you seen my friend Call?’

He was lost for a reason, know it all. They wouldn’t be made aware of it then. As a matter of saying his name was difficult, with the obscenities they yelled, as the men which almost came out of the springs fell on their backs, soon being claimed by the leeching snails in laughter. Soon they had been appropriated and shallowly caught inside, without wondering what went wrong. Just what went wrong? Why would no one tell them what went wrong. Intermission comes here. Hear them move, no one stopped at all. Yet in this second not even their lips or the molecules of air went ahead, they all heard one another in their minds, just as if they were there. As they were figments of the lordly-thrashed imagination, a push in the wrong direction which resulted into them considering a way in.

But that weren’t the reason they had been there, or anywhere else. Despite being called at several times to answer for their crimes. Each of them started citing off what they’ve done.

Ignario was first, now he pressed the front lobe by one of his fingers that managed to enter his skull.

It was imparted then that what he's done, just over the span of a few days was the complete obliteration of the family living inside the Salazar house. Shocked yet not likely displeased by what they heard, it was much obvious with all that fell on his shoulders. Walking on stretched carpet-feathers, he came in. Just around the second noon where there was no one in. For about forty minutes he had scanned the place and made sure not to miss a single spot for what was going on the face of the road. They could come inside at any moment and for that reason it was decided that they weren't going to abide any of the rules, not any longer and not in the passing. As a matter of fact, what went through their heads, that very moment when they entered their room, was the shock of seeing yet another intruder. He had lain there for hours until he was completely dissatisfied with life. It wretched him to carry on, pushing past a few more minutes, off with his head they said.

Bearing their company no longer, I did the only reasonless thing I could, I beheaded my companion with the help of the whip. Soon it was revealed that he didn't bleed white, like the rest of us. He was of a lower breed after all. What came out of his was a spray of burlesque antique that destroyed his body as soon as it started corkscrewing itself like a tiny flute of pus. About twenty minutes into him, might it be added that they stared? They started falling as I made my way towards their ankles, cutting but a small disaster. The whip simply went through them all, curbing their knee-molecules into popping joints I kindly felt around. From each of them, I started pumping until they were overtaken and I could only pop them off thoroughly. As it were needed. To their pleasure or not, he started pushing the joints upwards until he caused, in a tri-embrace a single pop to happen inside of them. It was instant and mostly painless, he assured everyone else, but some had not believed him for a moment.

'He ought to be pushed for that, shouldn't he?

And why are we still moving in circles now? Have we not had enough of it already? I think we should take justice immediately in our hands and see to it that he'll never raise a hand.'

'Wait, but what of Sophia now?'

For a second, they all turned towards him.

Ororo stopped the stranger from proceeding further. It couldn't be believed but that strange machination surrounded him with an immediate grasp, took two strides and made sure he wouldn't interject just yet. 'I'm pleased to be at your service for now, but let it be known that you shall not fight here, on desecrated land. If you want to find something else, go ahead and find yourself left alone, in that corner over there.'

Where the workers were painting a single strut inside the bowels of a single hole water didn't drop in. A reason made itself clear upon drawing near to the place where it was happening. Only pure tears drops could fall through, and even though they had been made out of oil by those strange machinations of steel, the rules of the universe still applied.

'Ignacio had done nothing to yearn this pain. Isn't that right Karakas?'

'Indeed, it is, Ororo, indeed it is. Now, I suppose we should hear everyone else before the songs of the snails ends and the leeches still remain.'

'We shall.'

After which he prepared, only to pain on what was going on there. In the least commanding manner, where the storm weather came to be, they took a single moment to look forth as the sky and its felacious gluttony. For the clouds were not puffy this day and age, when they had started holding all the flying masses which began melting upon one another until all the birds and the flying machines had dissapeared. And they hid in there, making the most unnatural guttural hollow that ought to have been heard. It was so dangerous to hear that for the sole reason they couldn't fathom it, they tried getting away. It paid no less that it was expected for them to find out that there wasn't anywhere else for them to go.

Not fast the bridge since it had been destroyed. And the way back wasn't an option.

'Go ahead with the confessions then, before the weather gets worse. We still have to follow on our journey, if we may be able.'

So it came to it then, that there was something which remained, an unnecessary amount of guests that followed, all of which popped from the Cranes, who were standing on their backs, unbotting their shirts for the others to come out. Now it would all make sense, for everything being accounted there. First guest was a head, he hadn't been attached to anything but came out of him instead. Another came out and it looked as if he were no one, but a guttural copy of some man unnamed. By the name of Rod, a sailor dressed in blue. The least interesting of all, had been the corpse of the Colossus, who had been brought to a miniature end. Standing next to him stood the others, painted in the colors of fainting lights, explorers, husks, mindless stranders and bums, all of whom stopped to listen.

Only a few of them were of great importance, other well not to be named. It was unfortunate that they attended, to hear what the beast named Ororo had to say.

His crime of choice was blasphemy as he's done it in the month of May. Conveyed in pain, nothing could be feigned from this wild ignorance which started trashing. Ever so near just about the place, it had come as a surprise that it hadn't neared going about each face. He had walked around the town of Curr, and saw the city gates upturned. Brave need not remain for long. Looking at it again made him lose whatever fathomless question he kept to himself. In that gate there was a slouch of profanity. They hid an entire brothel inside. Once he had discovered it he could think of nothing but the desire to make sure that none of them would be alive. Not for long, as he had been disgusted and disturbed by it. A problematic fire had been brought and spread. But not a single show of mercy was given to them. Take a finger, twice and thrice, but he had taken all of them at once.

Yet this wasn't the only act he found there. As the women rushed out, revealing themselves and how they were made out of wood, then it all clicked in. Ororo had enabled them to run and spread the fire like a wild leaping seething pyre, never to be stopped again. It felt like a spineless thing to do yet, as he ran away, thinking of what was next to happen. What would they say if they found out it was him and only him who did it? Not a single thing could be forgiven, not a word expected then.

'What of it now? What must we do to play about this sweet embrace of fire? I have started it that night and I refuse to pay for the crime I so kindly admired for this long. I cherish what I did for a good reason, despite what you may not know, I was justified in my appeal. Now of all times, I don't fear that It might have to do with anything.

My winged companions in clouds, I'll see you soon if I'm to be judged as anything but a boon.'

And as he stopped, the others carried on, wondering what else there was there. Neither of them had been convinced that it was important for them to confess his deluge. And their say wouldn't matter if they were devoid of any feelings they might convey.

The Arillots, as they called themselves, their four heads turned about, in question.

'Why have they destroyed our bridge? Did they find no other reason to beseech any other way to prevent you from going ahead? Must there be nothing pure in this world?'

He wondered for a second, as it was only a thing for him to know. But his other heads were dull and headed, nothing passing through their bones. It was only a close chance.

But he took it and ran off. On the hindsight, it was a great choice, as the Colossus entered a feat of rage and started imploding everyone with the toes. Hence had their failure and the first attempt fallen forth. But I also need be reminded, that their failure hadn't lasted.

As yet new life came back and from it sprouted a single way of drawing back.

'Towards the Liver-kettle, I set forth.'

A young strapping gallow-head by the name of Duran set forth. But he hadn't been born with the commoners, but atop one of the flying beast-ships of the long winds in Ura-Maasa. Enter the rightful passage. A few more steps ahead and you, after the fifteen hundred one and you will have found where he died. Taking each of them back would reveal to you that his fourth body got left behind. A cracked skull, one that had a lost limb and two of them being completely eviscerated. So it seemed, so far that most of them were gone in a way or another. He could feel the others and know where they died. It was undecided yet, what he should do about it. Yet for now he could think of nothing else but that descending approach, before he would be called upon.

His time and space were already limited by the size of the deck. Though, truth be told, it was enough for him to keep going around for miles and ages, more so than in any common town. Noticing something, at least from around the coffers, it was hard to miss now but he was blunt on it. At least it went as it went, carrying on to it again. Looking for slouching deck-sweeper, he approached him, looking at the others near him. They all went on another drunken haze and slept for the mid-afternoon. In a platinum cover, as the sky shone brightly with the clouds making puffs of soundless waves, you couldn't hear anything from above, henceforth, there was nothing of the chaos coming from below.

‘Excuse me sir, but may I talk to you about something?’

He didn't care much about getting up. A second time and he could see that he wasn't to be bothered still.

There wasn't any question why he was trashing the place in such a manner. Not outside but inside his dream, as Duran saw him jerk and fight the terrors he was meeting after each leap. Mast ahead, he passed the chance but came back to it, as he looked ahead through one of the visors. Farther in the distance he saw the greatest sight a young man could see. It had taken a long time to get there, but at this point, all that hard work paid off. There were no apparent signs in the night-reflection. It was all full of defects now. As soon as the visor came to him, he started pushing his fingers through their trap. An alleviation came to him as soon as he started realising that there wasn't any way out. Not while he still asked questions. Duran considered taking flight, jumping over the edge just to make it on the other side. They were veering the ship in the wrong direction, as it seemed that neither of them were aware of the grand plan. To it they would feel none else.

Duran felt somehow alienated from the outsideworld, forcing himself to go in. As soon as he turned and enters the main area which was just eighty feet away, leading to the halls that connected the passageways leading to the cabbins, he encountered a peculiar figure he hadn't thought about in a while. It was one of those monks of the cube. In a desire to find out more about him, he joined the man in his meditations. As obscure as it sounded, he was concentrating on the cube as if there was some great importance to it.

Somehow, this was much calmer than anything he ever knew about. ‘So that's how it was.’

There was no other explanation.

Poor man looked starved. But he kept going on.

Starting on the Valley of Satoa, somewhere in the distance, two monks met. Indistinguishable, yet there was peace between them. Some blood was shared between them on the long hill.

Melting of a pass along the road-fire which grayed as it spread from the discolored flour-winds which spread it away. In wake of the cutting of the sun, there was no one at blame for it, hence they were gone fifteen feet from where they stood.

By noo they were pondering again on every mistake which took away from them. They shared something in the few minutes they spend with each other. Just in the middle of them, a symbiosis between the cubes began cutting their fingers apart, dragging them on. It was straws, everywhere straws of wheat. From beneath them came the wave of heat which spread as far as it could like a drowning haze that couldn't be dragged again. It felt unnecessary to believe but there were mold rocks appearing on both sides of the cubes, dragging in. As their faces switched on, and their appearance switched, they changed placed as they started talking in missing tongues. It felt paganistic. Only a heathen would give into it this way, as to look at the monks drop their fake skin and replace it with the least forgiving wratful thin shroud they hid underneath. They had thinner bones and no muscle to cover them.

Through them fell the masses of servants and worshippers who had served the cubes, just as both of them stood as giants, looking at them rolling on the hills, small and forlorn, tiny to the touch and gone. 'It moments like this, I wonder what's to be done about our entire faith as long as we're about to come to the same conclusion. Humanity is done now.'

'Hear thee, hear thee, I suffer of the same. But let us not forget of it now and let's not forget of what remains.'

Ad Ehuor told him to stand aside, as he started unwrapping a piece of the cube immediately under this breathe and eyes. He revealed something he had hid for long, trapped inside, as a worshipper who was lost.

At once, after a few steps were taken between the two of them, he had shown it at first and foremost as one of the worshipping spirits showing up.

'Here thee, here thee, comes the Supressor fourteen, Hylinothrop.'

Ours for within the hour and more than we could recall the power of conviction he shows. His sudden countenance changed. After being away for so long, this lane of wheat, crossed on the various overlain hills had somehow been too uncanny for it to count on. Everything looked out of place especially as the filter behind the sun, where no radiation passed on, to no light passing or aching ahead. He felt as if this wasn't the place to be in. However it'd be. It started pushing the bodies he had supressed throughout the eons, reflections coming out of the wheat heads until everything looked in shambles. Various skin-malformations came forth. Broathing and foaming as if from the depths of the most broken plains, the abominations couldn't remain still for a moment nor watch. They couldn't have been alive, nor could the monks defile this place any longer, after realising the various sheets of cloth, their faces and their organs being molded together as the cubes projected power into the Suppressor.

For he had witnessed Agamemnon and for that reason they brought him there, from just about anywhere, from the tainted spots, like occupying lots that had wanted a thrill. They couldn't be tormented any longer as they felt anything but this, this glorious return.

'Where have we thee come? How is that we're here now?'

Though you could see their faces, they weren't actually there entirely. Instead they had been livid projections, just as they ought to be, just like the Suppressors had watched over them in ancient times. With a single difference being the fact that they couldn't have been gone sooner, never wanting, never brought. They were solid as to paint themselves in, drawing in and out from their master Agamemnon. It came as no representation, that they sang the songs of wild creation.

As soon as wheat turned into a formless, endless mass of bio-organisms, there was no return from there anymore. No longer could they be counted on. No worth to pay, they were there again, cackling madly as they were breeding for a new world, a new empire and the vile plans, which would continue as long as they were called about.

'He wants us to behave, I know it.'

'No, we shall not be forced into that seclusion again. Look at it, they had done something for us, even now when we ought to have been battling with our kind. Look, and look, they brought back something of our own. See? It's our mad pustulating pox-star, that one which started infesting the others.'

'Our stars are to return? What kind of prizeful present is this and what have we done to earn it in the first place?'

'Why I might say that everything is falling into place. Sooner or later we shall make it that one day, we could finally spread and do as we please, without worrying about the consequences.'

'I see now that's due to our coming.'

Be pleased that there's no end. In as much as a few minutes spent there, they had all conquered the space between dimensions, speaking with the monks and the familiar figure that had come along, as he no longer was dead in the same sense and in the same meaning as they had been. Instead, he spread only the most malignant of vileness, the one which made him think and spread. Of the deathless ones that wanted him to join them yet.

'He shall make a great vassal for us. I see, for these hills, wherever they be.'

It was questioned for a few seconds at best. They wondered just what went on there for moments at best.

In some beastly manner they had reached the farthest ends and realised that there was an end to everything, nothing could run dry.

‘Where are we now? How is that this place can never return to the faceless turns of the Earth? Is this not a blasphemous agony which we unearth now?’

For this world was null. It was only created by the dull cube in which they resided. Lost to them, as to the reaction Duran showed upon hearing what the monk had said.

‘You want me to believe that inside of your cube there’s a world, there’s a trap and there are faces and what not?’

Certainly you can’t expect me to believe that.’

‘And what of it now, young Duran, would you believe me if I told you of something even better, not to bother with it yet? I can only show you so much by saying, but I wouldn’t dare bring you inside.

Know that both me and the other monk remained in there for a good reason at that. What we have done there can never be forgiven, as I know we were turned into a great and magnificent standing pole-like growth to keep those abominations from spreading and coming out, as long as they don’t know.

As long as they are not aware that they’re inside of the cube, they won’t start going around and finding an excuse.’

It would be easy to break out if they were aware. As perhaps their greatest weakness was their narcissism and their arrogance, and the hours they spent talking and praising their names. Glory to Agamemnon and everyone else, thought that hadn’t been delightful.

Duran needed to go.

‘I wished only to ask you some advice for whence may I start my journey to find that.’

‘Liver-kettle, that I know, it’s said that there can only be a watch. Don’t worry about it, for you shall not lose it in your life-time or any time sooner for the reason you think you might. I can mightily assure you that there’s a way to get through. But don’t believe their lies if you happen you walk on their sinew.’

It extended, never ended and came to his ears then. He hadn’t an idea of what was going on, yet he came to run and to glance and make it to the chambers where he spent the day under the shroud of nymphomatic sleep. It came to him during one of the lost dreams. He fainted, pushed by, and through roses. A garden through which he placed himself in. Someone slept well.

